The estimated cost to the Federal Government for S. 668 is $5,000,000 for fiscal year 1984, $8,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, and $9,000,000 for fiscal year 1988.

Mr. BAKER. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

SENTENCING REFORM ACT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I observe the managers are here, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and the ranking member, the Senator from Massachusetts. I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate, S. 668.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the bill.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 668) to reform Federal criminal sentencing procedures.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill; which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert new language.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, S. 668, the Sentencing Reform Act of 1983, is identical to title II of S. 1762, the Comprehensive Crime Control Act. I have already presented, at considerable length, my objections to the sentencing reform contained in S. 1762. I have offered four amendments to that measure to correct its deficiencies; these amendments were thoroughly debated by the Senate. No purpose would be served by offering the amendments to this vehicle as well. My views on the changes which would be made by this bill are already on record, as is the response of the Senate to those views. I rise simply to make it clear that, just as I opposed title II of S. 1762, so I also oppose S. 668, which contains, in my view, an ill-considered, inflexible, and potentially costly sentencing reform proposal.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, this bill, as it will be amended by amendments to be offered by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, will be the same provisions contained in title II of the crime package. Therefore, after it is amended to conform to the sentencing provision in the crime package, we have no objection to the bill and are willing to support it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate to speak at length on the bill. As the Senator from South Carolina pointed out, it is identical to title II of S. 1762, which the Senate just passed by an overwhelming margin.

This bill revises Federal sentencing procedures to achieve a rationality, uniformity, and fairness that does not exist in the current system. This proposal has a long history of strong bipartisan support in the Senate. In 1978, this legislation passed the Senate unanimously as part of the comprehensive criminal code legislation. In the 96th Congress, it was reported unanimously by the Senate Judiciary Committee. In the 97th Congress, sentencing reform passed the Senate 95–1, as part of S. 2572. The 97th Congress ended before the House-Senate conference reached agreement on sentencing reform. But I have received assurances from the distinguished chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Mr. RODINO, that the House committee will act this year on sentencing reform legislation.

Federal criminal sentencing is a national disgrace. Under current procedures, judges mete out an unjustifiably wide range of sentences to offenders convicted of similar crimes. One offender may receive a sentence of probation, while another—convicted of the very same crime and possessing a comparable criminal history—may be sentenced to a lengthy term of imprisonment. In one well-known study conducted in 1974, 50 Federal district court judges from the second circuit were given 20 identical files based on actual cases and were asked what sentence they would impose on each defendant. The sentencing disparities were astonishing. In one extortion case, for example, the range of sentence varied from 20 years imprisonment and a $65,000 fine to 3 years imprisonment and no fine.

The reforms needed to achieve a workable, rational sentencing system are neither too complicated to legislate, nor too difficult to implement. This legislation clearly articulated the purpose of sentencing, establishes a Sentencing Commission to develop guidelines for sentencing, abolishes parole, and provides for appellate review of sentences which are outside the guidelines. This sentencing reform proposal enjoys strong support of the administration.

Federal sentencing reform is long overdue. During the several years that this proposal has been pending in Congress, it has served as a model for sentencing reform at the State and local level. I look forward to favorable action on sentencing reform by both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

AMENDMENT NO. 2693

Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) proposes and amendment numbered 2693.

On page 118, between lines 13 and 14, insert the following: The liability of a defendant for any unexecuted fine or other punishment imposed as to which probation is granted shall be fully discharged by the fulfillment of the terms and conditions of probation.

On page 120, between lines 3 and 4, insert the following: If the court has imposed and ordered execution of a fine and placed the defendant on probation, payment of the fine or adherence to the court-established installment schedule shall be a condition of the probation.

On page 127, line 10, after "defendant" insert ", relative to the burden which alternative punishments would impose".

On page 128, strike out lines 14 through 18 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(d) TIME AND METHOD OF PAYMENT.—Payment of a fine is due immediately unless the court, at the time of sentencing—

"(1) requires payment by a date certain; or

"(2) establishes an installment schedule, the specific terms of which shall be fixed by the court.

On page 129, between lines 6 and 7 insert the following:

"(g) RESPONSIBILITY TO PROVIDE CURRENT ADDRESS.—At the time of imposition of the fine, the court shall order the person fined to provide the Attorney General with a current mailing address for the entire period that any part of the fine remains unpaid. Failure to provide the Attorney General with a current address or a change in address shall be punishable as a contempt of court.

"(h) STAY OF FINE PENDING APPEALS.—Unless exceptional circumstances exist, if a sentence to pay a fine is stayed pending appeal, the court granting the stay shall include in such stay—

"(1) a requirement that the defendant, pending appeal, to deposit the entire fine amount, or the amount due under an installment schedule, during the pendency of an appeal, in an escrow account in the registry of the district court, or to give bond for the payment thereof; or

"(2) an order restraining the defendant from transferring or dissipating assets found to be sufficient, if sold, to meet the defendant's fine obligation.

"(1) DELINQUENT FINE.—A fine is delinquent if any portion of such fine is not paid within 30 days of when it is due, including any fines to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(j) DEFAULT.—A fine is in default if any portion of such fine is more than 90 days delinquent. When a criminal fine is in default, the entire amount is due within 30 days of notification of the default, notwithstanding any installment.

On page 129 strike out line 7 through line 4 on page 130 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"§ 3573. Modification or remission of fine

"(a) PETITION FOR MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—A defendant who has been sentenced to pay a fine, and who—

"(1) can show a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence and concerning whom the circumstances no longer exist that warranted the imposition of the fine in the amount imposed or payment by the installment schedule, may at any time petition the court for—

"(A) an extension of the installment schedule, not to exceed two years except in case of incarceration or special circumstances; or

"(B) a remission of all or part of the unpaid portion including interest and penalties; or

"(2) has voluntarily made restitution or reparation to the victim of the offense, may at any time petition the court for a remission of the unpaid portion of the fine in an amount not exceeding the amount of such restitution or reparation.

Any petition filed pursuant to this subsection shall be filed in the court in which sentence was originally imposed, unless that court transfers jurisdiction to another court. The petitioner shall notify the Attorney General that the petition has been filed within ten working days after filing. For the purposes of clause (1), unless exceptional circumstances exist, a person may be considered to have made a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence only after payment of a reasonable portion of the fine.

"(b) ORDER OF MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—If, after the filing of a petition as provided in subsection (a), the court finds that the circumstances warrant relief, the court may enter an appropriate order, in which case it shall provide the Attorney General with a copy of such order.

On page 141, between lines 13 and 14, insert the following:

"(g) keep informed concerning the conduct, condition, and compliance with any condition of probation, including the payment of a fine or restitution of each probationer under his supervision and report thereon to the court placing such person on probation and report to the court any failure of a probationer under his supervision to pay a fine in default within 30 days after notification that it is in default so that the court may determine whether probation should be revoked; and

On page 141, line 14, strike out "(g)" and insert in lieu thereof "(h)".

On page 145, after line 7, strike the item relating to section 3613, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"3613. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine.
"3614. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine.
"3615. Criminal default.

On page 145, strike out lines 16 through page 146, line 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) DISPOSITION OF PAYMENT.—The clerk shall forward each fine payment to the United States Treasury and shall notify the Attorney General of its receipt within 10 working days.

"(b) CERTIFICATION OF IMPOSITION.—If a fine exceeding $100 is imposed, modified, or remitted, the sentencing court shall incorporate in the order imposing, remitting, or modifying such fine, and promptly certify to the Attorney General—

"(1) the name of the person fined;

"(2) his current address;

"(3) the docket number of the case;

"(4) the amount of the fine imposed;

"(5) any installment schedule;

"(6) the nature of any modification or remission of the fine or installment schedule; and

"(7) the amount of the fine that is due and unpaid.

On page 146, line 12, strike out "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof "(c)".

On page 146, after line 18, add the following:

"(d) NOTIFICATION OF DELINQUENCY.—Within 10 working days after a fine is determined to be delinquent as provided in section 3572(i), the Attorney General shall notify the person whose fine is delinquent, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is delinquent.

"(e) NOTIFICATION OF DEFAULT.—Within 10 working days after a fine is determined to be in default as provided in section 3572(j), the Attorney General shall notify the person defaulting, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is in default and the entire unpaid balance, including interest and penalties, is due within 30 days.

"(f) INTEREST, MONETARY PENALTIES FOR DELINQUENCY, AND DEFAULT.—Upon a determination of willful nonpayment, the court may impose the following interest and monetary penalties:

"(1) INTEREST.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, interest at the rate of 1 per centum per month, or 12 per centum per year, shall be charged, beginning the 31st day after sentencing on the first day of each month during which any fine balance remains unpaid, including sums to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(2) MONETARY PENALTIES FOR DELINQUENT FINES.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a penalty sum equal to 10 per centum shall be charged for any portion of a criminal fine which has become delinquent. The Attorney General may waive all or part of the penalty for good cause.

On page 146, strike out line 19 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"§ 3613. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine

On page 149, after line 17 and before the subchapter heading insert the following:

"§ 3614. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine

"(a) RESENTENCING.—Subject to the provisions of subsection (b), if a defendant knowingly fails to pay a delinquent fine the court may resentence the defendant to any sentence which might originally have been imposed.

"(b) IMPRISONMENT.—The defendant may be sentenced to a term of imprisonment under subsection (a) only if the court determines that—

"(1) the defendant willfully refused to pay the delinquent fine or had failed to make sufficient bona fide efforts to pay the fine; or

"(2) in light of the nature of the offense and the characteristics of the person, alternatives to imprisonment are not adequate to serve the purposes of punishment and deterrence.

"3615. Criminal default

"Whoever, having been sentenced to pay a fine, willfully falls to pay the fine, shall be fined not more than twice the amount of the unpaid balance of the fine or $10,000, whichever is greater, imprisoned not more than one year, or both.".

On page 156, line 22, after the period insert the following: "No prisoner shall be released on supervision unless such prisoner agrees to adhere to an installment schedule, not to exceed two years except in special circumstances, to pay for any fine imposed for the offense committed by such prisoner.".

On page 210, line 15, strike "and".

On page 211, line 17, strike the period, and insert in lieu threof "; and".

On page 211, after line 17, insert the following:

On page 215, after line 20, insert the following:

SEC. 227. (a)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), for each criminal fine for which the unpaid balance exceeds $100 as of the effective date of this Act, the Attorney General shall, within 120 days, notify the person by certified mail of his obligation, within 30 days after notification, to—

(A) pay the fine in full;

(B) specify, and demonstrate compliance with, an installment schedule established by a court before enactment of the amendments made by this Act, specifying the dates on which designated partial payments will be made; or

(C) establish, with the concurrence of the Attorney General, a new installment schedule of a duration not exceeding two years, except in special circumstances, and specifying the dates on which designated partial payments will be made.

(2) This subsection shall not apply in cases in which—

(A) The Attorney General believes the likelihood of collection is remote; or

(B) criminal fines have been stayed pending appeal.

(b) The Attorney General shall, within 180 days after the effective date of this Act, declare all fines for which this obligation is unfulfilled to be in criminal default, subject to the civil and criminal remedies established by amendments made by this Act. No interest or monetary penalties shall be charged on any fines subject to this section.

(c) Not later than one year following the effective date of this Act, the Attorney General shall include in the annual crime report steps taken to implement this Act and the progress achieved in criminal fine collection, including collection data for each judicial district.

SEC. 228. (a) Title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding the following new chapter after chapter 227:

"CHAPTER 228—IMPOSITION, PAYMENT, AND COLLECTION OF FINES

"Sec.
"3591. Imposition of a fine.
"3592. Payment of a fine, delinquency and default.
"3593. Modification or remission of fine.
"3594. Certification and notification.
"3595. Interest, monetary penalties for delinquency, and default.
"3596. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine.
"3597. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine.
"3598. Statute of limitations.
"3599. Criminal default.

"§ 3591. Imposition of a fine

"(a) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED IN IMPOSING A FINE.—The court, in determining whether to impose a fine, the amount of any fine, the time for payment, and the method of payment, shall consider—

"(1) the ability of the defendant to pay the fine in view of the income of the defendant, earning capacity and financial resources, and, if the defendant is an organization, the size of the organization;

"(2) the nature of the burden that payment of the fine will impose on the defendant, and on any person who if financially dependent on the defendant, relative to the burden which alternative punishments would impose;

"(3) any restriction or reparation made by the defendant in connection with the offense and any obligation imposed upon the defendant to make such restitution or reparation;

"(4) if the defendant is an organization, any measure taken by the organization to discipline its employees or agents responsible for the offense or to insure against a recurrence of such an offense; and

"(5) any other pertinent consideration.

"(b) EFFECT OF FINALITY OF JUDGMENT.—Notwithstanding the fact that a sentence to pay a fine can subsequently be—

"(1) modified or remitted pursuant to the provisions of section 3592;

"(2) corrected pursuant to the provisions of rule 35; or

"(3) appealed;

a judgment of conviction that includes such a sentence constitutes a final judgment for all other purposes.

"§ 3592. Payment of a fine, delinquency and default

"(a) TIME AND METHOD OF PAYMENT.—Payment of a fine is due immediately unless the court, at the time of sentencing—

"(1) requires payment by a date certain; or

"(2) establishes an installment schedule, the specific terms of which shall be fixed by the court.

"(b) INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITIES FOR PAYMENT.—If a fine is imposed on an organization, it is the duty of each individual authorized to make disbursement of the assets of the organizations to pay the fine from assets of the organization. If a fine is imposed on an agent or shareholder of an organization, the fine shall not be paid, directly or indirectly, out of the assets of the organization, unless the court finds that such payment is expressly permissible under applicable State law.

"(c) RESPONSIBILITY TO PROVIDE CURRENT ADDRESS.—At the time of imposition of the fine, the court shall order the person fined to provide the Attorney General with a current mailing address for the entire period that any part of the fine remains unpaid. Failure to provide the Attorney General with a current address or a change in address shall be punishable as a contempt of court.

"(d) STAY OF FINE PENDING APPEAL.—Unless exceptional circumstances exist, if a sentence to pay a fine is stayed pending appeal, the court granting the stay shall include in such stay-

"(1) a requirement that the defendant, pending appeal, to deposit the entire fine amount, or the amount due under an installment schedule, during the pendency of an appeal, in an escrow account in the registry of the district court, or to give bond for the payment thereof; or

"(2) an order restraining the defendant from transferring or dissipating assets found to be sufficient, if sold, to meet the defendant's fine obligation.

"(e) DELINQUENT FINE.—A fine is delinquent if any portion of such fine is not paid within 30 days of when it is due, including any fines to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(f) DEFAULT.—A fine is in default if any portion of such fine is more than 90 days delinquent. When a criminal fine is in default, the entire amount is due within 30 days of notification of the default, notwithstanding any installment schedule.

"§ 3593. Modification of remission of fine

"(a) PETITION FOR MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—A person who has been sentenced to pay a fine, and who—

"(1) can show a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence and concerning whom the circumstances no longer exist that warranted the imposition of the fine in the amount imposed or payment by the installment schedule, may at any time petition the court for—

"(A) an extension of the installment schedule, not to exceed two years except in case of incarceration or special circumstances; or

"(B) a remission of all or part of the unpaid portion including interest and penalties; or

"(2) has voluntarily made restitution or reparation to the victim of the offense, may at any time petition the court for a remission of the unpaid portion of the fine in an amount not exceeding the amount of such restitution or reparation.

Any petition filed pursuant to this subsection shall be filed in the court in which sentence was originally imposed, unless that court transfers jurisdiction to another court. The petitioner shall notify the Attorney General that the petition has been filed within ten working days after filing. For the purposes of clause (1), unless exceptional circumstances exist, a person may be considered to have made a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence only after payment of a reasonable portion of the fine.

"(b) ORDER OF MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—If, after the filing of a petition as provided in subsection (a), the court finds that the circumstances warrant relief, the court may enter an appropriate order, in which case it shall provide the Attorney General with a copy of such order.

"§ 3594. Certification and notification

"(a) DISPOSITION OF PAYMENT.—The clerk shall forward each fine payment to the United States Treasury and shall notify the Attorney General of its receipt within 10 working days.

"(b) CERTIFICATION OF IMPOSITION.—If a fine exceeding $100 is imposed, modified, or remitted, the sentencing court shall incorporate in the order imposing, remitting, and modifying such fine, and promptly certify to the Attorney General—

"(1) the name of the person fined;

"(2) his current address;

"(3) the docket number of the case;

"(4) the amount of the fine imposed;

"(5) any installment schedule;

"(6) the nature of any modification or remission of the fine or installment schedule; and

"(7) the amount of the fine that is due and unpaid.

"(c) RESPONSIBILITY FOR COLLECTION.—The Attorney General shall be responsible for collection of an unpaid fine concerning which a certification has been issued as provided in subsection (a).

"(d) NOTIFICATION OF DELINQUENCY.—Within 10 working days after a fine is determined to be delinquent as provided in section 3592(e), the Attorney General shall notify the person whose fine is delinquent, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is delinquent.

"(e) NOTIFICATION OF DEFAULT.—Within 10 working days after a fine is determined to be in default as provided in section 3592(f), the Attorney General shall notify the person defaulting, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is in default and the entire unpaid balance, including interest and penalties, is due within 30 days.

"§ 3595. Interest, monetary penalties for delinquency, and default

"Upon a determination of willful nonpayment, the court may impose the following interest and monetary penalties:

"(1) INTEREST.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, interest at the rate of 1 per centum per month, or 12 per centum per year, shall be charged, beginning the 31st day after sentencing on the first day of each month during which any fine balance remains unpaid, including sums to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(2) MONETARY PENALTIES FOR DELINQUENT FINES.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a penalty sum equal to 10 per centum shall be charged for any portion of a criminal fine which has become delinquent. The Attorney General may waive all or part of the penalty for good cause.

"§ 3596. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine

"(a) LIEN.—A fine imposed as a sentence is a lien in favor of the United States upon all property belonging to the person fined. The lien arises at the time of the entry of the judgment and continues until the liability is satisfied, remitted, or set aside, or until it becomes unenforceable pursuant to the provisions of subsection (b). On application of the person fined, the Attorney General shall—

"(1) issue a certificate of release, as described in section 6325 of the Internal Revenue Code, of any lien imposed pursuant to this section, upon his acceptance of a bond described in section 6325(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code; or

"(2) issue a certificate of discharge, as described in section 6325 of the Internal Revenue Code, of any part of the person's property subject to a lien imposed pursuant to this section, upon his determination that the fair market value of that part of such property remaining subject to and available to satisfy the lien is at least three times the amount of the fine.

"(b) EXPIRATION OF LIEN.—A lien becomes unenforceable at the time liability to pay a fine expires as provided in section 3598.

"(c) APPLICATION OF OTHER LIEN PROVISIONS.—The provisions of sections 6323, 6331, 6334 through 6336, 6337(a), 6338 through 6343, 6901, 7402, 7403, 7424 through 7426, 7505(a), 7506, 7701, and 7805 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6323, 6331, 6332, 6334 through 6336, 6337(a), 6338 through 6343, 6901, 7402, 7403, 7424 through 7426, 7505(a), 7506, 7701, and 7805) and of section 513 of the Act of October 17, 1940 (54 Stat. 1190), apply to a fine and to the lien imposed by subsection (a) as if the liability of the person fined were for an internal revenue tax assessment, except to the extent that the application of such statutes is modified by regulations issued by the Attorney General to accord with differences in the nature of the liabilities. For the purposes of this subsection, references in the preceding sections of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to 'the Secretary' shall be construed to mean 'the Attorney General,' and references in those sections to 'tax' shall be construed to mean 'fine'.

"(d) EFFECT ON NOTICE OF LIEN.—A notice of the lien imposed by subsection (a) shall be considered a notice of lien for taxes payable to the United States for the purposes of any State or local law providing for the filing of a notice of a tax lien. The registration, recording, docketing, or indexing, in accordance with 20 U.S.C. 1962, of the judgment under which a fine is imposed shall be considered for all purposes as the filing prescribed by section 6323(f)(1)(A) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6323(f)(1)(A)) and by subsection (c).

"(e) ALTERNATIVE ENFORCEMENT.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, a judgment imposing a fine may be enforced by execution against the property of the person fined in like manner as judgments in civil cases.

"(f) DISCHARGE OF DEBTS INAPPLICABLE.—No discharge of debts pursuant to a bankruptcy proceeding shall render a lien under this section unenforceable or discharge liability to pay a fine.

"§3597. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine

"(a) RESENTENCING.—Subject to the provisions of subsection (b), if a person knowingly fails to pay a delinquent fine the court may resentence the person to any sentence which might originally have been imposed.

"(b) IMPRISONMENT.—The defendant may be sentenced to a term of imprisonment under subsection (a) only if the court determines that—

"(1) the person willfully refused to pay the delinquent fine or had failed to make sufficient bona fide efforts to pay the fine; or

"(2) in light of the nature of the offense and the characteristics of the person, alternatives to imprisonment are not adequate to serve the purposes of punishment and deterrence.

"§ 3598. Statute of limitations

"(a) Liability to pay a fine expires—

"(1) 20 years after the entry of the judgment;

"(2) upon the death of the person fined.

"(b) The period set forth in subsection (a) may be extended, prior to its expiration, by a written agreement between the person fined and the Attorney General. The running of the period set forth in subsection (a) is suspended during any interval for which the running of the period of limitations for collection of a tax would be suspended pursuant to section 6503(b), 6503(c), 6503(f), 6503(i), or 7508(a)(1)(I) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6503(b), 6503(c), 6503(f), 6503(i), or 7508(a)(1)(I)), or section 513 of the Act of October 17, 1940 (54 Stat. 1190).

"§ 3599. Criminal default

"Whoever, having been sentenced to pay a fine, willfully fails to pay the fine, shall be fined not more than twice the amount of the unpaid balance of the fine or $10,000, whichever is greater, imprisoned not more than one year, or both.".

(b) Section 3651 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting after "May be required to provide for the support of any persons, for whose support he is legally responsible." the following new paragraph:

"If the court has imposed and ordered execution of a fine and placed the defendant on probation, payment of the fine or adherence to the court-established installment schedule shall be a condition of the probation.".

(c) Section 3651 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out the last paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"The defendant's liability for any unexecuted fine or other punishment imposed as to which probation is granted, shall be fully discharged by the fulfillment of the terms and conditions of probation.".

(d) The second paragraph of section 3655 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"He shall keep informed concerning the account, condition, and compliance with any condition of probation, including the payment of a fine or restitution of each probationer under his supervision, and shall report thereon to the court placing such person on probation. He shall report to the court any failure of a probationer under his supervision to pay a fine in default within 30 days after notification that it is in default so that the court may determine whether probation should be revoked.".

(e) Section 4209 of title 18, United States Code, is amended in subsection (a) by striking out the period at the end of the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "and, in a case involving a criminal fine that has not already been paid, that the parolee pay or agree to adhere to an installment schedule, not to exceed 2 years except in special circumstances, to pay for any fine imposed for the offense.".

(f) Subsection (b)(1) of section 4214 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after "parole" the following: "or a failure to pay a fine in default within 30 days after notification that it is in default".

(g)(1) Section 3565 of title 18, United States Code, is repealed.

(2) The table of sections for chapter 227 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out the item for section 3565 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"3565. Repealed.".

(h) Section 3569 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) striking out "(a)"; and

(2) striking out subsection (b).

(i) This section shall be repealed on the first day of the first calendar month beginning 24 months after the date of enactment of this Act.

At the appropriate place in the bill, add the following:

SEC. 27. Since, due to an impending crisis in prison overcrowding, available Federal prison space must be treated as a scarce resource in the sentencing of criminal defendants:

Since, sentencing decisions should be designed to insure that prison resources are, first and foremost, reserved for those violent and serious criminal offenders who pose the most dangerous threat to society;

Since, in cases of non-violent and non-serious offenders, the interests of society as a whole as well as individual victims of crime can continue to be served through the imposition of alternative sentences, such as restitution and community service;

Since, in the two years preceding the enactment of sentencing guidelines, federal sentencing practice should insure that scarce prison resources are available to house violent and serious criminal offenders by the increased use of restitution, community service, and other alternative sentences in cases of nonviolent and nonserious offenders: Now, therefore, be it

Declared, that it is the sense of the Senate that in the two years preceding the enactment of the sentencing guidelines, federal judges, in determining the particular sentence to be imposed, consider—

(1) the nature and circumstances of the offense and the history and characteristics of the defendant;

(2) the general appropriateness of imposing a sentence other than imprisonment in cases in which the defendant has not been convicted of a crime of violence or otherwise serious offense; and

(3) the general appropriateness of imposing a sentence of imprisonment in cases in which the defendant has been convicted of a crime of violence or otherwise serious offense.●

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this amendment consists of those amendments which the Senate adopted to title II of S. 1762, the sentencing title of the bill. With the adoption of this amendment, S. 668 will be identical to title II of S. 1762 as passed by the Senate. I know of no objection to this amendment, and I urge its adoption by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2693) was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I want to express my very deep sense of appreciation to the chairman of the committee Mr. THURMOND for his cooperation and his help and support through the long period of time that the Judiciary Committee has considered this legislation; for the cooperation of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Criminal Law Mr. LAXALT; and particularly the cooperation of the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) who has had a long history in sentencing reform.

I am aware also of the deep and strong feelings of the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), who has addressed sentencing reform in the committee and on the floor in previous debate on this sentencing reform legislation. I am sure he would have the same views on this separate bill. He has cooperated with us so at least we would have the opportunity to vote on this measure, and I appreciate that. I hope the Senate can now proceed to a vote.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I believe the Senate has just adopted the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay it on the table, Mr. President.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments to be proposed? If not, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am going to suggest the absence of a quorum so Senators will know the rollcall is occurring. Perhaps we shall not need to hold the vote so long if the Senators hear the rollcall and know what it is about.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do not anticipate another rollcall vote after this one. This will be the last one today.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. President, there will be a rollcall immediately following the quorum call, as far as I can ascertain. I hope the cloakrooms will so inform Senators. I do not expect the quorum call will go very long, unless there is an objection to my calling it off. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on final passage of the bill. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), and the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT) would vote "yea".

Mr. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), and the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 85, nays 3, as follows:

So the bill (S. 668), as amended, was passed, as follows:

S. 668

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Sentencing Reform Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) Title 18 of the United States Code is amended by—

(1) redesignating sections 3577, 3578, 3579, 3580, 3611, 3612, 3615, 3617, 3618, 3619, 3620, and 3656 as sections 3661, 3662, 3663, 3664, 3665, 3666, 3667, 3668, 3669, 3670, 3671, and 3672 of a new chapter 232 of title 18 of the United States Code, respectively;

(2) repealing chapters 227, 229, and 231 and substituting the following new chapters:

"CHAPTER 227—SENTENCES

"Subchapter
"A. General Provisions 3551
"B. Probation 3561
"C. Fines 3571
"D. Imprisonment 3581

"SUBCHAPTER A—GENERAL PROVISIONS

"Sec.
"3551. Authorized sentences.
"3552. Presentence reports.
"3553. Imposition of a sentence.
"3554. Order of criminal forfeiture.
"3555. Order of notice to victims.
"3556. Order of restitution.
"3557. Review of a sentence.
"3558. Implementation of a sentence.
"3559. Sentencing classification of offenses.

"SUBCHAPTER A—GENERAL PROVISIONS

"§ 3551. Authorized sentences

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as otherwise specifically provided, a defendant who has been found guilty of an offense described in any Federal statute, other than an Act of Congress applicable exclusively in the District of Columbia or the Uniform Code of Military Justice, shall be sentenced in accordance with the provisions of this chapter so as to achieve the purposes set forth in subparagraphs (A) through (D) of section 3553(a)(2) to the extent that they are applicable in light of all the circumstances of the case.

"(b) INDIVIDUALS.—An individual found guilty of an offense shall be sentenced, in accordance with the provisions of section 3553, to—

"(1) a term of probation as authorized by subchapter B;

"(2) a fine as authorized by subchapter C; or

"(3) a term of imprisonment as authorized by subchapter D.

A sentence to pay a fine may be imposed in addition to any other sentence. A sanction authorized by section 3554, 3555, or 3556 may be imposed in addition to the sentence required by this subsection.

"(c) ORGANIZATIONS.—An organization found guilty of an offense shall be sentenced, in accordance with the provisions of section 3553, to—

"(1) a term of probation as authorized by subchapter B; or

"(2) a fine as authorized by subchapter C.

A sentence to pay a fine may be imposed in addition to a sentence to probation. A sanction authorized by section 3554, 3555, or 3556 may be imposed in addition to the sentence required by this subsection.

"§ 3552. Presentence reports

"(a) PRESENTENCE INVESTIGATION AND REPORT BY PROBATION OFFICER.—A United States probation officer shall make a presentence investigation of a defendant that is required pursuant to the provisions of Rule 32(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and shall, before the imposition of sentence, report the results of the investigation to the court.

"(b) PRESENTENCE STUDY AND REPORT BY BUREAU OF PRISONS.—If the court, before or after its receipt of a report specified in subsection (a) or (c), desires more information than is otherwise available to it as a basis for determining the sentence to be imposed on a defendant found guilty of a misdemeanor or felony, it may order a study of the defendant. The study shall be conducted in the local community by qualified consultants unless the sentencing judge finds that there is a compelling reason for the study to be done by the Bureau of Prisons or there are no adequate professional resources available in the local community to perform the study. The period of the study shall take no more than sixty days. The order shall specify the additional information that the court needs before determining the sentence to be imposed. Such an order shall be treated for administrative purposes as a provisional sentence of imprisonment for the maximum term authorized by section 3581(b) for the offense committed. The study shall inquire into such matters as are specified by the court and any other matters that the Bureau of Prisons or the professional consultants believe are pertinent to the factors set forth in section 3553(a). The period of the study may, in the discretion of the court, be extended for an additional period of not more than sixty days. By the expiration of the period of the study, or by the expiration of any extension granted by the court, the United States marshal shall return the defendant to the court for final sentencing. The Bureau of Prisons or the professional consultants shall provide the court with a written report of the pertinent results of the study and make to the court whatever recommendations the Bureau or the consultants believe will be helpful to a proper resolution of the case. The report shall include recommendations of the Bureau or the consultants concerning the guidelines and policy statements, promulgated by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a), that they believe are applicable to the defendant's case. After receiving the report and the recommendations, the court shall proceed finally to sentence the defendant in accordance with the sentencing alternatives and procedures available under this chapter.

"(c) PRESENTENCE EXAMINATION AND REPORT BY PSYCHIATRIC OR PSYCHOLOGICAL EXAMINERS.—If the court, before or after its receipt of a report specified in subsection (a) or (b) desires more information than is otherwise available to it as a basis for determining the mental condition of the defendant, it may order that the defendant undergo a psychiatric or psychological examination and that the court be provided with a written report of the results of the examination pursuant to the provisions of section 4247.

"(d) DISCLOSURE OF PRESENTENCE REPORTS.—The court shall assure that a report filed pursuant to this section is disclosed to the defendant, the counsel for the defendant, and the attorney for the Government at least ten days prior to the date set for sentencing, unless this minimum period is waived by the defendant.

"§ 3553. Imposition of a sentence

"(a) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED IN IMPOSING A SENTENCE.—The court, in determining the particular sentence to be imposed, shall consider—

"(1) the nature and circumstances of the offense and the history and characteristics of the defendant;

"(2) the need for the sentenced imposed—

"(A) to reflect the seriousness of the offense, to promote respect for the law, and to provide just punishment for the offense;

"(B) to afford adequate deterrence to criminal conduct;

"(C) to protect the public from further crimes of the defendant; and

"(D) to provide the defendant with needed educational or vocational training, medical care, or other correctional treatment in the most effective manner;

"(3) the kinds of sentences available;

"(4) the kinds of sentence and the sentencing range established for the applicable category of offense committed by the applicable category of defendant as set forth in the guidelines that are issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a)(1) and that are in effect on the date the defendant is sentenced;

"(5) any pertinent policy statement issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a)(2) that is in effect on the date the defendant is sentenced; and

"(6) the need to avoid unwarranted sentence disparities among defendants with similar records who have been found guilty of similar conduct.

"(b) APPLICATION OF GUIDELINES IN IMPOSING A SENTENCE.—The court shall impose a sentence of the kind, and within the range, referred to in subsection (a)(4) unless the court finds that an aggravating or mitigating circumstance exists that was not adequately taken into consideration by the Sentencing Commission in formulating the guidelines and that should result in a sentence different from that described.

"(c) STATEMENT OF REASONS FOR IMPOSING A SENTENCE.—The court, at the time of sentencing, shall state in open court the reasons for its imposition of the particular sentence, and, if the sentence—

"(1) is of the kind, and within the range, described in subsection (a)(4), the reason for imposing a sentence at a particular point within the range; or

"(2) is not of the kind, or is outside the range, described in subsection (a)(4), the specific reason for the imposition of a sentence different from that described.

If the sentence does not include an order of restitution, the court shall include in the statement the reason therefor. The clerk of the court shall provide a transcription of the court's statement of reasons to the Probation System, and, if the sentence includes a term of imprisonment, to the Bureau of Prisons.

"(d) PRESENTENCE PROCEDURE FOR AN ORDER OF NOTICE OR RESTITUTION.—Prior to imposing an order of notice pursuant to section 3555, or an order of restitution pursuant to section 3556, the court shall give notice to the defendant and the Government that it is considering imposing such an order. Upon motion of the defendant or the Government, or on its own motion, the court shall—

"(1) permit the defendant and the Government to submit affidavits and written memoranda addressing matters relevant to the imposition of such an order;

"(2) afford counsel an opportunity in open court to address orally the appropriateness of the imposition of such an order; and

"(3) include in its statement of reasons pursuant to subsection (c) specific reasons underlying its determinations regarding the nature of such an order.

Upon motion of the defendant or the Government, or on its own motion, the court may in its discretion employ any additional procedures that it concludes will not unduly complicate or prolong the sentencing process.

"§ 3554. Order of criminal forfeiture

"The court, in imposing a sentence on a defendant who has been found guilty of an offense described in section 1962 of this title or in title II or III of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 shall order, in addition to the sentence that is imposed pursuant to the provisions of section 3551, that the defendant forfeit property to the United States in accordance with the provisions of section 1963 of this title or section 413 of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse and Control Act of 1970.

"§ 3555. Order of notice to victims

"The court, in imposing a sentence on a defendant who has been found guilty of an offense involving fraud or other intentionally deceptive practices, may order, in addition to the sentence that is imposed pursuant to the provisions of section 3551, that the defendant give reasonable notice and explanation of the conviction, in such form as the court may approve, to the victims of the offense. The notice may be ordered to be given by mail, by advertising in designated areas or through designated media, or by other appropriate means. In determining whether to require the defendant to give such notice, the court shall consider the factors set forth in section 3553(a) to the extent that they are applicable and shall consider the cost involved in giving the notice as it relates to the loss caused by the offense, and shall not require the defendant to bear the costs of notice in excess of $20,000.

"The court, in imposing a sentence on a defendant who has been found guilty of an offense under this title, or an offense under section 902 (h), (i), (j), or (n) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1472), may order, in addition to the sentence that is imposed pursuant to the provisions of section 3551, that the defendant make restitution to any victim of the offense in accordance with the provisions of sections 3663 and 3664.

"§ 3557. Review of a sentence

"The review of a sentence imposed pursuant to section 3551 is governed by the provisions of section 3742.

"§ 3558. Implementation of a sentence

"The implementation of a sentence imposed pursuant to section 3551 is governed by the provisions of chapter 229.

"§ 3559. Sentencing classification of offenses

"(a) CLASSIFICATION.—An offense that is not specifically classified by a letter grade in the section defining it, is classified—

"(1) if the maximum term of imprisonment authorized is—

"(A) life imprisonment, or if the maximum penalty is death, as a Class A felony;

"(B) twenty years or more, as a Class B felony;

"(C) less than twenty years but ten or more years, as a Class C felony;

"(D) less than ten years but five or more years, as a Class D felony;

"(E) less than five years but more than one year, as a Class E felony;

"(F) one year or less but more than six months, as a Class A misdemeanor;

"(G) six months or less but more than thirty days, as a Class B misdemeanor;

"(H) thirty days or less but more than five days, as a Class C misdemeanor; or

"(I) five days or less, or if no imprisonment is authorized, as an infraction.

"(b) EFFECT OF CLASSIFICATION.—An offense classified under subsection (a) carries all the incidents assigned to the applicable letter designation except that:

"(1) the maximum fine that may be imposed is the fine authorized by the statute describing the offense, or by this chapter, whichever is the greater; and

"(2) the maximum term of imprisonment is the term authorized by the statute describing the offense.

"SUBCHAPTER B—PROBATION

"Sec.
"3561. Sentence of probation.
"3562. Imposition of a sentence of probation.
"3563. Conditions of probation.
"3564. Running of a term of probation.
"3565. Revocation of probation.
"3566. Implementation of a sentence of probation.

"SUBCHAPTER B—PROBATION

"§ 3561. Sentence of probation

"(a) IN GENERAL.—A defendant who has been found guilty of an offense may be sentenced to a term of probation unless—

"(1) the offense is a Class A or Class B felony;

"(2) the offense is an offense for which probation has been expressly precluded; or

"(3) the defendant is sentenced at the same time to a term of imprisonment for the same or a different offense.

The liability of a defendant for any unexecuted fine or other punishment imposed as to which probation is granted shall be fully discharged by the fulfillment of the terms and conditions of probation.

"(b) AUTHORIZED TERMS.—The authorized terms of probation are—

"(1) for a felony, not less than one nor more than five years;

"(2) for a misdemeanor, not more than five years; and

"(3) for an infraction, not more than one year.

"§ 3562. Imposition of a sentence of probation

"(a) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED IN IMPOSING A TERM OF PROBATION.—The court, in determining whether to impose a term of probation, and, if a term of probation is to be imposed, in determining the length of the term and the conditions of probation, shall consider the factors set forth in section 3553(a) to the extent that they are applicable.

"(b) EFFECT OF FINALITY OF JUDGMENT.—Notwithstanding the fact that a sentence of probation can subsequently be—

"(1) modified or revoked pursuant to the provisions of section 3564 or 3565;

"(2) corrected pursuant to the provisions of rule 35 and section 3742; or

"(3) appealed and modified, if outside the guideline range, pursuant to the provisions of section 3742;

a judgment of conviction that includes such a sentence constitutes a final judgment for all other purposes.

"§ 3563. Conditions of probation

"(a) MANDATORY CONDITIONS.—The court shall provide, as an explicit condition of a sentence of probation—

"(1) for a felony, a misdemeanor, or an infraction, that the defendant not commit another Federal, State, or local crime during the term of probation; and

"(2) for a felony, that the defendant also abide by at least one condition set forth in subsection (b)(2), (b)(3), or (b)(13).

If the court has imposed and ordered execution of a fine and placed the defendant on probation, payment of the fine or adherence to the court-established installment schedule shall be a condition of the probation.

"(b) DISCRETIONARY CONDITIONS.—The court may provide, as further conditions of a sentence of probation, to the extent that such conditions are reasonably related to the factors set forth in section 3553 (a)(1) and (a)(2) and to the extent that such conditions involve only such deprivations of liberty or property as are reasonably necessary for the purposes indicated in section 3553(a)(2), that the defendant—

"(1) support his dependents and meet other family responsibilities;

"(2) pay a fine imposed pursuant to the provisions of subchapter C;

"(3) make restitution to a victim of the offense pursuant to the provisions of section 3556;

"(4) give to the victims of the offense the notice ordered pursuant to the provisions of section 3555;

"(5) work conscientiously at suitable employment or pursue conscientiously a course of study or vocational training that will equip him for suitable employment;

"(6) refrain, in the case of an individual, from engaging in a specified occupation, business, or profession bearing a reasonably direct relationship to the conduct constituting the offense, or engage in such a specified occupation, business, or profession only to a stated degree or under stated circumstances;

"(7) refrain from frequenting specified kinds of places or from associating unnecessarily with specified persons;

"(8) refrain from excessive use of alcohol, or any use of a narcotic drug or other controlled substance, as defined in section 102 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 802), without a prescription by a licensed medical practitioner;

"(9) refrain from possessing a firearm, destructive device, or other dangerous weapon;

"(10) undergo available medical, psychiatric, or psychological treatment, including treatment for drug or alcohol dependency, as specified by the court, and remain in a specified institution if required for that purpose;

"(11) remain in the custody of the Bureau of Prisons during nights, weekends, or other intervals of time, totaling no more than the lesser of one year or the term of imprisonment authorized for the offense in section 3581(b), during the first year of the term of probation;

"(12) reside at, or participate in the program of, a community corrections facility for all or part of the term of probation;

"(13) work in community service as directed by the court;

"(14) reside in a specified place or area, or refrain from residing in a specified place or area;

"(15) remain within the jurisdiction of the court, unless granted permission to leave by the court or a probation officer;

"(16) report to a probation officer as directed by the court or the probation officer;

"(17) permit a probation officer to visit him at his home or elsewhere as specified by the court;

"(18) answer inquiries by a probation officer and notify the probation officer promptly of any change in address or employment;

"(19) notify the probation officer promptly if arrested or questioned by a law enforcement officer; or

"(20) satisfy such other conditions as the court may impose.

"(c) MODIFICATIONS OF CONDITIONS.—The court may, after a hearing, modify, reduce, or enlarge the conditions of a sentence of probation at any time prior to the expiration or termination of the term of probation, pursuant to the provisions applicable to the initial setting of the conditions of probation.

"(d) WRITTEN STATEMENT OF CONDITIONS.—The court shall direct that the probation officer provide the defendant with a written statement that sets forth all the conditions to which the sentence is subject, and that is sufficiently clear and specific to serve as a guide for the defendant's conduct and for such supervision as is required.

"§ 3564. Running of a term of probation

"(a) COMMENCEMENT.—A term of probation commences on the day that the sentence of probation is imposed, unless otherwise ordered by the court.

"(b) CONCURRENCE WITH OTHER SENTENCES.—Multiple terms of probation, whether imposed at the same time or at different times, run concurrently with each other. A term of probation runs concurrently with any Federal, State, or local term of probation, or supervised release, or parole for another offense to which the defendant is subject or becomes subject during the term of probation, except that it does not run during any period in which the defendant is imprisoned for a period of at least 30 consecutive days in connection with a conviction for a Federal, State, or local crime.

"(c) EARLY TERMINATION.—The court, after considering the factors set forth in section 3553(a) to the extent that they are applicable, may terminate a term of probation previously ordered and discharge the defendant at any time in the case of a misdemeanor or an infraction or at any time after the expiration of one year of probation in the case of a felony, if it is satisfied that such action is warranted by the conduct of the defendant and the interest of justice.

"(d) EXTENSION.—The court may, after a hearing, extend a term of probation, if less than the maximum authorized term was previously imposed, at any time prior to the expiration or termination of the term of probation, pursuant to the provisions applicable to the initial setting of the term of probation.

"(e) SUBJECT TO REVOCATION.— A sentence of probation remains conditional and subject to revocation until its expiration or termination.

"§ 3565. Revocation of probation

"(a) CONTINUATION OR REVOCATION.—If the defendant violates a condition of probation at any time prior to the expiration or termination of the term of probation, the court may, after a hearing pursuant to Rule 32.1 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and after considering the factors set forth in section 3553(a) to the extent that they are applicable—

"(1) continue him on probation, with or without extending the term of modifying or enlarging the conditions; or

"(2) revoke the sentence of probation and impose any other sentence that was available under subchapter A at the time of the initial sentencing.

"(b) DELAYED REVOCATION.—The power of the court to revoke a sentence of probation for violation of a condition of probation, and to impose another sentence, extends beyond the expiration of the term of probation for any period reasonably necessary for the adjudication of matters arising before its expiration if, prior to its expiration, a warrant or summons has been issued on the basis of an allegation of such a violation.

"§ 3566. Implementation of a sentence of probation

"The implementation of a sentence of probation is governed by the provisions of subchapter A of chapter 229.

"SUBCHAPTER C—FINES

"Sec.
"3571. Sentence of fine.
"3572. Imposition of a sentence of fine.
"3573. Modification or remission of fine.
"3574. Implementation of a sentence of fine.

"SUBCHAPTER C—FINES

"§ 3571. Sentence of fine

"(a) IN GENERAL.—A defendant who has been found guilty of an offense may be sentenced to pay a fine.

"(b) AUTHORIZED FINES.—Except as otherwise provided in this chapter, the authorized fines are—

"(1) if the defendant is an individual—

"(A) for a felony, or for a misdemeanor resulting in the loss of human life, not more than $250,000;

"(B) for any other misdemeanor, not more than $25,000; and

"(C) for an infraction, not more than $1,000; and

"(2) if the defendant is an organization—

"(A) for a felony, or for a misdemeanor resulting in the loss of human life, not more than $500,000;

"(B) for any other misdemeanor, not more than $100,000; and

"(C) for an infraction, not more than $10,000.

"§ 3572. Imposition of a sentence of fine

"(a) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED IN IMPOSING FINE.—The court, in determining whether to impose a fine, and, if a fine is to be imposed, in determining the amount of the fine, the time for payment, and the method of payment, shall consider—

"(1) the factors set forth in section 3553(a), to the extent they are applicable, including, with regard to the characteristics of the defendant under section 3553(a), the ability of the defendant to pay the fine in view of the defendant's income, earning capacity, and financial resources and, if the defendant is an organization, the size of the organization;

"(2) the nature of the burden that payment of the fine will impose on the defendant, and on any person who is financially dependent upon the defendant, relative to the burden which alternative punishments would impose;

"(3) any restitution or reparation made by the defendant to the victim of the offense, and any obligation imposed upon the defendant to make such restitution or reparation to the victim of the offense;

"(4) if the defendant is an organization, any measure taken by the organization to discipline its employees or agents responsible for the offense or to insure against a recurrence of such an offense; and

"(5) any other pertinent equitable consideration.

"(b) LIMIT ON AGGREGATE OF MULTIPLE FINES.—Except as otherwise expressly provided, the aggregate of fines that a court may impose on a defendant at the same time for different offenses that arise from a common scheme or plan, and that do not cause separable or distinguishable kinds of harm or damage, is twice the amount imposable for the most serious offense.

"(c) EFFECT OF FINALITY OF JUDGMENT.—Notwithstanding the fact that a sentence to pay a fine can subsequently be—

"(1) modified or remitted pursuant to the provisions of section 3573;

"(2) corrected pursuant to the provisions of rule 35 and section 3742; or

"(3) appealed and modified, if outside the guideline range, pursuant to the provisions of section 3742;

a judgment of conviction that includes such a sentence constitutes a final judgment for all other purposes.

"(d) TIME AND METHOD OF PAYMENT.—Payment of a fine is due immediately unless the court, at the time of sentencing—

"(1) requires payment by a date certain; or

"(2) establishes an installment schedule, the specific terms of which shall be fixed by the court.

"(e) ALTERNATIVE SENTENCE PRECLUDED.—At the time a defendant is sentenced to pay a fine, the court may not impose an alternative sentence to be served in the event that the fine is not paid.

"(f) INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR PAYMENT.—If a fine is imposed on an organization, it is the duty of each individual authorized to make disbursement of the assets of the organization to pay the fine from assets of the organization. If a fine is imposed on an agent or shareholder of an organization, the fine shall not be paid, directly or indirectly, out of the assets of the organization, unless the court finds that such payment is expressly permissible under applicable State law.

"(g) RESPONSIBILITY TO PROVIDE CURRENT ADDRESS.—At the time of imposition of the fine, the court shall order the person fined to provide the Attorney General with a current mailing address for the entire period that any part of the fine remains unpaid. Failure to provide the Attorney General with a current address or a change in address shall be punishable as a contempt of court.

"(h) STAY OF FINE PENDING APPEALS.—Unless exceptional circumstances exist, if a sentence to pay a fine is stayed pending appeal, the court granting the stay shall include in such stay—

"(1) a requirement that the defendant, pending appeal, to deposit the entire fine amount, or the amount due under an installment schedule, during the pendency of an appeal, in an escrow account in the registry of the district court, or to give bond for the payment thereof; or

"(2) an order restraining the defendant from transferring or dissipating assets found to be sufficient, if sold, to meet the defendant's fine obligation.

"(i) DELINQUENT FINE.—A fine is delinquent if any portion of such fine is not paid within thirty days of when it is due, including any fines to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(j) DEFAULT.—A fine is in default if any portion of such fine is more than ninety days delinquent. When a criminal fine is in default, the entire amount is due within 30 days of notification of the default, notwithstanding any installment schedule.

"S. 3573. Modification or remission of fine

"(a) PETITION FOR MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—A defendant who has been sentenced to pay a fine, and who—

"(1) can show a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence and concerning whom the circumstances no longer exist that warranted the imposition of the fine in the amount imposed or payment by the installment schedule, may at any time petition the court for—

"(A) an extension of the installment schedule, not to exceed two years except in case of incarceration or special circumstances; or

"(B) a remission of all or part of the unpaid portion including interest and penalties; or

"(2) has voluntarily made restitution or reparation to the victim of the offense, may at any time petition the court for a remission of the unpaid portion of the fine in an amount not exceeding the amount of such restitution or reparation.

Any petition filed pursuant to this subsection shall be filed in the court in which sentence was orginally imposed, unless that court transfers jurisdiction to another court. The petitioner shall notify the Attorney General that the petition has been filed within ten working days after filing. For the purposes of clause (1), unless exceptional circumstances exist, a person may be considered to have made a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence only after payment of a reasonable portion of the fine.

"(b) ORDER OF MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—If, after the filing of a petition as provided in subsection (a), the court finds that the circumstances warrant relief, the court may enter an appropriate order, in which case it shall provide the Attorney General with a copy of such order.

"§ 3574. Implementation of a sentence of fine

"The implementation of a sentence to pay a fine is governed by the provisions of subchapter B of chapter 229.

"3581. Sentence of imprisonment.
"3582. Imposition of a sentence of imprisonment.
"3583. Inclusion of a term of supervised release after imprisonment.
"3584. Multiple sentences of imprisonment.
"3585. Calculation of a term of imprisonment.
"3586. Implementation of a sentence of imprisonment.

"SUBCHAPTER D—IMPRISONMENT

"§ 3581. Sentence of imprisonment

"(a) IN GENERAL.—A defendant who has been found guilty of an offense may be sentenced to a term of imprisonment.

"(b) AUTHORIZED TERMS.—The authorized terms of imprisonment are—

"(1) for a Class A felony, the duration of the defendant's life or any period of time;

"(2) for a Class B felony, not more than twenty-five years;

"(3) for a Class C felony, not more than twelve years;

"(4) for a Class D felony, not more than six years;

"(5) for a Class E felony, not more than three years;

"(6) for a Class A misdemeanor, not more than one year;

"(7) for a Class B misdemeanor, not more than six months;

"(8) for a Class C misdemeanor, not more than thirty days; and

"(9) for an infraction, not more than five days.

"§ 3582. Imposition of a sentence of imprisonment

"(a) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED IN IMPOSING A TERM OF IMPRISONMENT.—The court, in determining whether to impose a term of imprisonment, and, if a term of imprisonment is to be imposed, in determining the length of the term, shall consider the factors set forth in section 3553(a) to the extent that they are applicable, recognizing that imprisonment is not an appropriate means of promoting correction and rehabilitation. In determining whether to make a recommendation concerning the type of prison facility appropriate for the defendant, the court shall consider any pertinent policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a)(2).

"(b) EFFECT OF FINALITY OF JUDGMENT.—Notwithstanding the fact that a sentence to imprisonment can subsequently be—

"(1) modified pursuant to the provisions of subsection (c);

"(2) corrected pursuant to the provisions of rule 35 and section 3742; or

"(3) appealed and modified, if outside the guideline range, pursuant to the provisions of section 3742;

a judgment of conviction that includes such a sentence constitutes a final judgment for all other purposes.

"(c) MODIFICATION OF AN IMPOSED TERM OF IMPRISONMENT.—The court may not modify a term of imprisonment once it has been imposed except that—

"(1) in any case—

"(A) the court, upon motion of the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, may reduce the term of imprisonment, after considering the factors set forth in section 3553(a) to the extent that they are applicable, if it finds that extraordinary and compelling reasons warrant such a reduction and that such a reduction is consistent with applicable policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission; and

"(B) the court may modify an imposed term of imprisonment to the extent otherwise expressly permitted by statute or by Rule 35 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure; and

"(2) in the case of a defendant who has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment based on a sentencing range that has subsequently been lowered by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(n), upon motion of the defendant or the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, or on its own motion, the court may reduce the term of imprisonment, after considering the factors set forth in section 3553(a) to the extent that they are applicable, if such a reduction is consistent with applicable policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission.

"(d) INCLUSION OF AN ORDER TO LIMIT CRIMINAL ASSOCIATION OF ORGANIZED CRIME AND DRUG OFFENDERS.—The court, in imposing a sentence to a term of imprisonment upon a defendant convicted of a felony set forth in chapter 95 (racketeering) or 96 (racketeer influenced and corrupt organizations) of this title or in the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 801 et seq.), or at any time thereafter upon motion by the Director of the Bureau of Prisons or a United States attorney, may include as a part of the sentence an order that requires that the defendant not associate or communicate with a specified person, other than his attorney, upon a showing of probable cause to believe that association or communication with such person is for the purpose of enabling the defendant to control, manage, direct, finance, or otherwise participate in an illegal enterprise.

"§ 3583. Inclusion of a term of supervised release after imprisonment

"(a) IN GENERAL.—The court, in imposing a sentence to a term of imprisonment for a felony or a misdemeanor, may include as a part of the sentence a requirement that the defendant be placed on a term of supervised release after imprisonment.

"(b) AUTHORIZED TERMS OF SUPERVISED RELEASE.—The authorized terms of supervised release are—

"(1) for a Class A or Class B felony, not more than three years;

"(2) for a Class C or Class D felony, not more than two years; and

"(3) for a Class E felony, or for a misdemeanor, not more than one year.

"(c) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED IN INCLUDING A TERM OF SUPERVISED RELEASE.—The court, in determining whether to include a term of supervised release, and, if a term of supervised release is to be included, in determining the length of the term and the conditions of supervised release, shall consider the factors set forth in section 3553(a)(1), (a)(2)(B), (a)(2)(D), (a)(4), (a)(5), and (a)(6).

"(d) CONDITIONS OF SUPERVISED RELEASE.—The court shall order, as an explicit condition of supervised release, that the defendant not commit another Federal, State, or local crime during the term of supervision. The court may order, as a further condition of supervised release, to the extent that such condition—

"(1) is reasonably related to the factors set forth in section 3553 (a)(1), (a)(2)(B), and (a)(2)(D);

"(2) involves no greater deprivation of liberty than is reasonably necessary for the purposes set forth in section 3553 (a)(2)(B) and (a)(2)(D); and any condition set forth as a discretionary condition of probation in section 3563 (b)(1) through (b)(10) and (b)(12) through (b)(19), and any other condition it considers to be appropriate. If an alien defendant is subject to deportation, the court may provide, as a condition of supervised release, that he be deported and remain outside the United States, and may order that he be delivered to a duly authorized immigration official for such deportation.

"(3) is consistent with any pertinent policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a);

"(e) MODIFICATION OF TERM OR CONDITIONS.—The court may, after considering the factors set forth in section 3553(a)(1), (a)(2)(B), (a)(2)(D), (a)(4), (a)(5), and (a)(6)—

"(1) terminate a term of supervised release previously ordered and discharge the person released at any time after the expiration of one year of supervised release, if it is satisfied that such action is warranted by the conduct of the person released and the interest of justice;

"(2) after a hearing, extend a term of supervised release if less than the maximum authorized term was previously imposed, and may modify, reduce, or enlarge the conditions of supervised release, at any time prior to the expiration or termination of the term of supervised release, pursuant to the provisions applicable to the initial setting of the term and conditions of post-release supervision; or

"(3) treat a violation of a condition of a term of supervised release as contempt of court pursuant to section 401(3) of this title.

"(f) WRITTEN STATEMENT OF CONDITIONS.—The court shall direct that the probation officer provide the defendant with a written statement that sets forth all the conditions to which the term of supervised release is subject, and that is sufficiently clear and specific to serve as a guide for the defendant's conduct and for such supervision as is required.

"§ 3584. Multiple sentences of imprisonment

"(a) IMPOSITION OF CONCURRENT OR CONSECUTIVE TERMS.—If multiple terms of imprisonment are imposed on a defendant at the same time, or if a term of imprisonment is imposed on a defendant who is already subject to an undischarged term of imprisonment, the terms may run concurrently or consecutively, except that the terms may not run consecutively for an attempt and for another offense that was the sole objective of the attempt. Multiple terms of imprisonment imposed at the same time run concurrently unless the court orders or the statute mandates that the terms are to run consecutively. Multiple terms of imprisonment imposed at different times run consecutively unless the court orders that the terms are to run concurrently.

"(b) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED IN IMPOSING CONCURRENT OR CONSECUTIVE TERMS.—The court, in determining whether the terms imposed are to be ordered to run concurrently or consecutively, shall consider, as to each offense for which a term of imprisonment is being imposed, the factors set forth in section 3553(a).

"(c) TREATMENT OF MULTIPLE SENTENCE AS AN AGGREGATE.—Multiple terms of imprisonment ordered to run consecutively or concurrently shall be treated for administrative purposes as a single, aggregate term of imprisonment.

"§ 3585. Calculation of a term of imprisonment

"(a) COMMENCEMENT OF SENTENCE.—A sentence to a term of imprisonment commences on the date the defendant is received in custody awaiting transportation to, or arrives voluntarily to commence service of sentence at, the official detention facility at which the sentence is to be served.

"(b) CREDIT FOR PRIOR CUSTODY.—A defendant shall be given credit toward the service of a term of imprisonment for any time he has spent in official detention prior to the date the sentence commences—

"(1) as a result of the offense for which the sentence was imposed; or

"(2) as a result of any other charge for which the defendant was arrested after the commission of the offense for which the sentence was imposed; that has not been credited against another sentence.

"§ 3586. Implementation of a sentence of imprisonment

"The implementation of a sentence of imprisonment is governed by the provisions of subchapter C of chapter 229 and, if the sentence includes a term of supervised release, by the provisions of subchapter A of chapter 229.

"3605. Transfer of jurisdiction over a probationer.
"3606. Arrest and return of a probationer.
"3607. Special probation and expungement procedures for drug possessor.

"SUBCHAPTER A—PROBATION

"§ 3601. Supervision of probation

"A person who has been sentenced to probation pursuant to the provisions of subchapter B of chapter 227, or placed on probation pursuant to the provisions of chapter 403, or placed on supervised release pursuant to the provisions of section 3583, shall, during the term imposed, be supervised by a probation officer to the degree warranted by the conditions specified by the sentencing court.

"§ 3602. Appointment of probation officers

"(a) APPOINTMENT.—A district court of the United States shall appoint qualified persons to serve, with or without compensation, as probation officers within the jurisdiction and under the direction of the court making the appointment. The court may, for cause, remove a probation officer appointed to serve with compensation, and may, in its discretion, remove a probation officer appointed to serve without compensation.

"(b) RECORD OF APPOINTMENT.—The order of appointment shall be entered on the records of the court, a copy of the order shall be delivered to the officer appointed, and a copy shall be sent to the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

"(c) CHIEF PROBATION OFFICER.—If the court appoints more than one probation officer, one may be designated by the court as chief probation officer and shall direct the work of all probation officers serving in the judicial district.

"§ 3603. Duties of probation officers

"A probation officer shall—

"(a) instruct a probationer or a person on supervised release, who is under his supervision, as to the conditions specified by the sentencing court, and provide him with a written statement clearly setting forth all such conditions;

"(b) keep informed, to the degree required by the conditions specified by the sentencing court, as to the conduct and condition of a probationer or a person on supervised release, who is under his supervision, and report his conduct and condition to the sentencing court;

"(c) use all suitable methods, not inconsistent with the conditions specified by the court, to aid a probationer or a person on supervised release who is under his supervision, and to bring about improvements in his conduct and condition;

"(d) be responsible for the supervision of any probationer or a person on supervised release who is known to be within the judicial district;

"(e) keep a record of his work, and make such reports to the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts as the Director may require;

"(f) upon request of the Attorney General or his designee, supervise and furnish information about a person within the custody of the Attorney General while on work release, furlough, or other authorized release from his regular place of confinement, or while in prerelease custody pursuant to the provisions of section 3624(c);

"(g) keep informed concerning the conduct, condition, and compliance with any condition of probation, including the payment of a fine or restitution of each probationer under his supervision and report thereon to the court placing such person on probation and report to the court any failure of a probationer under his supervision to pay a fine in default within thirty days after notification that it is in default so that the court may determine whether probation should be revoked; and

"(h) perform any other duty that the court may designate.

"§ 3604. Transportation of a probationer

"A court, after imposing a sentence of probation, may direct a United States marshal to furnish the probationer with—

"(a) transportation to the place to which he is required to proceed as a condition of his probation; and

"(b) money, not to exceed such amount as the Attorney General may prescribe, for subsistence expenses while traveling to his destination.

"§ 3605. Transfer of jurisdiction over a probationer

"A court, after imposing a sentence, may transfer jurisdiction over a probationer or person on supervised release to the district court for any other district to which the person is required to proceed as a condition of his probation or release, or is permitted to proceed, with the concurrence of such court. A later transfer of jurisdiction may be made in the same manner. A court to which jurisdiction is transferred under this section is authorized to exercise all powers over the probationer or releasee that are permitted by this subchapter or subchapter B or D of chapter 227.

"§ 3606. Arrest and return of a probationer

"If there is probable cause to believe that a probationer or a person on supervised release has violated a condition of his probation or release, he may be arrested, and, upon arrest, shall be taken without unnecessary delay before the court having jurisdiction over him. A probation officer may make such an arrest wherever the probationer or releasee is found, and may make the arrest without a warrant. The court having supervision of the probationer or releasee, or, if there is no such court, the court last having supervision of the probationer or releasee, may issue a warrant for the arrest of a probationer or releasee for violation of a condition of release, and a probation officer or United States marshal may execute the warrant in the district in which the warrant was issued or in any district in which the probationer or releasee is found.

"§ 3607. Special probation and expungement procedures for drug possessors

"(a) PRE-JUDGMENT PROBATION.—If a person found guilty of an offense described in section 404 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 844)—

"(1) has not, prior to the commission of such offense, been convicted of violating a Federal or State law relating to controlled substances; and

"(2) has not previously been the subject of a disposition under this subsection;

the court may, with the consent of such person, place him on probation for a term of not more than one year without entering a judgment of conviction. At any time before the expiration of the term of probation, if the person has not violated a condition of his probation, the court may, without entering a judgment of conviction, dismiss the proceedings against the person and discharge him from probation. At the expiration of the term of probation, if the person has not violated a condition of his probation, the court shall, without entering a judgment of conviction, dismiss the proceedings against the person and discharge him from probation. If the person violates a condition of his probation, the court shall proceed in accordance with the provisions of section 3565.

"(b) RECORD OF DISPOSITION.—A nonpublic record of a disposition under subsection (a), or a conviction that is the subject of an expungement order under subsection (c), shall be retained by the Department of Justice solely for the purpose of use by the courts in determining in any subsequent proceeding whether a person qualifies for the disposition provided in subsection (a) or the expungement provided in subsection (c). A disposition under subsection (a), or a conviction that is the subject of an expungement order under subsection (c), shall not be considered a conviction for the purpose of a disqualification or a disability imposed by law upon conviction of a crime, or for any other purpose.

"(c) EXPUNGEMENT OF RECORD OF DISPOSITION.—If the case against a person found guilty of an offense under section 404 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 844) is the subject of a disposition under subsection (a), and the person was less than twenty-one years old at the time of the offense, the court shall enter an expungement order upon the application of such person. The expungement order shall direct that there be expunged from all official records, except the nonpublic records referred to in subsection (b), all references to his arrest for the offense, the institution of criminal proceedings against him, and the results thereof. The effect of the order shall be to restore such person, in the contemplation of the law, to the status he occupied before such arrest or institution of criminal proceedings. A person concerning whom such an order has been entered shall not be held thereafter under any provision of law to be guilty of perjury, false swearing, or making a false statement by reason of his failure to recite or acknowledge such arrests or institution of criminal proceedings, or the results thereof, in response to an inquiry made of him for any purpose.

"SUBCHAPTER B—FINES

"Sec.
"3611. Payment of a fine.
"3612. Collection of an unpaid fine.
"3613. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine.
"3614. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine.
"3615. Criminal default.

"SUBCHAPTER B—FINES

"§ 3611. Payment of a fine

"A person who has been sentenced to pay a fine pursuant to the provisions of subchapter C of chapter 227 shall pay the fine immediately, or by the time and method specified by the sentencing court, to the clerk of the court. The clerk shall forward the payment to the United States Treasury.

"§ 3612. Collection of an unpaid fine

"(a) DISPOSITION OF PAYMENT.—The clerk shall forward each fine payment to the United States Treasury and shall notify the Attorney General of its receipt within ten working days.

"(b) CERTIFICATION OF IMPOSITION.—If a fine exceeding $100 is imposed, modified, or remitted, the sentencing court shall incorporate in the order imposing, remitting, or modifying such fine, and promptly certify to the Attorney General—

"(1) the name of the person fined;

"(2) his current address;

"(3) the docket number of the case;

"(4) the amount of the fine imposed;

"(5) any installment schedule;

"(6) the nature of any modification or remission of the fine or installment schedule; and

"(7) the amount of the fine that is due and unpaid.

"(c) RESPONSIBILITY FOR COLLECTION.—The Attorney General shall be responsible for collection of an unpaid fine concerning which a certification has been issued as provided in subsection (a). An order of restitution, pursuant to section 3556, does not create any right of action against the United States by the person to whom restitution is ordered to be paid.

"§ 3613. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine

"(d) NOTIFICATION OF DELINQUENCY.—Within 10 working days after a fine is determined to be delinquent as provided in section 3572(i), the Attorney General shall notify the person whose fine is delinguent, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is delinquent.

"(e) NOTIFICATION OF DEFAULT.—Within 10 working days after a fine is determined to be in default as provided in section 3572(j), the Attorney General shall notify the person defaulting, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is in default and the entire unpaid balance, including interest and penalties, is due within 30 days.

"(f) INTEREST, MONETARY PENALTIES FOR DELINQUENCY, AND DEFAULT.—Upon a determination of willful nonpayment, the court may impose the following interest and monetary penalties:

"(1) INTEREST.—Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, interest at the rate of 1 per centum per month, or 12 per centum per year, shall be charged, beginning the 31st day after sentencing on the first day of each month during which any fine balance remains unpaid, including sums to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(2) MONETARY PENALTIES FOR DELINQUENT FINES.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a penalty sum equal to 10 per centum shall be charged for any portion of a criminal fine which has become delinquent. The Attorney General may waive all or part of the penalty for good cause.

"(a) LIEN.—A fine imposed pursuant to the provisions of subchapter C of chapter 227 is a lien in favor of the United States upon all property belonging to the person fined. The lien arises at the time of the entry of the judgment and continues until the liability is satisfied, remitted, or set aside, or until it becomes unenforceable pursuant to the provisions of subsection (b). On application of the person fined, the Attorney General shall—

"(1) issue a certificate of release, as described in section 6325 of the Internal Revenue Code, of any lien imposed pursuant to this section, upon his acceptance of a bond described in section 6325(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code; or

"(2) issue a certificate of discharge, as described in section 6325 of the Internal Revenue Code, of any part of the person's property subject to a lien imposed pursuant to this section, upon his determination that the fair market value of that part of such property remaining subject to and available to satisfy the lien is at least three times the amount of the fine.

"(b) EXPIRATION OF LIEN.—A lien becomes unenforceable and liability to pay a fine expires—

"(1) twenty years after the entry of the judgment; or

"(2) upon the death of the individual fined.

The period set forth in paragraph (1) may be extended, prior to its expiration, by a written agreement between the person fined and the Attorney General. The running of the period set forth in paragraph (1) is suspended during any interval for which the running of the period of limitations for collection of a tax would be suspended pursuant to section 6503(b), 6503(c), 6503(f), 6503(i), or 7508(a)(1)(I) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6503(b), 6503(c), 6503(f), 6503(i), or 7508(a)(1)(I)), or section 513 of the Act of October 17, 1940, 54 Stat. 1190.

"(c) APPLICATION OF OTHER LIEN PROVISIONS.—The provisions of sections 6323, 6331, 6332, 6334 through 6336, 6337(a), 6338 through 6343, 6901, 7402, 7403, 7424 through 7426, 7505(a), 7506, 7701, and 7805 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6323, 6331, 6332, 6334 through 6336, 6337(a), 6338 through 6343, 6901, 7402, 7403, 7424 through 7426, 7505(a), 7506, 7701, and 7805) and of section 513 of the Act of October 17, 1940, 54 Stat. 1190, apply to a fine and to the lien imposed by subsection (a) as if the liability of the person fined were for an internal revenue tax assessment, except to the extent that the application of such statutes is modified by regulations issued by the Attorney General to accord with differences in the nature of the liabilities. For the purposes of this subsection, references in the preceding sections of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to 'the Secretary' shall be construed to mean 'the Attorney General,' and references in those sections to 'tax' shall be construed to mean 'fine.'

"(d) EFFECT OF NOTICE OF LIEN.—A notice of the lien imposed by subsection (a) shall be considered a notice of lien for taxes payable to the United States for the purposes of any State or local law providng for the filing of a notice of a tax lien. The registration, recording, docketing, or indexing, in accordance with 28 U.S.C. 1962, of the judgment under which a fine is imposed shall be considered for all purposes as the filing prescribed by section 6323(f)(1)(A) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6323(f)(1)(A)) and by subsection (c).

"(e) ALTERNATIVE ENFORCEMENT.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, a judgment imposing a fine may be enforced by execution against the property of the person fined in like manner as judgments in civil cases, but in no event shall liability for payment of a fine extend beyond the period specified in subsection (b).

"(f) DISCHARGE OF DEBTS INAPPLICABLE.—No discharge of debts pursuant to a bankruptcy proceeding shall render a lien under this section unenforceable or discharge liability to pay a fine.

"§ 3614. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine

"(a) RESENTENCING.—Subject to the provisions of subsection (b), if a defendant knowingly fails to pay a delinquent fine the court may resentence the defendant to any sentence which might originally have been imposed.

"(b) IMPRISONMENT.—The defendant may be sentenced to a term of imprisonment under subsection (a) only if the court determines that—

"(1) the defendant willfully refused to pay the delinquent fine or had failed to make sufficient bona fide efforts to pay the fine; or

"(2) in light of the nature of the offense and the characteristics of the person, alternatives to imprisonment are not adequate to serve the purposes of punishment and deterrence.

"§ 3615. Criminal default

"Whoever, having been sentenced to pay a fine, willfully falls to pay the fine, shall be fined not more than twice the amount of the unpaid balance of the fine or $10,000, whichever is greater, imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

"SUBCHAPTER C—IMPRISONMENT

"§ 3621. Imprisonment of a convicted person

"(a) COMMITMENT TO CUSTODY OF BUREAU OF PRISONS.—A person who has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment pursuant to the provisions of subchapter D of chapter 227 shall be committed to the custody of the Bureau of Prisons until the expiration of the term imposed, or until earlier released for satisfactory behavior pursuant to the provisions of section 3624.

"(b) PLACE OF IMPRISONMENT.—The Bureau of Prisons shall designate the place of the prisoner's imprisonment. The Bureau may designate any available penal or correctional facility that meets minimum standards of health and habitability established by the Bureau, whether maintained by the Federal Government or otherwise and whether within or without the judicial district in which the person was convicted, that the Bureau determines to be appropriate and suitable, considering—

"(1) the resources of the facility contemplated;

"(2) the nature and circumstances of the offense;

"(3) the history and characteristics of the prisoner;

"(4) any statement by the court that imposed the sentence—

"(A) concerning the purposes for which the sentence to imprisonment was determined to be warranted; or

"(B) recommending a type of penal or correctional facility as appropriate; and

"(5) any pertinent policy statement issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to section 994(a)(2) of title 28.

The Bureau may at any time, having regard for the same matters, direct the transfer of a prisoner from one penal or correctional facility to another.

"(c) DELIVERY OF ORDER OF COMMITMENT.—When a prisoner, pursuant to a court order, is placed in the custody of a person in charge of a penal or correctional facility, a copy of the order shall be delivered to such person as evidence of this authority to hold the prisoner, and the original order, with the return endorsed thereon, shall be returned to the court that issued it.

"(d) DELIVERY OF PRISONER FOR COURT APPEARANCES.—The United States Marshal shall, without charge, bring a prisoner into court or return him to a prison facility on order of a court of the United States or on written request of an attorney for the Government.

"§ 3622. Temporary release of a prisoner

"The Bureau of Prisons may release a prisoner from the place of his imprisonment for a limited period if such release appears to be consistent with the purpose for which the sentence was imposed and any pertinent policy statement issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a)(2), if such release otherwise appears to be consistent with the public interest and if there is reasonable cause to believe that a prisoner will honor the trust to be imposed in him, by authorizing him, under prescribed conditions, to—

"(a) visit a designated place for a period not to exceed thirty days, and then return to the same or another facility, for the purpose of—

"(1) visiting a relative who is dying;

"(2) attending a funeral of a relative;

"(3) obtaining medical treatment not otherwise available;

"(4) contacting a prospective employer;

"(5) establishing or reestablishing family or community ties; or

"(6) engaging in any other significant activity consistent with the public interest;

"(b) participate in a training or educational program in the community while continuing in official detention at the prison facility; or

"(c) work at paid employment in the community while continuing in official detention at the penal or correctional facility if—

"(1) the rates of pay and other conditions of employment will not be less than those paid or provided for work of a similar nature in the community; and

"(2) the prisoner agrees to pay to the Bureau such costs incident to official detention as the Bureau finds appropriate and reasonable under all the circumstances, such costs to be collected by the Bureau and deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation available for such costs at the time such collections are made.

"§ 3623. Transfer of a prisoner to State authority

"The Director of the Bureau of Prisons shall order that a prisoner who has been charged in an indictment or information with, or convicted of, a State felony, be transferred to an official detention facility within such State prior to his release from a Federal prison facility if—

"(1) the transfer has been requested by the Governor or other executive authority of the State;

"(2) the State has presented to the Director a certified copy of the indictment, information, or judgment of conviction; and

"(3) the Director finds that the transfer would be in the public interest.

If more than one request is presented with respect to a prisoner, the Director shall determine which request should receive preference. The expenses of such transfer shall be borne by the State requesting the transfer.

"§ 3624. Release of a prisoner

"(a) DATE OF RELEASE.—A prisoner shall be released by the Bureau of Prisons on the date of the expiration of his term of imprisonment, less any time credited toward the service of his sentence as provided in subsection (b). If the date for a prisoner's release falls on a Saturday, a Sunday, or a legal holiday at the place of confinement, the prisoner may be released by the Bureau on the last preceding weekday.

"(b) CREDIT TOWARD SERVICE OF SENTENCE FOR SATISFACTORY BEHAVIOR.—A prisoner who is serving a term of imprisonment of more than one year, other than a term of imprisonment for the duration of his life, shall receive credit toward the service of his sentence, beyond the time served, of thirty-six days at the end of each year of his term of imprisonment, beginning after the first year of the term, unless the Bureau of Prisons determines that, during that year, he has not satisfactorily complied with such institutional disciplinary regulations as have been approved by the Attorney General and issued to the prisoner. If the Bureau determines that, during that year, the prisoner has not satisfactorily complied with such institutional regulations, he shall receive no such credit toward service of his sentence or shall receive such lesser credit as the Bureau determines to be appropriate. The Bureau's determination shall be made within fifteen days after the end of each year of the sentence. Such credit toward service of sentence vests at the time that it is received. Credit that has vested may not later be withdrawn, and credit that has not been earned may not later be granted. Credit for the last year or portion of a year of the term of imprisonment shall be prorated and credited within the last six weeks of the sentence.

"(c) PRE-RELEASE CUSTODY.—The Bureau of Prisons shall, to the extent practicable, assure that a prisoner serving a term of imprisonment spends a reasonable part, not to exceed six months, of the last ten percent of the term to be served under conditions that will afford the prisoner a reasonable opportunity to adjust to and prepare for his reentry into the community. The United States Probation System shall, to the extent practicable, offer assistance to a prisoner during such pre-release custody.

"(d) ALLOTMENT OF CLOTHING, FUNDS, AND TRANSPORTATION.—Upon the release of a prisoner on the expiration of his term of imprisonment, the Bureau of Prisons shall furnish him with—

"(1) suitable clothing;

"(2) an amount of money, not more than $500, determined by the Director to be consistent with the needs of the offender and the public interest, unless the Director determines that the financial position of the offender is such that no sum should be furnished; and

"(3) transportation to the place of his conviction, to his bona fide residence within the United States, or to such other place within the United States as may be authorized by the Director.

"(e) SUPERVISION AFTER RELEASE.—A prisoner whose sentence includes a term of supervised release after imprisonment shall be released by the Bureau of Prisons to the supervision of a probation officer who shall, during the term imposed, supervise the person released to the degree warranted by the conditions specified by the sentencing court. The term of supervised release commences on the day the person is released from imprisonment. The term runs concurrently with any Federal, State, or local term of probation or supervised release or parole for another offense to which the person is subject or becomes subject during the term of supervised release, except that it does not run during any period in which the person is imprisoned, other than during limited intervals as a condition of probation or supervised release, in connection with a conviction for a Federal, State, or local crime. No prisoner shall be released on supervision unless such prisoner agrees to adhere to an installment schedule, not to exceed two years except in special circumstances, to pay for any fine imposed for the offense committed by such prisoner.

"§ 3625. Inapplicability of the Administrative Procedure Act

"The provisions of sections 554 and 555 and 701 through 706 of title 5, United States Code, do not apply to the making of any determination, decision, or order under this subchapter.";

(3) in section 3663 (formerly section 3579):

(A) by amending subsection (g) to read as follows:

"(g) If such defendant is placed on probation or sentenced to a term of supervised release under this title, any restitution ordered under this section shall be a condition of such probation or supervised release. The court may revoke probation, or modify the term or conditions of a term of supervised release, or hold a defendant in contempt pursuant to section 3583(e) if the defendant fails to comply with such order. In determining whether to revoke probation, modify the term or conditions of supervised release, or hold a defendant serving a term of supervised release in contempt, the court shall consider the defendant's employment status, earning ability, financial resources, the willfulness of the defendant's failure to pay, and any other special circumstances that may have a bearing on the defendant's ability to pay."; and

(B) by amending subsection (h) to read as follows:

"(h) An order of restitution may be enforced by the United States in the manner provided in sections 3812 and 3813 or in the same manner as a judgment in a civil action, and by the victim named in the order to receive the restitution in the same manner as a judgment in a civil action.";

(4) adding the following new section at the end of chapter 232:

"§ 3673. Definitions for sentencing provisions

"As used in chapters 227 and 229—

"(a) 'found guilty' includes acceptance by a court of a plea of guilty or nolo contendere;

"(b) 'commission of an offense' includes the attempted commission of an offense, the consummation of an offense, and any immediate flight after the commission of an offense; and

"(c) 'law enforcement officer' means a public servant authorized by law or by a government agency to engage in or supervise the prevention, detection, investigation, or prosecution of an offense."; and

(5) adding the following caption and sectional analysis at the beginning of new chapter 232:

SEC. 3. (a) Chapter 235 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"§ 3742. Review of a sentence

"(a) APPEAL BY A DEFENDANT.—A defendant may file a notice of appeal in the district court for review of an otherwise final sentence if the sentence—

"(1) was imposed in violation of law;

"(2) was imposed as a result of an incorrect application of the sentencing guidelines issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a);

"(3) was imposed for an offense for which a sentencing guideline has been issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a)(1), and the sentence is greater than—

"(A) the sentence specified in the applicable guideline to the extent that the sentence includes a greater fine or term of imprisonment or term of supervised release than the maximum established in the guideline, or includes a more limiting condition of probation or supervised release under section 3563 (b)(6) or (b)(11) than the maximum established in the guideline; and

"(B) the sentence specified in a plea agreement, if any, under Rule 11 (e)(1)(B) or

(e)(1)(C) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure; or

"(4) was imposed for an offense for which no sentencing guideline has been issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a)(1) and is greater than the sentence specified in a plea agreement, if any, under Rule 11 (e)(1)(B) or (e)(1)(C) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

"(b) APPEAL BY THE GOVERNMENT.—The Government may file a notice of appeal in the district court for review of an otherwise final sentence if the sentence—

"(1) was imposed in violation of law;

"(2) was imposed as a result of an incorrect application of the sentencing guidelines issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a);

"(3) was imposed for an offense for which a sentencing guideline has been issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a)(1), and the sentence is less than—

"(A) the sentence specified in the applicable guideline to the extent that the sentence includes a lesser fine or term of imprisonment or term of supervised release than the minimum established in the guideline, or includes a less limiting condition of probation or supervised release under section 3563 (b)(6) or (b)(11) than the minimum established in the guideline; and

"(B) the sentence specified in a plea agreement, if any, under Rule 11 (e)(1)(B) or (e)(1)(C) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure; or

"(4) was imposed for an offense for which no sentencing guideline has been issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a)(1) and is less than the sentence specified in a plea agreement, if any, under Rule 11 (e)(1)(B) or (e)(1)(C) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure; and the Attorney General or the Solicitor General personally approves the filing of the notice of appeal.

"(c) RECORD ON REVIEW.—If a notice of appeal is filed in the district court pursuant to subsection (a) or b), the clerk shall certify to the court of appeals—

"(1) that portion of the record in the case that is designated as pertinent by either of the parties;

"(2) the presentence report; and

"(3) the information submitted during the sentencing proceeding.

"(d) CONSIDERATION.—Upon review of the record, the court of appeals shall determine whether the sentence—

"(1) was imposed in violation of law;

"(2) was imposed as a result of an incorrect application of the sentencing guidelines; or

"(3) is outside the range of the applicable sentencing guideline, and is unreasonable, having regard for—

"(A) the factors to be considered in imposing a sentence, as set forth in chapter 227 of this title; and

"(B) the reasons for the imposition of the particular sentence, as stated by the district court pursuant to the provisions of section 3553(c).

The court of appeals shall give due regard to the opportunity of the district court to judge the credibility of the witnesses, and shall accept the findings of fact of the district court unless they are clearly erroneous.

"(e) DECISION AND DISPOSITION.—If the court of appeals determines that the sentence—

"(1) was imposed in violation of law or imposed as a result of an incorrect application of the sentencing guidelines, it shall—

"(A) remand the case for further sentencing proceedings; or

"(B) correct the sentence;

"(2) is outside the range of the applicable sentencing guideline and is unreasonable, it shall state specific reasons for its conclusions and—

"(A) if it determines that the sentence is too high and the appeal has been filed under subsection (a), it shall set aside the sentence and—

"(i) remand the case for imposition of a lesser sentence;

"(ii) remand the case for further sentencing proceedings; or

"(iii) impose a lesser sentence;

"(B) if it determines that the sentence is too low and the appeal has been filed under subsection (b), it shall set aside the sentence and—

"(i) remand the case for imposition of a greater sentence;

"(ii) remand the case for further sentencing proceedings; or

"(iii) impose a greater sentence; or

"(3) was not imposed in violation of law or imposed as a result of an incorrect application of the sentencing guidelines, and is not unreasonable, it shall affirm the sentence.".

(b) The sectional analysis of chapter 235 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding the following new item after the item relating to section 3741:

"3742. Review of a sentence.".

SEC. 4. Chapter 403 of title 18, United States Code is amended as follows:

(a) Section 5037 is amended—

(1) by redesignating subsection (c) as subsection (d); and

(2) by striking out subsections (a) and (b) and inserting the following new subsections in lieu thereof:

"(a) If the court finds a juvenile to be a juvenile delinquent, the court shall hold a disposition hearing concerning the appropriate disposition no later than twenty court days after the juvenile delinquency hearing unless the court has ordered further study pursuant to subsection (e). After the disposition hearing, and after considering any pertinent policy statements promulgated by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994, the court may suspend the findings of juvenile delinquency, enter an order of restitution pursuant to section 3556, place him on probation, or commit him to official detention. With respect to release or detention pending an appeal or a petition for a writ of certiorari after disposition, the court shall proceed pursuant to the provisions of chapter 207.

"(b) The term for which probation may be ordered for a juvenile found to be a juvenile delinquent may not extend—

"(1) in the case of a juvenile who is less than eighteen years old, beyond the lesser of—

"(A) the date when the juvenile becomes twenty-one years old; or

"(B) the maximum term that would be authorized by section 3561(b) if the juvenile had been tried and convicted as an adult; or

"(2) in the case of a juvenile who is between eighteen and twenty-one years old, beyond the lesser of—

"(A) three years; or

"(B) the maximum term that would be authorized by section 3561(b) if the juvenile had been tried and convicted as an adult.

The provisions dealing with probation set forth in sections 3563, 3564, and 3565 are applicable to an order placing a juvenile on probation.

"(c) The term for which official detention may be ordered for a juvenile found to be a juvenile delinquent may not extend—

"(1) in the case of a juvenile who is less than eighteen years old, beyond the lesser of—

"(A) the date when the juvenile becomes twenty-one years old; or

"(B) the maximum term of imprisonment that would be authorized by section 3581(b) if the juvenile had been tried and convicted as an adult; or

"(2) in the case of a juvenile who is between eighteen and twenty-one years old—

"(A) who if convicted as an adult would be convicted of a Class A, B, or C felony, beyond five years; or

"(B) in any other case beyond the lesser of—

"(i) three years; or

"(ii) the maximum term of imprisonment that would be authorized by section 3581(b) if the juvenile had been tried and convicted as an adult.".

(b) Section 5041 is repealed.

(c) Section 5042 is amended by—

(1) striking out "parole or" each place it appears in the caption and text; and

(2) striking out "parolee or".

(d) The sectional analysis is amended by striking out the items relating to sections 5041 and 5042 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"5041. Repealed.

"5042. Revocation of Probation.".

SEC. 5. The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure are amended as follows:

(a) Rule 32 is amended—

(1) by deleting subdivision (a)(1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) IMPOSITION OF SENTENCE.—Sentence shall be imposed without unnecessary delay, but the court may, upon a motion that is jointly filed by the defendant and by the attorney for the Government and that asserts a factor important to the sentencing determination is not capable of being resolved at that time, postpone the imposition of sentence for a reasonable time until the factor is capable of being resolved. Prior to the sentencing hearing, the court shall provide the counsel for the defendant and the attorney for the Government with notice of the probation officer's determination, pursuant to the provisions of subdivision (c)(2)(B), of the sentencing classifications and sentencing guideline range believed to be applicable to the case. At the sentencing hearing, the court shall afford the counsel for the defendant and the attorney for the Government an opportunity to comment upon the probation officer's determination and on other matters relating to the appropriate sentence. Before imposing sentence, the court shall also—

"(A) determine that the defendant and his counsel have had the opportunity to read and discuss the presentence investigation report made available pursuant to subdivision (c)(3)(A) or summary thereof made available pursuant to subdivision (c)(3)(B);

"(B) afford counsel for the defendant an opportunity to speak on behalf of the defendant; and

"(C) address the defendant personally and ask him if he wishes to make a statement in his own behalf and to present any information in mitigation of the sentence.

The attorney for the Government shall have an equivalent opportunity to speak to the court. Upon a motion that is jointly filed by the defendant and by the attorney for the Government, the court may hear in camera such a statement by the defendant, counsel for the defendant, or the attorney for the Government.";

(2) in subdivision (a)(2), by adding ", including any right to appeal the sentence," after "right to appeal" in the first sentence;

(3) in subdivision (a)(2), by adding ", except that the court shall advise the defendant of any right to appeal his sentence" after "nolo contendere" in the second sentence;

(4) by amending the first sentence of subdivision (c)(1) to read as follows:

"A probation officer shall make a presentence investigation and report to the court before the imposition of sentence unless the court finds that there is in the record information sufficient to enable the meaningful exercise of sentencing authority pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 3553, and the court explains this finding on the record.";

(5) by amending subdivision (c)(2) to read as follows:

"(2) REPORT.—The report of the presentence investigation shall contain—

"(A) information about the history and characteristics of the defendant, including his prior criminal record, if any, his financial condition, and any circumstances affecting his behavior that may be helpful in imposing sentence or in the correctional treatment of the defendant;

"(B) the classification of the offense and of the defendant under the categories established by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to section 994(a) of title 28, that the probation officer believes to be applicable to the defendant's case; the kinds of sentence and the sentencing range suggested for such a category of offense committed by such a category of defendant as set forth in the guidelines issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a)(1); and an explanation by the probation officer of any factors that may indicate that a sentence of a different kind or of a different length than one within the applicable guideline would be more appropriate under all the circumstances;

"(C) any pertinent policy statement issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a)(2);

"(D) verified information stated in a nonargumentative style containing an assessment of the financial, social, psychological, and medical impact upon, and cost to, any individual against whom the offense has been committed;

"(E) unless the court orders otherwise, information concerning the nature and extent of nonprison programs and resources available for the defendant; and

"(F) such other information as may be required by the court.";

(6) in subdivision (c)(3)(A), by deleting "exclusive of any recommendations as to sentence" and inserting in lieu thereof ", including the information required by subdivision (c)(2) but not including any final recommendation as to sentence,";

(7) in subdivision (c)(3)(D), delete "or the Parole Commission";

(8) in subdivision (c)(3)(F), delete "or the Parole Commission pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §§ 4205(c), 4252, 5010(e), or 5037(c)" and substitute "pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3552(b)";

(9) by deleting "imposition of sentence is suspended, or disposition is had under 18 U.S.C. § 4205(c)," in subsection (d).

(b) Rule 35 is amended to read as follows:

"Rule 35. Correction of Sentence

"(a) CORRECTION OF A SENTENCE ON REMAND.—The court shall correct a sentence that is determined on appeal under 18 U.S.C. 3742 to have been imposed in violation of law, to have been imposed as a result of an incorrect application of the sentencing guidelines, or to be unreasonable, upon remand of the case to the court—

"(1) for imposition of a sentence in accord with the findings of the court of appeals; or

"(2) for further sentencing proceedings if, after such proceedings, the court determines that the original sentence was incorrect.

"(b) CORRECTION OF SENTENCE FOR CHANGED CIRCUMSTANCES.—The court, on motion of the government, may within one year after the imposition of a sentence, lower a sentence to reflect a defendant's subsequent, substantial assistance in the investigation or prosecution of another person who has committed an offense, to the extent that such assistance is a factor in applicable guidelines or policy statements issued by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 994(a).".

(c) Rule 38 is amended—

(1) by amending the caption to read: "Stay of Execution" and deleting "(a) Stay of Execution.";

(2) by deleting subdivisions (b) and (c);

(3) by redesignating subdivisions (a)(1) through (a)(4) as subdivisions (a) through (d), respectively;

(4) in subdivision (a), by adding "from the conviction or sentence" after "is taken";

(5) in the first sentence of subdivision (b), by adding "from the conviction or sentence" after "is taken";

(6) by amending subdivision (d) to read as follows:

"(d) PROBATION.—A sentence of probation may be stayed if an appeal from the conviction or sentence is taken. If the sentence is stayed, the court shall fix the terms of the stay."; and

(7) by adding new subdivisions (e) and (f) as follows:

"(e) CRIMINAL FORFEITURE, NOTICE TO VICTIMS, AND RESTITUTION.—A sanction imposed as part of the sentence pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 3554, 3555, or 3556 may, if an appeal of the conviction or sentence is taken, be stayed by the district court or by the court of appeals upon such terms as the court finds appropriate. The court may issue such orders as may be reasonably necessary to ensure compliance with the sanction upon disposition of the appeal, including the entering of a restraining order or an injunction or requiring a deposit in whole or in part of the monetary amount involved into the registry of the district court or execution of a performance bond.

"(f) DISABILITIES.—A civil or employment disability arising under a Federal statute by reason of the defendant's conviction or sentence, may, if an appeal is taken, be stayed by the district court or by the court of appeals upon such terms as the court finds appropriate. The court may enter a restraining order or an injunction, or take any other action that may be reasonably necessary to protect the interest represented by the disability pending disposition of the appeal.".

(d) Rule 40 is amended by deleting "3653" in subdivision (d)(1) and inserting in lieu thereof "3605".

(e) Rule 54 is amended by amending the definition of "Petty offense" in subdivision (c) to read as follows: " 'Petty offense' means a class B or C misdemeanor or an infraction.".

(f) Rule 6(e)(3)(C) is amended by adding the following subdivision;

"(iv) when permitted by a court at the request of an attorney for the government, upon a showing that such matters may disclose a violation of state criminal law, to an appropriate official of a state or subdivision of a state for the purpose of enforcing such law.".

(f) The Table of Rules that precedes Rule 1 is amended as follows:

(1) The item relating to Rule 35 is amended to read as follows:

"35. Correction of Sentence.
"(a) Correction of a sentence on remand.
"(b) Correction of a sentence for changed circumstances.".

(2) The item relating to Rule 38 is amended to read as follows:

"38. Stay of Execution.
"(a) Death.
"(b) Imprisonment.
"(c) Fine.
"(d) Probation.
"(e) Criminal forfeiture, notice to victims, and restitution.
"(f) Disabilities.".

SEC. 6. (a) The Rules of Procedure for the Trial of Misdemeanors Before United States Magistrates are amended by adding the following new rule at the end thereof:

"Rule 9. Definition

"As used in these rules, 'petty offense' means a Class B or C misdemeanor or an infraction.".

(b) The Table of Rules that precedes Rule 1 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"9. Definition".

SEC. 7. (a) Title 28 of the United States Code is amended by adding the following new chapter after chapter 57:

"CHAPTER 58—UNITED STATES SENTENCING COMMISSION

"§ 991. United States Sentencing Commission; establishment and purposes

"(a) There is established as an independent commission in the judicial branch of the United States a United States Sentencing Commission which shall consist of seven voting members and one nonvoting member. The President, after consultation with representatives of judges, prosecuting attorneys, defense attorneys, law enforcement officials, senior citizens, victims of crime, and others interested in the criminal justice process, shall appoint the voting members of the Commission, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one of whom shall be appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as the Chairman. At least two of the members shall be Federal judges in regular active service selected after considering a list of six judges recommended to the President by the Judicial Conference of the United States. Not more than four of the members of the Commission shall be members of the same political party. The Attorney General, or his designee, shall be an ex officio, nonvoting member of the Commission. The Chairman and members of the Commission shall be subject to removal from the Commission by the President only for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office or for other good cause shown.

"(b) The purposes of the United States Sentencing Commission are to—

"(1) establish sentencing policies and practices for the Federal criminal justice system that—

"(A) assure the meeting of the purposes of sentencing as set forth in section 3553(a)(2) of title 18, United States Code;

"(B) provide certainty and fairness in meeting the purposes of sentencing, avoiding unwarranted sentencing disparities among defendants with similar records who have been found guilty of similar criminal conduct while maintaining sufficient flexibility to permit individualized sentences when warranted by mitigating or aggravating factors not taken into account in the establishment of general sentencing practices; and

"(C) reflect, to the extent practicable, advancement in knowledge of human behavior as it relates to the criminal justice process; and

"(2) develop means of measuring the degree to which the sentencing, penal, and correctional practices are effective in meeting the purposes of sentencing as set forth in section 3553(a)(2) of title 18, United States Code.

"§ 992. Terms of office; compensation

"(a) The voting members of the United States Sentencing Commission shall be appointed for six-year terms, except that the initial terms of the first members of the Commission shall be staggered so that—

"(1) two members, including the chairman, serve terms of six years;

"(2) three members serve terms of four years; and

"(3) two members serve terms of two years.

"(b) No voting member may serve more than two full terms. A voting member appointed to fill a vacancy that occurs before the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed only for the remainder of such term.

"(c) The Chairman of the Commission shall hold a full-time position and shall be compensated during the term of office at the annual rate at which judges of the United States courts of appeals are compensated. The voting members of the Commission, other than the Chairman, shall hold full-time positions until the end of the first six years after the sentencing guidelines go into effect pursuant to section 225(a)(1)(B)(ii) of the Sentencing Reform Act of 1983, and shall be compensated at the annual rate at which judges of the United States courts of appeals are compensated. Thereafter, the voting members of the Commission, other than the Chairman, shall hold part-time positions and shall be paid at the daily rate at which judges of the United States courts of appeals are compensated. A Federal judge may serve as a member of the Commission without resigning his appointment as a Federal judge.

"§ 993. Powers and duties of Chairman

"The Chairman shall—

"(a) call and preside at meetings of the Commission, which shall be held for at least two weeks in each quarter after the members of the Commission hold part-time positions; and

"(b) direct—

"(1) the preparation of requests for appropriations for the Commission; and

"(2) the use of funds made available to the Commission.

"§ 994. Duties of the Commission

"(a) The Commission, by affirmative vote of at least four members of the Commission, and pursuant to its rules and regulations and consistent with all pertinent provisions of this title and title 18, United States Code, shall promulgate and distribute to all courts of the United States and to the United States Probation System—

"(1) guidelines, as described in this section, for use of a sentencing court in determining the sentence to be imposed in a criminal case, including—

"(A) a determination whether to impose a sentence to probation, a fine, or a term of imprisonment;

"(B) a determination as to the appropriate amount of a fine or the appropriate length of a term of probation or a term of imprisonment;

"(C) a determination whether a sentence to a term of imprisonment should include a requirement that the defendant be placed on a term of supervised release after imprisonment, and, if so, the appropriate length of such a term; and

"(D) a determination whether multiple sentences to terms of imprisonment should be ordered to run concurrently or consecutively;

"(2) general policy statements regarding application of the guidelines or any other aspect of sentencing or sentence implementation that in the view of the Commission would further the purposes set forth in section 3553(a)(2) of title 18, United States Code, including the appropriate use of—

"(A) the sanctions set forth in sections 3554, 3555, and 3556 of title 18;

"(B) the conditions of probation and supervised release set forth in sections 3563(b) and 3583(d) of title 18;

"(C) the sentence modification provisions set forth in sections 3563(c), 3573, and 3582(c) of title 18;

"(D) the authority granted under rule 11(e)(2) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure to accept or reject a plea agreement entered into pursuant to rule 11(e)(1); and

"(E) the temporary release provisions set forth in section 3622 of title 18, and the prerelease custody provisions set forth in section 3624(c) of title 18; and

"(3) guidelines or general policy statements regarding the appropriate use of the probation revocation provisions set forth in section 3565 of title 18, and the provisions for modification of the term or conditions of probation or supervised release set forth in sections 3563(c), 3564(d), and 3583(e) of title 18.

"(b) The Commission, in the guidelines promulgated pursuant to subsection (a)(1), shall, for each category of offense involving each category of defendant, establish a sentencing range that is consistent with all pertinent provisions of title 18, United States Code. If a sentence specified by the guidelines includes a term of imprisonment, the maximum of the range established for such a term shall not exceed the minimum of that range by more than 25 per centum.

"(c) The Commission, in establishing categories of offenses for use in the guidelines and policy statements governing the imposition of sentences of probation, a fine, or imprisonment, governing the imposition of other authorized sanctions, governing the size of a fine or the length of a term of probation, imprisonment, or supervised release, and governing the conditions of probation, supervised release, or imprisonment, shall consider whether the following matters, among others, have any relevance to the nature, extent, place of service, or other incidents of an appropriate sentence, and shall take them into account only to the extent that they do have relevance—

"(1) the grade of the offense;

"(2) the circumstances under which the offense was committed which mitigate or aggravate the seriousness of the offense;

"(3) the nature and degree of the harm caused by the offense, including whether it involved property, irreplaceable property, a person, a number of persons, or a breach of public trust;

"(4) the community view of the gravity of the offense;

"(5) the public concern generated by the offense;

"(6) the deterrent effect a particular sentence may have on the commission of the offense by others; and

"(7) the current incidence of the offense in the community and in the nation as a whole.

"(d) The Commission in establishing categories of defendants for use in the guidelines and policy statements governing the imposition of sentences of probation, a fine, or imprisonment, governing the imposition of other authorized sanctions, governing the size of a fine or the length of a term of probation, imprisonment, or supervised release, and governing the conditions of probation, supervised release, or imprisonment, shall consider whether the following matters, among others, with respect to a defendant, have any relevance to the nature, extent, place of service, or other incidents of an appropriate sentence, and shall take them into account only to the extent that they do have relevance—

"(1) age;

"(2) education;

"(3) vocational skills;

"(4) mental and emotional condition to the extent that such condition mitigates the defendant's culpability or to the extent that such condition is otherwise plainly relevant;

"(5) physical condition, including drug dependence;

"(6) previous employment record;

"(7) family ties and responsibilities;

"(8) community ties;

"(9) role in the offense;

"(10) criminal history; and

"(11) degree of dependence upon criminal activity for a livelihood.

The Commission shall assure that the guidelines and policy statements are entirely neutral as to the race, sex, national origin, creed, and socioeconomic status of offenders.

"(e) The Commission shall assure that the guidelines and policy statements, in recommending a term of imprisonment or length of a term of imprisonment, reflect the general inappropriateness of considering the education, vocational skills, employment record, family ties and responsibilities, and community ties of the defendant.

"(f) The Commission, in promulgating guidelines pursuant to subsection (a)(1), shall promote the purposes set forth in section 991(b)(1), with particular attention to the requirements of subsection 991(b)(1)(B) for providing certainty and fairness in sentencing and reducing unwarranted sentence disparities.

"(g) The Commission, in promulgating guidelines pursuant to subsection (a)(1) to meet the purposes of sentencing as set forth in section 3553(a)(2) of title 18, United States Code, shall take into account the nature and capacity of the penal, correctional, and other facilities and services available, and shall make recommendations concerning any change or expansion in the nature or capacity of such facilities and services that might become necessary as a result of the guidelines promulgated pursuant to the provisions of this chapter.

"(h) The Commission shall assure that the guidelines will specify a sentence to a term of imprisonment at or near the maximum term authorized by section 3581(b) of title 18, United States Code, for categories of defendants in which the defendant is eighteen years old or older and—

"(1) has been convicted of a felony that is—

"(A) a crime of violence; or

"(B) an offense described in section 401 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 841), sections 1002(a), 1005, and 1009 of the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 952(a), 955, and 959), and section 1 of the Act of September 15, 1980 (21 U.S.C. 955a); and

"(2) has previously been convicted of two or more prior felonies, each of which is—

"(A) a crime of violence; or

"(B) an offense described in section 401 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 841), sections 1002(a), 1005, and 1009 of the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 952(a), 955, and 959), and section 1 of the Act of September 15, 1980 (21 U.S.C. 955a).

"(i) The Commission shall assure that the guidelines will specify a sentence to a substantial term of imprisonment for categories of defendants in which the defendant—

"(1) has a history of two or more prior Federal, State, or local felony convictions for offenses committed on different occasions;

"(2) committed the offense as part of a pattern of criminal conduct from which he derived a substantial portion of his income;

"(3) committed the offense in furtherance of a conspiracy with three or more persons engaging in a pattern of racketeering activity in which the defendant participated in a managerial or supervisory capacity;

"(4) committed a crime of violence that constitutes a felony while on release pending trial, sentence, or appeal from a Federal, State, or local felony for which he was ultimately convicted; or

"(5) committed a felony that is set forth in section 401 or 1010 of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 841 and 960), and that involved trafficking in a substantial quantity of a controlled substance.

"(j) The Commission shall insure that the guidelines reflect the general appropriateness of imposing a sentence other than imprisonment in cases in which the defendant is a first offender who has not been convicted of a crime of violence or an otherwise serious offense, and the general appropriateness of imposing a term of imprisonment on a person convicted of a crime of violence that results in serious bodily injury.

"(k) The Commission shall insure that the guidelines reflect the inappropriateness of imposing a sentence to a term of imprisonment for the purpose of rehabilitating the defendant or providing the defendant with needed educational or vocational training, medical care, or other correctional treatment.

"(l) The Commission shall insure that the guidelines promulgated pursuant to subsection (a)(1) reflect—

"(1) the appropriateness of imposing an incremental penalty for each offense in a case in which a defendant is convicted of—

"(A) multiple offenses committed in the same course of conduct that result in the exercise of ancillary jurisdiction over one or more of the offenses; and

"(B) multiple offenses committed at different times, including those cases in which the subsequent offense is a violation of section 3150 (penalties for failure to appear) of title 18; and

"(2) the general inappropriateness of imposing consecutive terms of imprisonment for an offense of conspiring to commit an offense or soliciting commission of an offense and for an offense that was the sole object of the conspiracy or solicitation.

"(m) The Commission shall insure that the guidelines reflect the fact that, in many cases, current sentences do not accurately reflect the seriousness of the offense. This will require that, as a starting point in its development of the initial sets of guidelines for particular categories of cases, the Commission ascertain the average sentences imposed in such categories of cases prior to the creation of the Commission, and in cases involving sentences to terms of imprisonment, the length of such terms actually served. The Commission shall not be bound by such average sentences, and shall independently develop a sentencing range that is consistent with the purposes of sentencing described in section 3553(a)(2) of title 18, United States Code.

"(n) The Commission periodically shall review and revise, in consideration of comments and data coming to its attention, the guidelines promulgated pursuant to the provisions of this section. In fulfilling its duties and in exercising its powers, the Commission shall consult with authorities on, and individual and institutional representatives of, various aspects of the Federal criminal justice system. The United States Probation System, the Bureau of Prisons, the Judicial Conference of the United States, the Criminal Division of the United States Department of Justice, and a representative of the Federal Public Defenders shall submit to the Commission any observations, comments, or questions pertinent to the work of the Commission whenever they believe such communication would be useful, and shall, at least annually, submit to the Commission a written report commenting on the operation of the Commission's guidelines, suggesting changes in the guidelines that appear to be warranted, and otherwise assessing the Commission's work.

"(o) The Commission, at or after the beginning of a regular session of Congress but not later than the first day of May, shall report to the Congress any amendments of the guidelines promulgated pursuant to subsection (a)(1), and a report of the reasons therefor, and the amended guidelines shall take effect one hundred and eighty days after the Commission reports them, except to the extent the effective date is enlarged or the guidelines are disapproved or modified by Act of Congress.

"(p) The Commission and the Bureau of Prisons shall submit to Congress an analysis and recommendations concerning maximum utilization of resources to deal effectively with the Federal prison population. Such report shall be based upon consideration of a variety of alternatives, including—

"(1) modernization of existing facilities;

"(2) inmate classification and periodic review of such classification for use in placing inmates in the least restrictive facility necessary to ensure adequate security; and

"(3) use of existing Federal facilities, such as those currently within military jurisdiction.

"(q) The Commission, within three years of the date of enactment of the Sentencing Reform Act of 1983, and thereafter whenever it finds it advisable, shall recommend to the Congress that it raise or lower the grades, or otherwise modify the maximum penalties, of those offenses for which such an adjustment appears appropriate.

"(r) The Commission shall give due consideration to any petition filed by a defendant requesting modification of the guidelines utilized in the sentencing of such defendant, on the basis of changed circumstances unrelated to the defendant, including changes in—

"(1) the community view of the gravity of the offense;

"(2) the public concern generated by the offense; and

"(3) the deterrent effect particular sentences may have on the commission of the offense by others.

Within one hundred and eighty days of the filing of such petition the Commission shall provide written notice to the defendant whether or not it has approved the petition. If the petition is disapproved the written notice shall contain the reasons for such disapproval. The Commission shall submit to the Congress at least annually an analysis of such written notices.

"(s) The Commission, in promulgating general policy statements regarding the sentencing modification provisions in section 3582(c)(1)(A) of title 18, shall describe what should be considered extraordinary and compelling reasons for sentence reduction, including the criteria to be applied and a list of specific examples. Rehabilitation of the defendant alone shall not be considered an extraordinary and compelling reason.

"(t) If the Commission reduces the term of imprisonment recommended in the guidelines applicable to a particular offense or category of offenses, it shall specify by what amount the sentences of prisoners serving terms of imprisonment that are outside the applicable guideline ranges for the offense may be reduced.

"(u) The Commission shall ensure that the general policy statements promulgated pursuant to subsection (a)(2) include a policy limiting consecutive terms of imprisonment for an offense involving a violation of a general prohibition and for an offense involving a violation of a specific prohibition encompassed within the general prohibition.

"(v) The appropriate judge or officer shall submit to the Commission in connection with each sentence imposed a written report of the sentence, the offense for which it is imposed, the age, race, and sex of the offender, information regarding factors made relevant by the guidelines, and such other information as the Commission finds appropriate. The Commission shall submit to Congress at least annually an analysis of these reports and any recommendations for legislation that the Commission concludes is warranted by that analysis.

"(w) The provisions of section 553 of title 5, relating to publication in the Federal Register and public hearing procedure, shall apply to the promulgation of guidelines pursuant to this section.

"§ 995. Powers of the Commission

"(a) The Commission, by vote of a majority of the members present and voting, shall have the power to—

"(1) establish general policies and promulgate such rules and regulations for the Commission as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this chapter;

"(2) appoint and fix the salary and duties of the Staff Director of the Sentencing Commission, who shall serve at the discretion of the Commission and who shall be compensated at a rate not to exceed the highest rate now or hereafter prescribed for grade 18 of the General Schedule pay rates (5 U.S.C. 5332);

"(3) deny, revise, or ratify any request for regular, supplemental, or deficiency appropriations prior to any submission of such request to the Office of Management and Budget by the Chairman;

"(4) procure for the Commission temporary and intermittent services to the same extent as is authorized by section 3109(b) of title 5, United States Code;

"(5) utilize, with their consent, the services, equipment, personnel, information, and facilities of other Federal, State, local, and private agencies and instrumentalities with or without reimbursement therefor;

"(6) without regard to 31 U.S.C. 3324, enter into and perform such contracts, leases, cooperative agreements, and other transactions as may be necessary in the conduct of the functions of the Commission, with any public agency, or with any person, firm, association, corporation, educational institution, or non-profit organization;

"(7) accept and employ, in carrying out the provisions of this title, voluntary and uncompensated services, notwithstanding the provisions of 31 U.S.C. 1342, however, individuals providing such services shall not be considered Federal employees except for purposes of chapter 81 of title 5, United States Code, with respect to job-incurred disability and title 28, United States Code, with respect to tort claims;

"(8) request such information, data, and reports from any Federal agency or judicial officer as the Commission may from time to time require and as may be produced consistent with other law;

"(9) monitor the performance of probation officers with regard to sentencing recommendations, including application of the Sentencing Commission guidelines and policy statements;

"(10) issue instructions to probation officers concerning the application of Commission guidelines and policy statements;

"(11) arrange with the head of any other Federal agency for the performance by such agency of any function of the Commission, with or without reimbursement;

"(12) establish a research and development program within the Commission for the purpose of—

"(A) serving as a clearinghouse and information center for the collection, preparation, and dissemination of information on Federal sentencing practices; and

"(B) assisting and serving in a consulting capacity to Federal courts, departments, and agencies in the development, maintenance, and coordination of sound sentencing practices;

"(13) collect systematically the data obtained from studies, research, and the empirical experience of public and private agencies concerning the sentencing process;

"(14) publish data concerning the sentencing process;

"(15) collect systematically and disseminate information concerning sentences actually imposed, and the relationship of such sentences to the factors set forth in section 3553(a) of title 18, United States Code;

"(16) collect systematically and disseminate information regarding effectiveness of sentences imposed;

"(17) devise and conduct, in various geographical locations, seminars and workshops providing continuing studies for persons engaged in the sentencing field;

"(18) devise and conduct periodic training programs of instruction in sentencing techniques for judicial and probation personnel and other persons connected with the sentencing process;

"(19) study the feasibility of developing guidelines for the disposition of juvenile delinquents;

"(20) make recommendations to Congress concerning modification or enactment of statutes relating to sentencing, penal, and correctional matters that the Commission finds to be necessary and advisable to carry out an effective, humane and rational sentencing policy;

"(21) hold hearings and call witnesses that might assist the Commission in the exercise of its powers or duties; and

"(22) perform such other functions as are required to permit Federal courts to meet their responsibilities under section 3553(a) of title 18, United States Code, and to permit others involved in the Federal criminal justice system to meet their related responsibilities.

"(b) The Commission shall have such other powers and duties and shall perform such other functions as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this chapter, and may delegate to any member or designated person such powers as may be appropriate other than the power to establish general policy statements and guidelines pursuant to section 994(a) (1) and (2), the issuance of general policies and promulgation of rules and regulations pursuant to subsection (a)(1) of this section, and the decisions as to the factors to be considered in establishment of categories of offenses and offenders pursuant to section 994(b). The Commission shall, with respect to its activities under subsections (a)(9), (a)(10), (a)(11), (a)(12), (a)(13), (a)(14), (a)(15), (a)(16), (a)(17), and (a)(18), to the extent practicable, utilize existing resources of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts and the Federal Judicial Center for the purpose of avoiding unnecessary duplication.

"(c) Upon the request of the Commission, each Federal agency is authorized and directed to make its services, equipment, personnel, facilities, and information available to the greatest practicable extent to the Commission in the execution of its functions.

"(d) A simple majority of the membership then serving shall constitute a quorum for the conduct of business. Other than for the promulgation of guidelines and policy statements pursuant to section 994, the Commission may exercise its powers and fulfill its duties by the vote of a simple majority of the members present.

"(e) Except as otherwise provided by law, the Commission shall maintain and make available for public inspection a record of the final vote of each member on any action taken by it.

"§ 996. Director and staff

"(a) The Staff Director shall supervise the activities of persons employed by the Commission and perform other duties assigned to him by the Commission.

"(b) The Staff Director shall, subject to the approval of the Commission, appoint such officers and employees as are necessary in the execution of the functions of the Commission. The officers and employees of the Commission shall be exempt from the provisions of part III of title 5, United States Code, except the following chapters: 81 (Compensation for Work Injuries), 83 (Retirement), 85 (Unemployment Compensation), 87 (Life Insurance), 89 (Health Insurance), and 91 (Conflicts of Interest).

"§ 997. Annual report

"The Commission shall report annually to the Judicial Conference of the United States, the Congress, and the President of the United States on the activities of the Commission.

"§ 998. Definitions

"As used in this chapter—

"(a) 'Commission' means the United States Sentencing Commission;

"(b) 'Commissioner' means a member of the United States Sentencing Commission;

"(c) 'guidelines' means the guidelines promulgated by the Commission pursuant to section 994(a) of this title; and

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 25. (a)(1) This Act shall take effect on the first day of the first calendar month beginning twenty-four months after the date of enactment, except that—

(A) the repeal of chapter 402 of title 18, United States Code, shall take effect on the date of enactment;

(B)(i) chapter 58 of title 28, United States Code, shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act or October 1, 1983, whichever occurs later, and the United States Sentencing Commission shall submit the initial sentencing guidelines promulgated to section 994(a)(1) of title 28 to the Congress within eighteen months of the effective date of the chapter; and

(ii) the sentencing guidelines promulgated pursuant to section 994(a)(1), and the provisions of sections 3581, 3583, and 3624 of title 18, United States Code, shall not go into effect until the day after—

(a) the United States Sentencing Commission has submitted the initial set of sentencing guidelines to the Congress pursuant to subparagraph (B)(i), along with a report stating the reasons for the Commission's recommendations;

(b) the General Accounting Office has undertaken a study of the guidelines, and their potential impact in comparison with the operation of the existing sentencing and parole release system, and has, within 150 days of submission of the guidelines, reported to the Congress the results of its study; and

(c) the Congress has had six months after the date described in subclause (a) in which to examine the guidelines and consider the reports; and

(d) the provisions of sections 27 and 28 shall take effect on the date of enactment.

(2) For the purposes of section 992(a) of title 28, the terms of the first members of the United States Sentencing Commission shall not begin to run until the sentencing guidelines go into effect pursuant to paragraph (1)(B)(ii).

(b)(1) The following provisions of law in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act shall remain in effect for five years after the effective date as to an individual convicted of an offense or adjudicated to be a juvenile delinquent before the effective date and as to a term of imprisonment during the period described in subsection (a)(1)(B):

(A) Chapter 311 of title 18, United States Code.

(B) Chapter 309 of title 18, United States Code.

(C) Sections 4251 through 4255 of title 18, United States Code.

(D) Sections 5041 and 5042 of title 18, United States Code.

(E) Sections 5017 through 5020 of title 18, United States Code, as to a sentence imposed before the date of enactment.

(F) The maximum term of imprisonment in effect on the effective date for an offense committed before the effective date.

(G) Any other law relating to a violation of a condition of release or to arrest authority with regard to a person who violates a condition of release.

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 4202 of title 18, United States Code, as in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act, the term of office of a Commissioner who is in office on the effective date is extended to the end of the five-year period after the effective date of this Act.

(3) The United States Parole Commission shall set a release date, for an individual who will be in its jurisdiction the day before the expiration of five years after the effective date of this Act, that is within the range that applies to the prisoner under the applicable parole guideline. A release date set pursuant to this paragraph shall be set early enough to permit consideration of an appeal of the release date, in accordance with Parole Commission procedures, before the expiration of five years following the effective date of this Act.

(4) Notwithstanding the other provisions of this subsection, all laws in effect on the day before the effective date of this Act pertaining to an individual who is—including laws pertaining to terms and conditions of release, revocation of release, provision of counsel, and payment of transportation costs, shall remain in effect as to the individual until the expiration of his sentence, except that the district court shall determine, in accord with the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, whether release should be revoked or the conditions of release amended for violation of a condition of release.

(A) released pursuant to a provision listed in paragraph (1); and

(B)(i) subject to supervision on the day before the expiration of the five-year period following the effective date of this Act; or

(ii) released on a date set pursuant to paragraph (3);

(5) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 991 of title 28, United States Code, and sections 4351 and 5002 of title 18, United States Code, the Chairman of the United States Parole Commission or his designee shall be a member of the National Institute of Corrections, and the Chairman of the United States Parole Commission shall be a member of the Advisory Corrections Council and a nonvoting member of the United States Sentencing Commission, ex officio, until the expiration of the five-year period following the effective date of this Act. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 4351 of title 18, during the five-year period the National Institute of Corrections shall have seventeen members, including seven ex officio members. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 991 of title 28, during the five-year period the United States Sentencing Commission shall consist of nine members, including two ex officio, nonvoting members.

SEC. 26. (a)(1) Four years after the sentencing guidelines promulgated pursuant to section 994(a)(1), and the provisions of sections 3581, 3583, and 3624 of title 18, United States Code, go into effect, the General Accounting Office shall undertake a study of the guidelines in order to determine their impact and compare the guidelines system with the operation of the previous sentencing and parole release system, and, within six months of the undertaking of such study, report to the Congress the results of its study.

(2) Within one month of the start of the study required under subsection (a), the United States Sentencing Commission shall submit a report to the General Accounting Office, all appropriate courts, the Department of Justice, and the Congress detailing the operation of the sentencing guideline system and discussing any problems with the system or reforms needed. The report shall include an evaluation of the impact of the sentencing guidelines on prosecutorial discretion, plea bargaining, disparities in sentencing, and the use of incarceration, and shall be issued by affirmative vote of a majority of the voting members of the Commission.

(b) The Congress shall review the study submitted pursuant to subsection (a) in order to determine—

(1) whether the sentencing guideline system has been effective;

(2) whether any changes should be made in the sentencing guideline system; and

(3) whether the parole system should be reinstated in some form and the life of the Parole Commission extended.

SEC. 27. (a)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), for each criminal fine for which the unpaid balance exceeds $100 as of the effective date of this Act, the Attorney General shall, within 120 days, notify the person by certified mail of his obligation, within 30 days after notification, to—

(A) pay the fine in full;

(B) specify, and demonstrate compliance with, an installment schedule established by a court before enactment of the amendments made by this Act, specifying the dates on which designated partial payments will be made; or

(C) establish with the concurrence of the Attorney General, a new installment schedule of a duration not exceeding two years, except in special circumstances, and specifying the dates on which designated partial payments will be made.

(2) This subsection shall not apply in cases in which—

(A) the Attorney General believes the likelihood of collection is remote; or

(B) criminal fines have been stayed pending appeal.

(b) The Attorney General shall, within 180 days after the effective date of this Act, declare all fines for which this obligation is unfilfilled to be in criminal default, subject to the civil and criminal remedies established by amendments made by this Act. No interest or monetary penalties shall be charged on any fines subject to this section.

(c) Not later than one year following the effective date of this Act, the Attorney General shall include in the annual crime report steps taken to implement this Act and the progress achieved in criminal fine collection, including collection data for each judicial district.

SEC. 28. (a) Title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding the following new chapter after chapter 227:

"CHAPTER 228—IMPOSITION, PAYMENT, AND COLLECTION OF FINES

"Sec.
"3591. Imposition of a fine.
"3592. Payment of a fine, delinquency and default.
"3593. Modification or remission of fine.
"3594. Certification and notification.
"3595. Interest, monetary penalties for delinquency, and default.
"3596. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine.
"3597. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine.
"3598. Statute of limitations.
"3599. Criminal default.

"§ 3591. Imposition of a fine

"(a) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED IN IMPOSING A FINE.—The court, in determining whether to impose a fine, the amount of any fine, the time for payment, and the method of payment, shall consider—

"(1) the ability of the defendant to pay the fine in view of the income of the defendant, earning capacity and financial resources, and, if the defendant is an organization, the size of the organization;

"(2) the nature of the burden that payment of the fine will impose on the defendant, and on any person who is financially dependent on the defendant, relative to the burden which alternative punishments would impose;

"(3) any restitution or reparation made by the defendant in connection with the offense and any obligation imposed upon the defendant to make such restitution or reparation;

"(4) if the defendant is an organization, any measure taken by the organization to discipline its employees or agents responsible for the offense or to insure against a recurrence of such an offense; and

"(5) any other pertinent consideration.

"(b) EFFECT OF FINALITY OF JUDGMENT.—Notwithstanding the fact that a sentence to pay a fine can subsequently be—

"(1) modified or remitted pursuant to the provisions of section 3592;

"(2) corrected pursuant to the provisions of rule 35; or

"(3) appealed;

a judgment of conviction that includes such a sentence constitutes a final judgment for all other purposes.

"§ 3592. Payment of a fine, delinquency and default

"(a) TIME AND METHOD OF PAYMENT.—Payment of a fine is due immediately unless the court, at the time of sentencing—

"(1) requires payment by a date certain; or

"(2) establishes an installment schedule, the specific terms of which shall be fixed by the court.

"(b) INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITIES FOR PAYMENT.—If a fine is imposed on an organization, it is the duty of each individual authorized to make disbursement of the assets of the organization to pay the fine from assets of the organization. If a fine is imposed on an agent or shareholder of an organization, the fines shall not be paid, directly or indirectly, out of the assets of the organization, unless the court finds that such payment is expressly permissible under the applicable State law.

"(c) RESPONSIBILITY TO PROVIDE CURRENT ADDRESS.—At the time of imposition of the fine, the court shall order the person fined to provide the Attorney General with a current mailing address for the entire period that any part of the fine remains unpaid. Failure to provide the Attorney General with a current address or a change in address shall be punishable as a contempt of court.

"(d) STAY OF FINE PENDING APPEAL.—Unless exceptional circumstances exist, if a sentence to pay a fine is stayed pending appeal, the court granting the stay shall include in such stay—

"(1) A requirement that the defendant, pending appeal, to deposit the entire fine amount, or the amount due under an installment schedule, during the pendency of an appeal, in an escrow account in the registry of the district court, or to give bond for the payment thereof; or

"(2) an order restraining the defendant from transferring or dissipating assets found to be sufficient, if sold, to meet the defendant's fine obligation.

"(e) DELINQUENT FINE.—A fine is delinquent if any portion of such fine is not paid within thirty days of when it is due, including any fines to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(f) DEFAULT.—A fine is in default if any portion of such fine is more than ninety days delinquent. When a criminal fine is in default, the entire amount is due within 30 days of notification of the default, notwithstanding any installment schedule.

"§ 3593. Modification or remission of fine

"(a) PETITION FOR MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—A person who has been sentenced to pay a fine, and who—

"(1) can show a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence and concerning whom the circumstances no longer exist that warranted the imposition of the fine in the amount imposed or payment by the installment schedule, may at any time petition the court for—

"(A) an extension of the installment schedule, not to exceed two years except in case of incarceration or special circumstances; or

"(B) a remission of all or part of the unpaid portion including interest and penalties; or

"(2) has voluntarily made restitution or reparation to the victim of the offense, may at any time petition the court for a remission of the unpaid portion of the fine in an amount not exceeding the amount of such restitution or reparation.

Any petition filed pursuant to this subsection shall be filed in the court in which sentence was originally imposed, unless that court transfers jurisdiction to another court. The petitioner shall notify the Attorney General that the petition has been filed within ten working days after filing. For the purposes of clause (1), unless exceptional circumstances exist, a person may be considered to have made a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence only after payment of a reasonable portion of the fine.

"(b) ORDER OF MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—If, after the filing of a petition as provided in subsection (a), the court finds that the circumstances warrant relief, the court may enter an appropriate order, in which case it shall provide the Attorney General with a copy of such order.

"§ 3594. Certification and notification

"(a) DISPOSITION OF PAYMENT.—The clerk shall forward each fine payment to the United States Treasury and shall notify the Attoney General of its receipt within ten working days.

"(b) CERTIFICATION OF IMPOSITION.—If a fine exceeding $100 is imposed, modified, or remitted, the sentencing court shall incorporate in the order imposing, remitting, and modifying such fine, and promptly certify to the Attorney General—

"(1) the name of the person fined;

"(2) his current address;

"(3) the docket number of the case;

"(4) the amount of the fine imposed;

"(5) any installation schedule;

"(6) the nature of any modification or remission of the fine or installment schedule; and

"(7) the amount of the fine that is due and unpaid.

"(c) RESPONSIBILITY FOR COLLECTION.—The Attorney General shall be responsible for collection of an unpaid fine concerning which a certification has been issued as provided in subsection (a).

"(d) NOTIFICATION OF DELINQUENCY.—Within ten working days after a fine is determined to be delinquent as provided in section 3592(e), the Attorney General shall notify the person whose fine is delinquent, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is delinquent.

"(e) NOTIFICATION OF DEFAULT.—Within thirteen working days after a fine is determined to be in default as provided in section 3592(f), the Attorney General shall notify the person defaulting, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is in default and the entire unpaid balance, including interest and penalties, is due within thirty days.

"§ 3595. Interest, monetary penalties for delinquency, and default

"Upon a determination of willful nonpayment, the court may impose the following interest and monetary penalties:

"(1) INTEREST.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, interest at the rate of 1 per centum per month, or 12 per centum per year, shall be charged, beginning the thirty-first day after sentencing on the first day of each month during which any fine balance remains unpaid, including sums to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(2) MONETARY PENALTIES FOR DELINQUENT FINES.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a penalty sum equal to 10 per centum shall be charged for any portion of a criminal fine which has become delinquent. The Attorney General may waive all or part of the penalty for good cause.

"§ 3596. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine

"(a) LIEN.—A fine imposed as a sentence is a lien in favor of the United States upon all property belonging to the person fined. The lien arises at the time of the entry of the judgment and continues until the liability is satisfied, remitted, or set aside, or until it becomes unenforceable pursuant to the provisions of subsection (b). On application of the person fined, the Attorney General shall—

"(1) issue a certificate of release, as described in section 6325 of the Internal Revenue Code, of any lien imposed pursuant to this section, upon his acceptance of a bond described in section 6325(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code; or

"(2) issue a certificate of discharge, as described in section 6325 of the Internal Revenue Code, of any part of the person's property subject to a lien imposed pursuant to this section, upon his determination that the fair market value of that part of such property remaining subject to and available to satisfy the lien is at least three times the amount of the fine.

"(c) APPLICATION OF OTHER LIEN PROVISIONS.—The provisions of sections 6323, 6331, 6334 through 6336, 6337(a), 6338 through 6343, 6901, 7402, 7403, 7424 through 7426, 7505(a), 7506, 7701, and 7805 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6323, 6331, 6332, 6334 through 6336, 6337(a), 6338 through 6343, 6901, 7402, 7403, 7424 through 7426, 7505(a), 7506, 7701, and 7805) and of section 513 of the Act of October 17, 1940 (54 Stat. 1190), apply to a fine and to the lien imposed by subsection (a) as if the liability of the person fined were for an internal revenue tax assessment, except to the extent that the application of such statutes is modified by regulations issued by the Attorney General to accord with differences in the nature of the liabilities. For the purposes of this subsection, references in the preceding sections of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to 'the Secretary' shall be construed to mean 'the Attorney General,' and references in those sections to 'tax' shall be construed to mean 'fine'.

"(d) EFFECT ON NOTICE OF LIEN.—A notice of the lien imposed by subsection (a) shall be considered a notice of lien for taxes payable to the United States for the purposes of any State of local law providing for the filing of a notice of a tax lien. The registration, recording, docketing, or indexing, in accordance with 28 U.S.C. 1962, of the judgment under which a fine is imposed shall be considered for all purposes as the filing prescribed by section 6323 (f)(1)(A) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6323 (f)(1)(A)) and by subsection (c).

"(e) ALTERNATIVE ENFORCEMENT.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, a judgment imposing a fine may be enforced by execution against the property of the person fined in like manner as judgments in civil cases.

"(f) DISCHARGE OF DEBTS. INAPPLICABLE.—No discharge of debts pursuant to a bankruptcy proceeding shall render a lien under this section unenforceable or discharge liability to pay a fine.

"§ 3597. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine

"(a) RESENTENCING.—Subject to the provisions of subsection (b), if a person knowingly fails to pay a delinquent fine the court may resentence the person to any sentence which might originally have been imposed.

"(b) IMPRISONMENT.—The defendant may be sentenced to a term of imprisonment under subsection (a) only if the court determines that—

"(1) the person willfully refused to pay the delinquent fine or had failed to make sufficient bona fide efforts to pay the fine; or

"(2) in light of the nature of the offense and the characteristics of the person, alternatives to imprisonment are not adequate to serve the purposes of punishment and deterrence.

"§ 3598. Statute of limitations

"(a) LIABILITY TO PAY A FINE EXPIRES.—

"(1) twenty years after the entry of the judgment;

"(2) upon the death of the person fined.

"(b) The period set forth in subsection (a) may be extended, prior to its expiration, by a written agreement between the person fined and the Attorney General. The running of the period set forth in subsection (a) is suspended during any interval for which the running of the period of limitations for collection of a tax would be suspended pursuant to section 6503(b), 6503(c), 6503(f), 6503(i), or 7508(a)(1)(I) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6503(b), 6503(c), 6503(f), 6503(i), or 7508(a)(1)(I)), or section 513 of the Act of October 17, 1940 (54 Stat. 1190).

"§ 3599. Criminal default

"Whoever, having been sentenced to pay a fine, willfully fails to pay the fine, shall be fined not more than twice the amount of the unpaid balance of the fine or $10,000, whichever is greater, imprisoned not more than one year, or both.".

(b) Section 3651 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting after "May be required to provide for the support of any persons, for whose support he is legally responsible." the following new paragraph:

"If the court has imposed and ordered execution of a fine and placed the defendant on probation, payment of the fine or adherence to the court-established installment schedule shall be a condition of the probation.".

(c) Section 3651 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out the last paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"The defendant's liability for any unexecuted fine or other punishment imposed as to which probation is granted, shall be fully discharged by the fulfillment of the terms and conditions of probation.".

(d) The second paragraph of section 3655 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"He shall keep informed concerning the conduct, condition, and compliance with any condition of probation, including the payment of a fine or restitution of each probationer under his supervision, and shall report thereon to the court placing such person on probation. He shall report to the court any failure of a probationer under his supervision to pay a fine in default within 30 days after notification that it is in default so that the court may determine whether probation should be revoked.".

(e) Section 4209 of title 18, United States Code, is amended in subsection (a) by striking out the period at the end of the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "and, in a case involving a criminal fine that has not already been paid, that the parolee pay or agree to adhere to an installment schedule, not to exceed two years except in special circumstances, to pay for any fine imposed for the offense.".

(f) Subsection (b)(1) of section 4214 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after "parole" the following: "or a failure to pay a fine in default within 30 days after notification that it is in default".

(g)(1) Section 3565 of title 18, United States Code, is repealed.

(2) The table of sections for chapter 227 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out the item for section 3565 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"3565. Repealed."

(h) Section 3569 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) striking out "(a)"; and

(2) striking out subsection (b).

(i) This section shall be repealed on the first day of the first calendar month beginning twenty four months after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 29. Since, due to an impending crisis in prison overcrowding, available Federal prison space must be treated as a scarce resource in the sentencing of criminal defendants;

Since sentencing decisions should be designed to insure that prison resources are, first and foremost, reserved for those violent and serious criminal offenders who pose the most dangerous threat to society;

Since, in cases of nonviolent and nonserious offenders, the interests of society as a whole as well as individual victims of crime can continue to be served through the imposition of alternative sentences, such as restitution and community service;

Since, in the two years preceding the enactment of sentencing guidelines, Federal sentencing practice should insure that scarce prison resources are available to house violent and serious criminal offenders by the increased use of restitution, community service, and other alternative sentences in cases of nonviolent and nonserious offenders: Now, therefore, be it

Declared, That it is the sense of the Senate that in the two years preceding the enactment of the sentencing guidelines, Federal judges, in determining the particular sentence to be imposed, consider—

(1) the nature and circumstances of the offense and the history and characteristics of the defendant;

(2) the general appropriateness of imposing a sentence other than imprisonment in cases in which the defendant has not been convicted of a crime of violence or otherwise serious offense; and

(3) the general appropriateness of imposing a sentence of imprisonment in cases in which the defendant has been convicted of a crime of violence or otherwise serious offense.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the distinguished majority leader's motion.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Strange as it may seem, I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I once again commend the managers of the bill.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 6 p.m. in which Senators may speak for not more than 2 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEPARTURE OF DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL SCHMULTS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, it is with considerable regret that I note the imminent departure of Edward C. Schmults from the position of Deputy Attorney General of the United States.

During his tenure at the Department, Ed Schmults has been of invaluable assistance to the Attorney General in connection with a wide variety of major initiatives. Foremost among these is the substantial increase in law enforcement efforts against organized crime and drug trafficking. While law enforcement resources have substantially increased during the last 3 fiscal years, resource increases have been accompanied by imaginative management improvements, such as the Law Enforcement Coordinating Committees and the task force approach. These changes have greatly increased the value that the American taxpayer receives for each dollar in the Justice Department budget.

Mr. President, in addition to the initiatives which Ed Schmults has most ably facilitated, one of his major accomplishments has been his effective liaison with the Congress. He has met with the leadership of the House and Senate Judiciary Committees on a regular basis to keep us advised and to receive our views on various matters. He has consistently impressed us with his integrity, competence and cooperative spirit. He will be greatly missed.

Mr. President, on behalf of my colleagues, I commend Ed Schmults on his many accomplishments as Deputy Attorney General and wish him continued success as he reenters the private sector.

THE ARMY'S FISCAL 1985 BUDGET REQUEST—TOO LITTLE AND SACRIFICED BY THE ADMINISTRATION TO BUY STRATEGIC NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, at yesterday's hearing before our Armed Services Committee, I told the Secretary of Defense that the $305 billion budget he is requesting for fiscal 1985 represented the wrong defense spending priorities for our Nation—too much money for unnecessary strategic nuclear weapons and too little for long overdue improvements to our conventional forces, especially in the combat readiness accounts.

The Army's fiscal year 1985 budget we heard about today is an example of these backward and militarily unjustified priorities. Plainly put, it is too small to permit the Army to accomplish its critical national defense missions, and it has been kept that way to fund the wasteful strategic nuclear programs.

No doubt, some will defend this Army budget as sufficient to meet our true security needs by stating it represents about 10-percent growth since fiscal year 1984 after excluding inflation effects. They will imply this means the administration is addressing adequately our conventional forces deficiencies.

But upon what is this 10 percent real growth founded? On the lowest budget base of all three major services. And of all the services, which one needs the most improvement and modernization to counter the Soviet threat? The unglamorous, unmodernized and usually neglected Army.

During the 1970's, the alleged decade of neglect in defense spending, the only service which truly was starved for budget resources was the Army. As the Air Force modernized its forces with a new generation of aircraft—F-15's, F-16's, and A-10's—and the Navy built new ships and aircraft, the F-14's and A-6's, the Army averaged a real decline in its budgets of 5 percent each year.

For the past 16 years, fiscal years 1970-85, the Army has had the lowest real growth, if any, more often than any other service—almost three times more often than the Navy and more than twice as often as the Air Force—Army, 9 years; Navy, 3 years; and Air Force, 4 years. In 14 of the last 16 years, the Army has actually received the lowest or second lowest real growth rate.

The upshot of all this is that while the Navy and the Air Force can point to many areas in which they are qualitatively or quantitatively superior to their Soviet counterparts, the Army enjoys few such advantages at the present time.

This sorry record leads to the inescapable conclusion that our defense programs, especially in recent years, have been terribly out of balance in terms of meeting our security needs.

It means we have underfunded the Army for far too long, despite the fact that we rely on the Army as our first line of defense in NATO Europe, South Korea, Central America, and even Southwest Asia, where Army units are an important part of the rapid deployment force.

Given all this, one would expect that our defense priorities would give the Army the highest real growth in our defense budgets each year, not the lowest. Yet the fiscal year 1985 budget now before us simply perpetuates the unwise trends of the past: the Army is dead last, again, in real growth. Its 10 percent is far less impressive when compared with the Air Force's about 18 percent real growth and the Navy's 15 percent in fiscal year 1985.

In fiscal year 1935, the Air Force is expected to spend $8.2 billion for the B-1B bomber and $5 billion for the MX missile. Those numbers will be even larger in fiscal year 1986 in each program. The President's star wars missile defense system will cost a relatively small amount of dollars in fiscal year 1985, but in the next few years its price is expected to skyrocket to a total of about $24 billion.

While the Air Force is getting billions for nuclear weapons, the Army's fiscal year 1985 budget requests for M-1 tanks and improved 155-millimeter, self-propelled howitzers actually are well below the production levels approved in fiscal year 1984 by Congress—M-1: fiscal year 1984/840 tanks; fiscal year 1985/720 requested; M109A2 howitzer: fiscal year 1984/120; fiscal year 1985/70 requested.

The administration's request now for new Bradley fighting vehicles actually is well below the number it said in last year's defense budget it would procure in fiscal year 1985: fiscal year 1984 projection for fiscal year 1985—830; actual fiscal year 1985 request—710.

Whenever the administration sells its unbalanced defense budget, it flashes charts showing that the Soviets outproduce us by wide margins in many weapons categories. Usually those comparisons are distorted, because allies on both sides are excluded. Tanks, other armored vehicles and artillery, mortars and rocket launchers always are displayed.

Unfortunately, even when you include the allies on both sides, the Warsaw Pact still outproduced NATO by significant margins in these Army weapons between 1974-83. Yet, as I mentioned, the administration's response to this real imbalance has been to reduce the production plans for these programs, thus making the imbalances worse.

If we bought two less B-1 bombers in fiscal year 1985, we probably could restore the production plans in all three of these high priority Army modernization programs.

Now let us look at the rest of the Army's budget as outlined in the joint posture statement submitted by Secretary Marsh and the Chief of Staff, General Wickham. It is replete with references to the Army's combat readiness shortfalls:

Shortfalls in ability to mobilize enough skilled manpower;

Reserve Components that fail desired readiness standards, especially in the combat service support forces;

Critically low war reserve stocks to replace expected combat losses especially ammunition;

Insufficient chemical warfare decontamination equipment;

Shortages of experience NCOs in the combat and intelligence troops;

Serious shortfalls in the Logistics-Over-The Shore equipment delivery capabilities so important to our Rapid Deployment Forces;

A depot maintenance backlog, even though this Administration pledged two years ago to reduce such backlogs to zero at that time;

Major shortages for supporting systems and equipment, including, battlefield recovery, ammunition handling and distribution, and petroleum distribution;

Other known Army readiness shortfalls are: not even enough individual clothing and equipment to outfit the required number of recruits upon mobilization; and probably not enough money in the FY 85-89 defense program to buy enough;

A $1.6 Billion backlog in facilities maintenance and repair, with no reduction to manageable levels until end FY 89;

Possible reduction in ammo procurement rates in FY 85, despite ammunition shortfalls;

Major shortages in Reserve/National Guard equipment, even at end of FY 85-89 program;

A shortage of more than 50,000 tactical vehicles, even after FY 85-89 program;

A $1.25 Billion set of deficiencies in laidaway ammo production base facilities and equipment, according to GAO, with only about $150 million in the Army's FY 86-90 plans to begin addressing it.

This list does not even address the Army's continued modernization needs in such areas as attack helicopters, communications equipment and new howitzers.

That such a list exists is an indictment of both past administrations and the present one when it comes to the Army. At a time when it is spending tens of billions on the B-1B and the MX missile, to say nothing of plans for star wars defenses, this administration's neglect of these important readiness needs is particularly troubling.

I did not ask the Army witnesses today to criticize the budgets of the other services, but I do hope they share my concerns that all this spending on strategic weapons will further threaten the Army's ability to buy the conventional weapons it needs and to support the forces it needs to accomplish its missions.

As this election approaches, more and more people talk about the "peace issue" and the need for arms control to reduce the risks of nuclear war. The President takes to the airwaves to convince the world he is as wary of nuclear war as the rest of us.

One of the best deterrents to nuclear war, as NATO Commander Gen. Bernard Rogers has said, is to have strong conventional forces. We should be investing more in our ground forces who will be the first to brunt any Soviet attack and thus lower the need for us to resort to nuclear weapons. We should be spending less on "pie-in-the sky" missile defenses, nuclear/bombers which will not penetrate long enough or nuclear/missiles which will be vulnerable once they are fully deployed.

As our committee continues its budget deliberations, I hope it will keep uppermost in mind these conventional shortfalls and recognize they are the inevitable legacy of both past neglect and the present administration's unbalanced defense priorities.

I hope Congress will be able to set right these priorities this year.

S. 2219—REMOVAL OF REQUIREMENTS FOR FILING INFORMATIONAL TAX RETURNS

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, on January 26, 1984, the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BOREN) introduced S. 2219, a bill removing the requirements for filing informational tax returns when services are rendered of $600 or more per year. I believe this is a much-needed change, and one which will receive the strong support of small businesses in this country, and I have added my name as a cosponsor of the bill.

Mr. President, this new reporting requirement, which was contained in the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 (TEFRA), is one which is going to place an unreasonable amount of paperwork on many small businesses, and I seriously question whether or not any significant amount of revenue will be raised. I voted against TEFRA when it was before the Senate, and one of the reasons I did was because many of the provisions, while increasing tax compliance, also brought about new forms and requirements that many individuals and businesses will have a great deal of difficulty understanding.

The specific reporting requirement which S. 2219 seeks to repeal requires payors of more than $600 to file informational returns with the Internal Revenue Service setting forth the amount of the payment, the person who received the payment, and their name and address. An additional requirement is that the payor must give notice to the other party by January 31 of the following year, the name, address, taxpayer identification number, and amount of the payment.

Mr. President, in TEFRA the penalties for failure to file an informational return were also increased from $10 to $50 per failure to report, and the maximum penalty is now $50,000.

Mr. President, although I voted against TEFRA, my reason for seeking the repeal of this reporting requirement is simple. It will put additional requirements on paperwork on already strapped small businesses, and force some of them to hire more people just to fill out forms. Although everybody wants to improve tax compliance, I think we have to be very careful before passing legislation which imposes additional costs on individuals and businesses. In some cases, like this one, I do not think the added record-keeping is worth the additional burdens placed on the businessman. Therefore, I think we should repeal this provision.

I urge my colleagues to support this effort, and I hope the Senate will have the opportunity to act on this issue in the near future.

AARP HEALTH AND LONG-TERM CARE POLICY STATEMENT

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, the high cost of health care is of major concern to all Americans today.

During 1983, the Congress was successful in enacting a new, prospective payment system for hospital reimbursement under the medicare program. This change has been heralded as the most revolutionary health care change since the beginnings of medicare and medicaid in the mid-1960's, and will certainly be only the first step of many the Federal Government will take over the next few years to help control health care costs. It is heartening to note that private health insurers, employers, and employee groups, as well as others, are beginning to focus their attentions on health care cost containment strategies as well. Health care in the 1990's and beyond will bear little resemblance to that which we know today.

The American Association of Retired Persons has made exemplary efforts toward raising issues relative to the improvement of our health care systems and to bring the mounting costs of health care under control. Recently the AARP Legislative Council developed a comprehensive health and long-term-care policy statement. This statement is not only timely, but also deserves the close attention of the Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the AARP health and long-term-care policy statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEALTH POLICY

THE HEALTH INDUSTRY

The health care industry is one of the nation's largest economic sectors. In 1981, health spending totalled $287 billion, 15.1 percent above 1980 levels; in 1982, the total was $322 billion, 12.5 percent above the 1981 level. Health care services are taking an increasing share of the nation's total resources—rising from 6.7 percent of GNP in 1967 to 9.8 percent in 1981 and to 10.5 percent in 1982. Federal health care expenditures, if left unchecked, will continue to escalate from $71 billion in FY 1981, to over $110 billion in FY 1984—more than 15 percent of all federal expenditures.

Over the years, government subsidies have encouraged growth in both demand for health care services and in the supply of health care providers. On the demand side, the growth of the third-party payment system has been promoted by the tax laws as well as by the creation of the Medicare and Medicaid programs.

On the supply side, hospital expansion was stimulated by, among other things, the Hill-Burton program and the tax exempt status of hospital construction bonds. In addition, the supply of health professionals has been stimulated by billions of dollars in federal spending for health education and training.

Ironically, government subsidies to increase the supply of medical facilities, services and personnel were expected to moderate growth in health care costs. Policymakers failed to recognize, however, that physician fee-for-service and hospital and other institution cost-plus reimbursement arrangements—both by third-party payors—are the most lucrative payment methods imaginable and are inherently inflationary. The system rewards providers with more and more income for giving more and more care (whether or not it is necessary and beneficial) and for acquiring more and more means for delivering that care.

Morever, because of the focus of third-party reimbursement on hospitals, physicians tend to utilize hospitals—the most expensive component of the medical care system and hospitals tend to expand, encouraging even more utilization.

Expenditures for hospital care have been increasing at double-digit rates for many years. The rate of increase in hospital expenditures in 1981 was 19.3 percent. Hospital expenditures were the largest component (over 41 percent) and the fastest growing component of total health spending, accounting for 4 percent of the gross national product (GNP) in 1981. If greater resources are to be allocated to more health-effective and cost-effective measures and less to purely medical care, the heatlh care industry must be restructured away from costly in-patient care delivered in the hospital setting.

MEDICARE

The most important health care program serving the elderly is Medicare. Because of the structure and economics of the health care system, medical costs in general and hospital costs in particular have been driving up the costs of Medicare. Medicare expenditures were $43.5 billion in 1981, up 21.5 percent since 1980. Hospital care accounted for 74 percent of these expenditures. Medicare's payments to hospitals was 18.8 percent in 1982. Considering the uncontrolled increases in hospital costs in recent years, it is no wonder Medicare costs are escalating so rapidly. The Health Care Financing Administration (HCFA) which administers Medicare estimates that the Hospital Insurance Trust Fund (Medicare Part A) will be exhausted some time in 1990.

Unless fundamental changes in the system are made, cost escalation problems will overwhelm Medicare causing a disintegration of the program's protections and a major disruption in the availability of health care for the elderly and disabled. The longer the delay in addressing the underlying causes of Medicare's financial problems, the more drastic will be the solutions.

Although costs of the Medicare program have continued to escalate, Medicare's per capita share of the elderly's health care bill, estimated to be between 38-44 percent, has been effectively static over time. Today the elderly pay 43 percent of their annual health bill out-of-pocket. One reason for this situation is that only about half of the physicians participating in Medicare Part B (Supplementary Medicare Insurance) are willing to accept "assignment" (i.e., accept as payment in full whatever Medicare determines to be the allowable charge for the service provided). As a result, despite Medicare, the elderly pay 60 percent of all their total doctor bills out-of-pocket.

Anxious to reduce the rate of increase in program costs, Congress has enacted several changes that are expected to reduce Medicare expenditures by an estimated $25-30 billion through fiscal year 1986. Rising costs could prompt more reductions in the near future. However, merely reducing Medicare expenditures through the introduction of either higher premiums and deductibles or changes in reimbursement methods limited to Medicare alone cannot solve the fundamental problems contributing to Medicare's cost escalation nor contribute to a more efficient, less wasteful and more accessible health care delivery system. The most important step in moderating the growth of Medicare expenditures is to control the underlying problem of rising health care costs in general and escalating hospital costs in particular.

MEDICAID

Deep expenditure reductions in Medicare have been compounded by $2.7 billion in Medicaid expenditure reductions through FY 1985. Medicaid is important to the elderly because it finances almost half of long-term, non-acute institutional care. Medicare covers less than 3% of total nursing home costs. Under the Medicaid program, the elderly are forced to rely on their own resources until those are depleted ("spent down") to the point where they become eligible for Medicaid assistance for nursing home care. Given the rapid rate of growth in Medicaid expenditures and the budgetary problems facing the States, it is likely that Medicaid will continue to be a target for further spending reductions.

SHORT-TERM COST CONTAINMENT STRATEGY

Incremental regulatory efforts to restrain the rate of increase in health care costs have generally been overwhelmed by the powerful economic incentives contributing to the growth of health care spending. The Association believes that a better coordinated and more broadly based national cost containment strategy must be pursued. This should have four basic objectives: First, the economic incentives that are causing excessive expansion of conventional medical facilities, particularly hospitals, should be removed. Second, the rate of increase in hospital expenditures and physician fees should be capped across-the-board (that is, for all types of reimbursement, not just public reimbursement, such as under Medicare) to "free-up" resources for other, more health-effective uses. Third, health care service delivery should be restructured away from acute-care institutional settings to make available more needed but less costly services (e.g., home health services). Fourth, government regulatory programs with the potential to yield significant savings should be promoted along with effective measures to develop competition in the health care industry.

Six states (Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Maryland and Washington) have had some measure of success in limiting hospital cost escalation by utilizing mandatory prospective budgeting and/or rate review programs. The Association therefore continues to urge the enactment of federal legislation that establishes minimum standards for the creation and operation of mandatory hospital prospective budgeting and rate review programs at the state level and provides strong financial incentives for the states to act in accordance with those standards.

New initiatives

PROSPECTIVE REIMBURSEMENT

Congress has enacted a prospective payment plan to govern and control Medicare's payments to hospitals. The Association believes that prospective payment can help dampen the rate of increase in hospital costs because: 1. hospitals would be motivated to anticipate and justify future expenditures; 2. hospitals would have the incentive to identify and monitor the cost implications of the quantity, quality and scope of their services; and 3. hospitals would be motivated to keep their actual costs below their reimbursement rates to avoid losses and achieve surpluses.

Unless a prospective payment system applies to all third-party payors however—not just to the public programs, like Medicare and Medicaid—it will not be able to control total health care spending. Hospitals will merely shift unrecovered costs on to private third-party payors.

Under the new prospective payment plan, patients will be grouped according to major diagnostic categories. A hospital will be paid on a per case basis with the amount of payment based on rates calculated for each diagnostic related group (DRG). If a hospital spends more than its DRG rate for a specific diagnosis, it loses money. If it is able to treat the patient for less, the hospital keeps the savings.

The Association supports the continued development of the DRG system because it offers reasonable prospects for achieving a significant degree of cost containment. However, it is essential that states, within certain guidelines, have the flexibility to implement the prospective payment system as they see fit, as long as the savings projected are equal to or greater than the savings under the overall federal plan.

To be successful, the prospective payment system must have a strong utilization review component, otherwise health care providers will manipulate the system to increase their revenue, as for example, by increasing the volume of admissions.

VOUCHERS

Another proposal advanced as a means for controlling costs is the Medicare "voucher" concept. Under a voucher system Medicare beneficiaries would be given a fixed sum or credit with which to purchase a health insurance package in the private insurance marketplace. The intention of such a system is to restrain costs by fostering competition among health insurers and to provide the Medicare beneficiary greater flexibility in choosing a plan that best suits his/her needs. Voucher systems also attempt to make individual insured beneficiaries more cost conscious by requiring them to assume a greater portion of costs out-of-pocket.

Perhaps the most difficult task in developing any Medicare voucher system is establishing a realistic voucher amount. The Association believes that the health status of the individual is one factor that must be taken into account so that participants would obtain benefit coverage that is related to their actual need. However, taking the individual's health status into account in establishing the amount of the health plan premium charged the beneficiary by the insurer should not be allowed. Otherwise, those elderly who have the greatest need for health care services would end up having to pay the highest premiums.

The key to the success of any voucher proposal is informed consumer choice among competing qualified plans. Unfortunately, because of continued provider insistence upon confidentiality and privacy, health care consumers continue to lack necessary comparative cost, quality and performance information upon which to base vital health care decisions. It is essential, therefore, that any Medicare voucher plan contain provisions requiring extensive and specific disclosure with respect to the terms and conditions of coverage provided by participating qualified plans; also essential is ready access to comparative cost, quality and performance information.

BENEFICIARY COST SHARING

Proposals to shift a greater share of Medicare costs onto beneficiaries fall generally into one of two categories. First, there are proposals that would make eligibility for benefits contingent upon a showing of financial need or would vary the amount of cost sharing required (i.e., through deductibles, coinsurance, premiums, etc.) in accordance with income. The second category consists of proposals that would increase cost sharing across-the-board.

Neither of these groups of proposals would do anything to stem the rate of increase in health care costs in general or hospital costs in particular. Although such proposals may reduce the rate of growth in Medicare expenditures in the short term, they would do so at the expense of program beneficiaries, increasing numbers of whom would find themselves unable to afford to enter a hospital or see a physician.

NURSING HOME DEREGULATION

To reduce long-term care expenditures under the Medicaid program the Administration has embarked upon a course of deregulating the nursing home industry. A new set of Survey and Certification Regulations was proposed as a first step in the process. However, Congress passed legislation temporarily blocking implementation of the new regulations. The Association opposes the proposed changes on the grounds that they will undermine the quality of nursing home care and believes they should be replaced by regulations that focus on the actual quality of services received by nursing home patients.

FAMILY SUPPLEMENTATION

The Administration, as part of its FY 1983 budget recommendations, proposed that states be allowed to force the families of Medicaid beneficiaries who are in nursing homes to pay a part of nursing home costs; Congress rejected this idea. HCFA, however, is attempting to reinterpret current law in a manner that will allow states to require adult children to contribute to the cost of nursing home care of a parent receiving Medicaid benefits. The Association firmly believes that HCFA is wrong in its reinterpretation of current law which clearly forbids such "family responsibility" assessments.

Moreover, "family supplementation" or "family responsibility" is wrong as a matter of public policy. Inherent in such a policy would be difficult questions of definition, equity and due process of law—questions which could be resolved only in the most blatantly arbitrary manner.

Since the elderly are major consumers of prescription drugs, they have a major interest in legislation affecting drugs and especially drug prices. Drug manufacturers are supporting legislation to extend the term of patent protection for prescription drugs. They claim such protection is necessary to generate the money to support drug research and development. AARP is opposed to this legislation: First, extending the term of patent protection on prescription drugs, however, would sharply increase the price of patent-protected drugs and delay the introduction of low-cost generic drug substitutes. Second, recent Food and Drug Administration (FDA) changes speed up new drug approval procedures. Third, recent legislation providing tax credits and new subsidies for drug research and innovation provide drug manufactuers with sufficient additional incentive for research and development activity.

The prospect that the drug industry may be allowed to advertise prescription products directly to consumers is another cause for concern. First, consumers may be exposed to misleading information. Second, the cost of advertising could increase drug prices. Third, advertising "brand name" prescription drugs, may cause patents to ask for them by name instead of chemically-equivalent, less expensive generic drugs.

A RESTRUCTURED HEALTH CARE SYSTEM: THE CHALLENGE FOR THE FUTURE

Over the years the Association has supported the development of a comprehensive and coordinated national health care system that would result in more cost-effective delivery of care and the availability of adequate health care for all Americans without regard to ability to pay. Given the firmly entrenched health industry structure, however, and the present budgetary climate of limited resources and fiscal austerity, the achievement of such a comprehensive and coordinated health care system, must remain a long range goal to be achieved in incremental steps.

In addition, in response to demographic trends toward an aging population, an explicit strategy for the delivery of geriatric medical care and health services to the elderly should be adopted. Certainly, health manpower monies should be appropriated for the establishment and operation of educational programs in geriatrics at medical schools and other centers of professional health activities.

In the process of restructuring the health care delivery and financing system, the large and growing out-of-pocket costs the elderly incur for their health care services should be reduced. Although the Association approaches the issue of mandatory Part B assignment with caution, merging Part A and Part B services—and in the process requiring physicians to accept assignment for the services they render to inpatients—seems to offer both financial and administrative advantages. An effective cost containment program along with a substantial reduction in provider fraud and abuse could help pay for the extension of Medicare benefits to include some of the non-covered items and services that account for significant shares of the elderly's out-of-pocket costs, such as outpatient prescription drugs, routine physical exams, eye and hearing care, dental care, and custodial nursing home care. Going further, a Medicare Part C program covering such items and services could be enacted with the cost financed from a monthly premium similar to the Part B premium, federal general revenues or perhaps earmarked excise taxes. Finally, as a component of a restructured health care system, comprehensive mental/physical geriatric assessment units and expanded community-based services should be established to increase access to services. These would also prevent needless institutionalization and facilitate appropriate placement of the mentally infirm.

Failure to contain costs by reforming the way in which health care services are delivered and paid for will condemn the Medicare program to insolvency before the end of this decade. The challenge is to guide the restructuring of the health care system to deemphasize its acute-care, institutionalization bias so that the commitment to accessible, affordable health care for the elderly and disabled is maintained and expanded in areas where needs are not currently being met.

Long-term care

From the elderly's point of view, the lack of a long-term care system that encompasses medical, social and personal care services provided in a variety of community, home-based and institutional settings is the greatest deficiency in the present health care system. Today, 11 percent of the population is age 65 or older; by the year 2015, over 18 percent of the population will be age 65 or older. Moreover, among the elderly, the subgroup of persons age 75 and older is growing most rapidly. These trends are important because the incidence of chronic disease and impairment and the utilization of medical services tends to increase with age, and increase dramatically after age 75.

These factors point to the need for the development and implementation of a long-term care program that would provide not just institutional care, but a complete continum of services, including home-based and community based services. It is generally understood that the eldely are better served when they are helped in maintaining their independence in their homes and communities as long as possible. Yet thorough analysis of existing Federal programs for the delivery of health care and social services (i.e. Medicare, Medicaid, and social services under Title XX of the Social Security Act and Title III of the Older Americans Act) reveals an obvious bias in favor of acute care—not chronic care—and institutional long-term care—not long-term services in the home or community. Furthermore, when it comes to in-home services, community services, special living arrangements, nursing home care and other forms of long-term care at the state or local level, there has been no serious, comprehensive effort from the federal level to encourage the linkage and coordination of the management of these services within the community. All this must change. The ultimate goal must be a long-term care program which provides a complete continuum of care and creates in the process a network of community-based centers that would function as providers, payors, certifiers and evaluators of services.

In addition, the family unit is an important contributor of supporting services and must not be ignored. Certain disincentives to family assistance (such as the one-third reduction in SSI benefits when the beneficiary lives with his/her family) should be removed. On the positive side, federal income tax credits should be made available to provide taxpayers with strong incentives to care for their dependent elderly at home and to utilize adult day care facilities.

Despite the economic and budgetary constraints that are impeding the development of a national long-term care program, some modest steps can be taken that would build upon the progress made in the recent past. For example, with respect to home health services, Medicare's "homebound' and "skilled care" requirements should be eliminated and coverage of homemaker/chore services should be provided. In addition, a comprehensive pre-nursing home admission screening and assessment program for potential nursing home residents should be established.

Increased private sector involvement in meeting long-term care needs should also be explored. Private insurance companies, for example, should be encouraged to add long-term care benefits to existing policies and develop new policies which would specifically address the elderly's long-term care needs.

REVENUE SHARING WORKS IN ARLINGTON HEIGHTS, ILL.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, on September 21, 1983, the Senate voted overwhelmingly to reauthorize the Federal general revenue-sharing program. As all of my colleagues know, I have been an original sponsor and a longtime supporter of this program. It has provided vital assistance to many local governments who could not otherwise afford to make even minimal improvements in the quality of services provided our constituients.

This summer I had the honor of speaking at the annual advisory council dinner for the Community Counseling Center, which is sponsored by the Salvation Army in Arlington Heights, Ill. The center actually serves a five-township area in northwestern Cook County. I was most impressed by the services provided by this outstanding organization. Almost half of the counseling center budget is covered by revenue-sharing funds.

This is the kind of local effort which really makes a difference in the quality of life for so many people across the Nation. I ask that a description of the center's activities be printed in the RECORD at this point. This report, provided to me by Ikuo Yamaguchi, director of the family service division, gives a vivid description of how our Federal revenue-sharing funds are being used at the local level in Illinois.

The material follows:

THE SALVATION ARMY COMMUNITY COUNSELING CENTER

The Salvation Army Community Counseling Center, a private family service agency established in 1965, is a joint effort of the Community and The Salvation Army to provide comprehensive, professional counseling services to a five township area northwest of Chicago, Illinois.

Our primary goal is to strengthen the family. We believe that the family as a social institution, is the most important human resource. People seek our help when a marriage is in jeopardy, when divorce has torn a family apart, when parents and children are in conflict, when a child has a special problem as a learning disability, when an individual has emotional or behavioral problems, when a child or spouse, has been physically abused, when there is drug abuse or alcoholism, when illness or death of a loved one is disruptive to family functioning, and when families are in need of the basic necessities of food, clothing and shelter.

In an effort to assist with these problems, we provide individual, marital, family and group counseling. We make home visits when necessary; we advocate for our clients with public utilities and in court matters; we facilitate client enrollment in educational and job training programs; we participate in school conferences. If we can help, we will coordinate extensively with other agencies to ensure a problem is addressed. We are prepared to work in whatever form and for however long it takes to stabilize and strengthen a family.

If these problems are not addressed, the resultant cost to the community is very high—divorce, family breakdown, individuals unable to function in school and on jobs, increase in dependency on General Assistance and Public Welfare, residential placement of children, hospitalization.

During the past five years we served an average of 3,400 individuals per year or more than 1,000 families annually. During this same five year period our agency received over $729,000 in Federal Revenue Sharing funds from the townships of Wheeling, Schaumburg, Palatine, and Elk Grove. Maine Township will be funding us for the first time this next fiscal year.

On the average, Federal Revenue Sharing funds constitute 43% of our total budget. If Revenue Sharing were to end, either local communities or the state would have to raise their taxes considerably to continue supporting us. Othewise, the number of families we could serve would be cut in half and possibly more. Even now, we are unable to meet the demand for our services and consistently maintain a long waiting list.

A TRIBUTE TO JOHN E. WALLER

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, today I rise in recognition of a great Alabamian who has had a long and distinguished career in the business equipment industry.

THANK YOU, JOHN WALLER

Waller Brothers opened its doors on January 2, 1953. Like a lot of small businesses, it began life with no customers, a good deal of faith and some hard-working dedicated people.

Today, Waller Brothers has 6 stores, 156 employees and sells office supplies, furniture and office machines throughout Alabama, Northern Florida and Southern Mississippi. 1983 will be its best year yet and the future looks even rosier.

John Waller as a director of the company he helped build, is enjoying his retirement with a 621 acre farm. He's proud of the people who now run his company who are all long-term employees.

"I always worked on the premise that a depression was right around the corner. If a customer could only afford one color ink, why, we sold him red. And if you ordered a whole lot of that, we began to worry," says John, with a twinkle in his eye.

People are the key to success. I tried to hire folks from good familes who wanted to work. Once they came here, I did my best to make sure they did work hard.

John Waller has always been deeply involved in his community. He has been director of the Mobile Area Chamber of Commerce, and active member of the Dauphin Way United Methodist Church and past president of the Boys Club of America in Mobile.

He's still a member of the board of the police and firemen's pension fund, and is particularly proud of the fact that the fund has grown in total assets to over $14 million.

In 1978, John Waller underwent open heart surgery. His doctors told him to make the choice between continuing his business and dropping dead or taking it easier and enjoying life.

I came to a crossroads. I knew I had to sell out. I had a very lucrative offer from a large company. But I chose to sell to my employees. That was the best business decision I've ever made. Not only for them, but for me. The business has blossomed, they are successfully operating as a team and I know Waller Brothers is in good hands, run by people who have proven their loyalty to the business and their ability to work hard.

Waller is a native of Mobile, Ala. He attended Southern Military Academy at Greensboro, Ala., and graduated from Riverside Military Academy at Gainesville, Ga., in 1936. His first job was with R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., in southern Mississippi where he served as a sales representative.

In 1941, he joined the U.S. Army as a private and became a second lieutenant after attending OCS. Waller served with Gen. George Patton during World War II in the 65th and 9th Infantry Divisions of the 3d Army and rose to the rank of major.

He was with Patton when they met the Russians in 1945 at Enns, Austria. Waller is especially proud of the fact that he served as battalion executive officer and acting battalion commander under Gen. William C. Westmoreland, who was then regimental commander in the 60th Infantry Regiment of the 9th Division. He served as a special aide to General Patton for a short period in the Army of Occupation. He received the Bronze Star with a cluster and the combat infantryman's badge.

Following World War II, he served as sales manager for Radio Station WKRG, in Mobile. He was recalled to the service in the Korean conflict and served for 2 years at Fort Jackson, S.C. He then returned to Mobile and founded Waller Bros. along with his brother, Joe, in 1953.

Waller served as G-3 in the 31st Division of the Alabama National Guard until 1955 when he retired as a lieutenant colonel.

He is married to the former Mary Anne Risen of Mobile and they have one daughter, Mrs. Suzanne Silva, of Mobile, and two granddaughters, Mary Anne and Margaret. Mrs. Silva's husband, Terry, is executive vice president and general manager of Waller Bros.

Mr. President, I conclude my remarks in recognition of Mr. Waller, with congratulations to him on building Waller Bros. into one of the largest office supply companies in the United States, and for his outstanding business, military, and civic career spanning more than five decades, and with the words: "Thank you, John Waller."

CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI: STEADFAST SOLON AND FRIEND

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, in looking forward to a new year of new challenges for the 98th Congress, it is well for us to pause at its beginning for a moment to consider the year we leave behind and, specifically, those of our colleagues the year gone by has claimed.

To date the recesses of this Congress have taken their toll of our membership. In this Chamber we have mourned the loss of Scoop Jackson, a giant of our number who first came to the Hill to serve the State of Washington more than four decades ago. Nor has death spared the other Chamber: Representative Burton of California, McDonald of Georgia, and now one of my closest friends from my own service in the House of whom I would speak here today: Clement J. Zablocki, who represented his congressional district in Wisconsin since 1948 until his sudden and unexpected death from cardiac arrest on December 3, 1983.

Our friendship had its foundations in our common background: We both grew up in blue-collar neighborhoods, trained as school teachers and began our political careers as State legislators before coming to Washington. The building blocks of this friendship were many: I had enjoyed the hospitality of the people of Wisconsin in World War II as a soldier stationed at Camp McCoy. He in turn had experienced Hawaiian hospitality when he visited us as chairman of the Pacific and Asian Affairs Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. By virtue of this position he and I had considerable contact. He was one of the earliest of our national leaders to focus attention upon the Pacific and our emerging national interests there. While we were in the House together we worked in concert on energy and foreign trade matters as well as aspects of the sea grant program. In 1965 we were members of a congressional delegation from the United States that toured Korea, Taiwan, Vietnam and, en route back, Pakistan and Egypt. I especially remember from that trip lengthy visits we made together with President Chiang Kai-Schek at his villa on Taiwan, and President Shastri of India. After coming to the Senate in 1977 it was my good fortune not to have lost touch with him. His courtesies were always offered in a generous spirit and were most appreciated.

Mr. President, Representative Zablocki served our Nation with distinction and with steadfast service in the House over a period of 35 years. It was Clem's strength that he always kept firm principles in view, recognizing inevitable change with clear insight while retaining a steady outlook on the world. For this he was not thought to be politically fashionable, at times, and his abilities were, occasionally, underestimated by those of lesser experience and stronger passions. Yet his record was consistent, leavened with the selflessness and practical judgment that marked his unpretentious, affable personality. He was a foe of Communist imperialism and supported its enemies of whatever political stripe, but he endeavored to rein in the nuclear arms race and unfailingly worked for economic aid to the Third World, and again without regard to ideological distinctions of the right or left. Under his leadership since 1977 the House Foreign Affairs Committee maintained its key role in helping to forge our foreign policy. He was not one to push himself into the limelight, nor was he one to jealously guard his leadership prerogatives; he allowed his colleagues full sway in their deliberations while he himself steered a central course, in large part behind the scenes.

Nevertheless, he zealously guarded the prerogatives of the institution he served with such dedication for so long a period. When the need was paramount his leadership was asserted—creatively, judiciously, and effectively. As a Milwaukee civics teacher he had instructed his students in the separation of powers under our Constitution. In the years that followed he held fast to the principles he taught at that time. His bias, if it can be called that, was toward supporting the Executive's lead in foreign affairs, without regard to partisanship, but he expected the President to recognize the role of the Congress in initiatives that bore risk to peace. It was his resolution in 1970 which led to the War Powers Act, a historic piece of legislation for which he was the architect. While supportive of President Carter's foreign policy, he was quick to point out any lapse in congressional consultation. Again last year when President Reagan ignored his constitutional responsibilities in regard to the deployment of troops in a peacekeeping mission to Lebanon, he held our Commander in Chief to account. Such was the force of his calm persistence and his decent demeanor that a constitutional crisis was averted on the application of the War Powers Act.

Now that he has left us we keenly appreciate his qualities across the political spectrum. Mr. President, if ever there was a Member of Congress of whom it could be said, "He walked with kings and never lost the common touch," it was he. The President spoke of his "great patriotism" and "wise counsel." Franklin Wallick of the United Auto Workers, noting his unassuming, straightforward manner, remarked that "his common sense and ordinary decency will be sorely missed." Amen to that.

He once wrote to me, "As we advance in life, we acquire a keener sense of the value—and good friends."

Time has taken Clem Zablocki from us, but I, for one, will always treasure having known him and having enjoyed his friendship. His daughter, Jane Frances, and son, Joseph, can take some comfort in the fact that their great loss and deep sorrow is shared by countless friends, like myself.

MR. CONSERVATIVE

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Arizona, Mr. GOLDWATER, saddened us all recently with the announcement that he would not stand for reelection in 1986. We will greatly miss his counsel and friendship in these halls. There is no man or woman among us who would not admit that BARRY GOLDWATER has done more than his share of shouldering the burdens of this Nation. He has fought long and hard for the principles that made this Nation great.

This morning's Washington Times carried an excellent editorial entitled "Mr. Conservative." It points out, and I could not agree more, that it is "difficult to contemplate a Senate devoid of Mr. GOLDWATER'S forceful opinions, incisive intellect, and sparkling wit." We intend to continue seeking his advice and counsel while he is in the Senate with us and look forward to working with him during the next 3 years.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the complete text of the editorial which appeared in the February 2 edition of the Washington Times.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. CONSERVATIVE

It is indicative of the intellectual growth and sustaining power of political conservatism in the United States that a whole generation of young rightists has come of age without ever having glanced at, or, in some cases, even heard of, Sen. Barry Goldwater's 1960 work, The Conscience of A Conservative. Yet for an earlier band of embattled conservatives, the senator's book, indeed even his name, was the banner around which thinking men and women first rallied in the long march from political obscurity to the White House.

We're reminded of those days because Sen. Goldwater, the grand old man of the Grand Old Party, has announced he will not seek re-election when his term expires in 1986. Age and a severe hip ailment have taken their toll on the person many cherish as the paladin of modern conservatism.

Few are the conservatives over age 40 who can forget the fight to the death between the GOP's conservative and liberal wings in the 1964 nominating convention. Today, the words "extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice" have a faintly quaint ring, but 20 years ago they were the call to battle of a nascent grass-roots movement that one day would sweep all before it. The 1964 campaign proved to be the crucible in which the conservative movement was forged.

We also recall that it was during Sen. Goldwater's campaign for the presidency that another conservative of equally indisputable talent and charisma delivered what has come to be called The Speech. Historians and political scientists trace Ronald Reagan's first steps to the White House to the nationwide TV address he made on behalf of Mr. Goldwater two decades ago.

It is difficult to contemplate a Senate devoid of Mr. Goldwater's forceful opinions, incisive intellect, and sparkling wit. From the dark days of 1964 to Mr. Reagan's landslide victory in 1980, Sen. Goldwater has been one of the most effective and galvanizing forces in American politics. He can take a considerable measure of pride in the knowledge that today most Americans, in their hearts, knew he was right.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United states submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

ECONOMIC REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 113

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Joint Economic Committee:

To the Congress of the United States:

I have long believed that the vitality of the American economy and the prosperity of the American people have been diminished by inappropriate policies of the Federal Government: unnecessary government regulations that discouraged initiative and wasted scarce capital and labor; an inefficient and unfair tax system that penalized effort, saving, and investment; excessive government spending that wasted taxpayers' money, misused our Nation's resources, and created budget deficits that reduced capital formation and added to the burden of the national debt; and monetary policies that produced frequent business cycles and a path of increasing inflation.

I came to Washington to change these policies. The needed reforms are far from complete, but substantial progress can already be seen: The burden of regulation has been reduced, tax rates have been lowered and the tax structure improved, Government spending on a wide range of domestic programs has been curtailed, and a sound monetary policy has been established.

Although the full favorable effect of those reforms on our Nation's rate of economic growth will take time to develop, some of the benefit of our economic policies is already visible in the current recovery. The economy's performance in 1983 was very gratifying to me. The 3.2 percent rise in consumer prices between 1982 and 1983 was the lowest rate of inflation since 1967. The recovery produced a sharp drop in unemployment and a substantial increase in the income of American families. The number of people at work increased by more than 4 million and the unemployment rate fell from a high of 10.7 percent in December 1982 to 8.2 percent in December 1983. The 6.1 percent rise in real gross national product (GNP) last year means that real annual income per person in the United States rose $700.

Reducing Unemployment

Despite the substantial reduction in unemployment, the number of unemployed workers remains unacceptably high. Continued economic recovery will mean millions of additional jobs in the years ahead and further declines in the rate of unemployment. In 1984 alone, the American economy is expected to add more than 3 million additional jobs. By the end of the decade, we will need 16 million new jobs to absorb a growing labor force. Only a strong and expanding economy can provide those jobs while achieving a progressively lower level of unemployment over the next 6 years.

Although economic growth is by far the most important way to reduce unemployment, special policies to help the structurally unemployed and particularly disadvantaged groups can also be helpful. To assist these individuals in developing job-related skills that will lead to productive careers in the private sector, I proposed the Job Training Partnership Act that I signed into law in 1982. Last year I proposed additional measures to increase opportunities for training and retraining. Although the Congress has enacted some of my employment proposals, I am still waiting for congressional action on others.

Of particular concern to me is the unemployment among teenagers. Such unemployment is not only a problem in itself, but is also indicative of lost opportunities to acquire on-the-job training and job-related skills. It is widely recognized that the minimum wage law is a substantial barrier to the employment of teenagers, especially minority teenagers. I have proposed that during the summer months the minimum wage for teenagers be reduced to 75 percent of the regular minimum wage. This reform would give many teenagers the opportunity to get a first job and acquire the skills needed to help them with subsequent employment and would not hurt adult employment. With an unemployment rate of nearly 50 percent among black teenagers and with only about 20 percent of black teenagers employed, we must act. The Federal Government must not be the source of barriers to employment.

Inflation and Monetary Policy

Reducing the rate of inflation was my most immediate economic goal when I arrived in Washington. In the preceding 24 months, the consumer price level had increased more than 27 percent. Many people feared the U.S. Government had lost its ability to control inflation. Until inflation was brought under control, a healthy recovery could not get under way.

The inflation rate has declined dramatically over the past 3 years. Between 1982 and 1983, the consumer price index rose only 3.2 percent. Americans can again have confidence in the value of the dollar, and they can save for the future without fearing that the purchasing power of these savings will be destroyed by inflation. I am firmly committed to keeping inflation on a downward path. We must never relax in our pursuit of price stability.

The basic requirement for a continued moderation of inflation is a sound monetary policy. I continue to support the Federal Reserve in its pursuit of price stability through sound monetary policy. Last year was a particularly difficult time for monetary policy because of the substantial changes in financial regulations. I am pleased that, in spite of these difficulties, the monetary aggregates at the end of the year were within their target ranges. I expect that in 1984 the Federal Reserve will expand the money stock at a moderate rate that is consistent with both a sustained recovery and continuing progress against inflation.

There are those who advocate a fast rate of money growth in an attempt to depress interest rates. Experience shows, however, that rapid money growth inevitably leads to an increased rate of inflation and higher interest rates. The only monetary policy that can bring interest rates down, and keep them down, is one that promotes confidence that inflation will continue to decline in the years ahead.

The Dollar and the Trade Deficit

The high interest rates in the United States and our low rate of inflation continue to make dollar securities an appealing investment for individuals and businesses around the world. In addition, the United States has been an attractive place for stock market investment and for direct business investment. The result has been a continued rise in the dollar's exchange value relative to other currencies of the world.

The sharp rise in the value of the dollar since 1980 has made it cheaper for Americans to purchase products from overseas, thereby helping us fight inflation. But the dollar's sharp rise has made it difficult for American businesses and farmers to compete in world markets. The decline in U.S. exports and the substantial rise in our imports has resulted in record trade deficits in 1982 and 1983. The trade deficit has been temporarily exacerbated by the international debt problems and by the more advanced stage of recovery in the United States than in the world at large.

Despite these problems, I remain committed to the principle of free trade as the best way to bring the benefits of competition to American consumers and businesses. It would be totally inappropriate to respond by erecting trade barriers or by using taxpayers' dollars to subsidize exports. Instead, we must work with the other nations of the world to reduce the export subsidies and import barriers that currently hurt U.S. farmers, businesses, and workers.

I am also firmly opposed to any attempt to depress the dollar's exchange value by intervention in international currency markets. Pure exchange market intervention cannot offset the fundamental factors that determine the dollar's value. Intervention in the foreign exchange market would be an exercise in futility that would probably enrich currency speculators at the expense of American taxpayers. A combination of exchange market intervention and expansionary monetary policy could reduce the dollar's exchange value, but only by causing an unacceptable increase in the rate of inflation. The dollar must therefore be allowed to seek its natural value without exchange market intervention.

Regulation

One of the four key elements of my program for economic recovery is a far-reaching program of regulatory relief. Substantial progress has been made during the last 3 years. The growth of new regulations has been reduced by more than a third. The demands on the private sector of government paperwork have been reduced by several hundred million hours a year. The Congress approved legislation that has led to substantial deregulation of financial markets and intercity bus transportation. The Federal Communications Commission, with our support, has reduced the regulation of broadcasting and of new communications technology, and the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Civil Aeronautics Board have gone far down the path of deregulation of competitive transportation markets. The benefits of these and other deregulation measures are now increasingly apparent to American consumers and businesses.

It is also apparent that substantial further deregulation and regulatory reform will require changes in the basic regulatory legislation. I urge the Congress to act on the several measures that I proposed last year on natural gas decontrol, financial deregulation, and reform of private pension regulation. I remain confident that there is a basis for agreement on measures that would reduce the burden of Federal regulations, while protecting our shared values and not jeopardizing safety.

Tax Reforms

The final installment of the 3-year personal tax cut took effect in July, giving a helpful boost to the economic recovery. The income tax rate at each income level has been reduced by about 25 percent since 1980. In 1984 a median income four-person family will pay about $1,100 less than it would have without these tax reductions. And, beginning in 1985, the tax brackets will be adjusted automatically so that inflation will no longer push taxpayers into higher brackets and increase the share of their income taken in taxes.

The Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 went beyond reducing tax rates to establish important reforms in the structure of the tax system. For businesses, the Accelerated Cost Recovery System increased the after-tax profitability of investments in plant and equipment. The sharp fall in inflation has also increased after-tax profitability. As a result, investment in business equipment has recently been quite strong despite the high real interest rates.

For individuals, the Economic Recovery Tax Act reduced the marriage tax penalty, the estate tax burden, and tax discrimination against saving. The response to the universal eligibility of Individual Retirement Accounts (IRAs) has been far greater than was originally expected. It is estimated that more than 15 million individuals now use IRAs to save for their retirement. Last year, I proposed to expand the opportunity for all married couples to use IRAs fully by allowing them to contribute up to $2,000 each per year to an IRA even if only one has wage income.

Further improvement and simplification of our tax system are sorely needed. The burden of taxation depends not only on the quantity of tax revenue that is collected but also on the quality of the tax system. I have asked the Secretary of the Treasury to develop a plan of action with specific recommendations to make our tax system fairer, simpler, and less of a burden on our Nation's economy. By broadening the tax base, personal tax rates could come down, not go up. Our tax system would stimulate greater economic growth and provide more revenue.

Government Spending

One of my principal goals when I came to Washington was to reverse the dramatic growth of Federal spending on domestic programs and to shift more resources to our Nation's defense. Although many doubted this could be done, both goals are being achieved. We must do everything that we can to avoid waste in defense as in other areas of government. But we must also be willing to pay the cost of providing the military capability to defend our country and to meet our responsibilities as the leading Nation of the free world. Outlays for defense had declined to only 5.2 percent of GNP in 1980, less than one-fourth of total government outlays. By the current fiscal year, defense outlays have increased to 6.7 percent of GNP and 28 percent of total outlays. Real defense outlays have grown 39 percent since 1980. Our spending on defense, however, remains a far smaller percentage of our national income than it was in 1960, when defense outlays took 9.7 percent of GNP.

Real spending has been cut on a wide range of domestic programs and activities. Many wasteful bureaucratic activities have been eliminated and the number of nondefense employees on the Federal payroll has been reduced by 71,000. We have examined every area of Federal Government spending, and sought to eliminate unnecessay and wasteful spending while protecting the benefits needed by the poor and the aged. As a result, total nondefense spending now takes a smaller share of our GNP than it did in 1980. Moreover, under present law, nondefense spending will continue to take a declining share of our GNP in the years ahead.

This reduction has been accomplished without any decrease in existing social security benefits or any change in the medicare benefits for the elderly. Spending on all other nondefense activities and programs has actually declined over 12 percent in real terms since 1980. Even with no further reductions in these activities and programs, their share of GNP in 1986 will be nearly back to the level of 1965.

I am committed to continuing the search for ways to reduce Government spending. The budget that I am submitting to the Congress identifies significant savings in entitlement programs and reductions in outlays for other programs that are excessive or that are not the proper responsibility of the Federal Government. The Grace Commission has given us some 2500 ways to reduce wasteful spending that could save billions of dollars in the years ahead.

Budget Deficits

I have long believed that our Nation's budget must be balanced. A pattern of overspending by the Federal Government has produced a deficit in 22 of the last 23 years. My most serious economic disappointment in 1983 was therefore the failure of the Congress to enact the deficit reduction proposals that I submitted last January in my budget for fiscal 1984. We would be much closer to a balanced budget today if the Congress had enacted all of the spending cuts that I have requested since assuming office, and if the long recession and the sharp decline in inflation had not substantially reduced real tax revenue. In last year's budget I proposed changes in outlays and revenues that could put the deficit on a sharply declining path that, by 1988, would have been less than 2 percent of GNP and on its way to a balance of revenues and outlays.

The unwillingness of the Congress to accept the proposals that I offered has made it clear to me that we must wait until after this year's election to enact spending reductions coupled with tax simplification that will eventually eliminate our budget deficit. But we cannot delay until 1985 to start reducing the deficits that are threatening to prevent a sustained and healthy recovery. I have therefore called on the Democratic and Republican leaders in the Congress to designate representatives to work with the Administration on the development of a "downpayment" deficit reduction program.

I believe that this bipartisan group could develop a package that could be enacted this spring which would reduce the deficit by about $100 billion over the next 3 fiscal years. The package could include a number of the less contentious spending cuts that are pending before the Congress plus additional outlay savings based on the proposals of the Grace Commission. Additional revenue could be provided by measures to close certain tax loopholes—measures that the Department of the Treasury has previously said are worthy of support.

These deficit reductions can increase the public's confidence in our economic future and their faith in the ability of the political system to deal satisfactorily with the deficit. The downpayment package can be a first step toward full elimination of the remaining deficits. Even with a 3-year $100 billion package, the deficits projected for fiscal 1986 and beyond are totally unacceptable to me. They would be a serious threat to our Nation's economic health and a heavy burden to future generations. I am committed to finding ways to reduce further the growth of spending and to put the budget on a path that will lead to a balance between outlays and receipts. In 1985 I will submit a budget that can achieve this goal. But we must go further and make basic structural reforms in the budgetary process—including the line-item veto and the balanced budget amendment—that will keep spending under control and prevent deficits in the future.

Looking Ahead

As I look ahead, I am very optimistic about the prospects for the American economy. Substantial progress has been made in reforming the economic policies that will shape our economic future. If we continue to develop and pursue sound policies, our Nation can achieve a long period of strong economic growth with low inflation, and the American people can enjoy unprecedented prosperity and economic security.

RONALD REAGAN.

February 2, 1984.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 2:04 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following bill, with amendments, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 820. An act to amend section 7 of the Earthquake Hazards Reduction Act of 1977 (42 U.S.C. 7706) to extend authorizations for appropriations, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

At 5:27 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bill:

H.R. 2727. An act to codify without substantive change recent laws related to money and finance and transportation and to improve the United States Code.

The enrolled bill was subsequently signed by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS

The following communications were laid before the Senate, together with accompanying papers, reports, and documents, which were referred as indicated:

EC-2441. A communication from the Chairman of the Council of the District of Columbia, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of D.C. Act 5-98 adopted by the Council on January 3, 1984; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-2442. A communication from the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, Executive Office of the President, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report entitled "Reducing Federal Paperwork 1980-1983"; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-519. Resolution adopted by the Evrytanian Association of American "Velouchi" relating to Cyprus; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-520. Resolution adopted by the Fifth Chief Executives Conference of the Federated States of Micronesia relating to the Compact of Free Association legislation; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-521. Resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Guam; to the Committee on Finance.

"RESOLUTION No. 51

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the Territory of Guam:

"Whereas, Sections 301 and 303 of U.S. Public Law 92-603 amended Title XIV of the Social Security Act in its entirety under the title "Supplemental Security Income (SSI) Program for the Aged, Blind, and Disabled" and repealed Title XIV of the Social Security Act respectively, effective January 1, 1974; and

"Whereas, Section 303(b) of U.S. Public Law 92-603 did not repeal Title XIV of the Social Security Act, therefore not extending the benefits to the territories of Guam, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands; and

"Whereas, all of the residents of the fifty states of the United States who are eligible and have applied for this assistance under the Supplemental Security Income Program for the Aged, Blind, and Disabled, are now enjoying its full benefits; and

"Whereas, the residents of Guam's neighboring islands of the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas are now enjoying the full benefits of the Supplemental Security Income (SSI) Program as a result of their present political status; and

"Whereas, the people of Guam firmly believe in the equal right to equal treatment of any resident or citizen of the United States to the benefits available to them from the United States Federal Government with no regard to race, color, creed and geological remoteness or boundaries; and

"Whereas, there are presently 930 residents of Guam presently receiving public assistance under the Aged, Blind and Disabled Programs, and other potentially eligible residents of this territory who would definitely prefer to receive the more expanded benefits of the Supplemental Security Income Program; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Seventeenth Guam Legislature respectfully request the Honorable Antonio B. Won Pat to introduce legislation to amend appropriate sections of the Social Security Act and thereby make possible the extension of the benefits of the Supplemental Security Income Program to the territory; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Seventeenth Guam Legislature request the Governor and Lieutenant Governor of Guam, through their Washington, D.C. Office, and the Director of Public Health and Social Services to seek the support of the Federal Government, specifically the Department of Health, and Human Services, to aid in passage of this particular legislation; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Speaker certify to and the Legislative Secretary attest the adoption hereof and that copies of the same be thereafter transmitted to the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives; to the President of the U.S. Senate; to the Secretary of Health and Human Services; to Guam's Delegate to Congress; to the Director of Public Health and Social Services; to the Governor's Special Assistant in Washington, D.C.; to the Lieutenant Governor of Guam and to the Governor of Guam."

POM-522. Joint resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois; to the Committee on Finance.

"HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 76

"Whereas, Unemployment in the auto and related industries continues to be one of the most pressing problems in the State of Illinois; and

"Whereas, A proposed increase of the Japanese Voluntary Restraint Agreement level from 1.68 to two million units would cost our Country nearly 100,000 jobs; and

"Whereas, The increase could result in the loss of 11,000 jobs in this State from auto manufacturers, suppliers and related industries; and

"Whereas, The increase in the Voluntary Restraint Agreement could result in the closing of a major auto assembly plant in this State with the direct loss of 4,200 jobs, over $75 million annually in payroll, and a loss to the State of over $5 million in taxes; therefore it

"Resolved, by the House of Representatives of the Eighty-Third General Assembly of the State of Illinois, the Senate Concurring herein, That we urge the President of the United States to instruct the U.S. Trade Representative to achieve a commitment from the Japanese Government for a continued Voluntary Restraint Agreement not to exceed the present 1.68 million units and preferably reduced by 250,000 units; and further to extend the terms of such agreement for a period of three years or until such time as the current difficult economic adjustments shall have been achieved; and be it further

"Resolved, That a suitable copy of this preamble and resolution be presented to President Ronald Reagan, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from Illinois in the Congress of the United States."

POM-523. Joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Delaware; to the Committee on Finance.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 2

"Whereas, the Social Security system represents the bulwark of our nation's income maintenance effort for well over 36 million Americans; and

"Whereas, two-thirds of all Social Security beneficiaries depend upon this program for half of their annual income; and

"Whereas, the United States Congress is presently considering plans to make the Social Security System more actuarially sound; and

"Whereas, a payroll tax speed-up and reduced benefits for those presently in the work force are regrettably among the options being considered by Congress; and

"Whereas, present recipients of Social Security, who have earned their benefits and have a "contract" with the United States government guaranteeing their benefits, should not be required to suffer because of actuarial mistakes of the past. Now, therefore:

"Be it resolved, By the Senate and the House of Representatives of the 132d General Assembly of the State of Delaware, with the approval of the Governor, that members of the 98th Congress of the United States are hereby urged to vote against any reduction in benefits for current recipients of Social Security benefits.

"Be it further resolved, That suitable copies of this Senate Joint Resolution be forwarded to the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate, United States Congress, and to members of the Delaware Congressional delegation immediately upon its adoption and signature by the Governor."

POM-524. Resolution adopted by the Florida Federation of Republican Women requesting Congress to provide for the President the power to disapprove any item of appropriation in any act or joint resolution, except legislative and judicial appropriations; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-525. Resolution adopted by the Board of Directors of the National Association of Women Judges relating to dealing with funding for judicial education and other court improvement programs; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-526. Resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the State of Illinois; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"HOUSE RESOLUTION No. 314

"Whereas, Within a little more than a decade since the enactment of Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, which prohibited sex discrimination against students and employees in institutions receiving federal assistance, significant strides have been made on behalf of economic, educational and social equality for women; and

"Whereas, included among the positive results of the application of Title IX have been a marked increase in the enrollment of women in graduate schools—particularly law and medical schools, greater athletic opportunities for women, the development of policies prohibiting sexual harassment and procedures to redress sex discrimination, increased fairness in the awarding of financial aid to women students, and the general erosion of tired notions regarding appropriate and inappropriate occupational and societal roles for women; and

"Whereas, The progress Title IX has accomplished in its short lifetime is evidenced by statistics which reveal a greater than 1000% increase in the number of women enrolled in dental schools, a 28% increase in girls' participation in interscholastic high school athletics and the 440 more colleges now offering athletic scholarships for women; and

"Whereas, While the achievements accomplished as a result of Title IX have been many, a great deal remains to be done if total equality for women in our society is to be a reality; therefore be it

"Resolved, by the House of Representatives of the Eighty-Third General Assembly of the State of Illinois, That this House recognizes the positive contributions which the provisions of Title IX have made to the women of this State, and thereby to Illinois as a whole, and reaffirms its commitment to the maintenance of those provisions and their continued application; and be it further

"Resolved, That suitable copies of this preamble and resolution shall be presented, respectively, to President Ronald Reagan, Vice President George Bush in his capacity as President of the Senate, Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, and the members of the Illinois Congressional Delegation."

POM-527. Concurrent resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas, Congress is currently considering legislation which would substantially reform this country's immigration laws; and

"Whereas, A section of this legislation provides for permanent resident status for aliens who have resided continuously in the United States for a fixed period; and

"Whereas, Passage of the immigration reform bill would necessitate the selection of a computer center to process the aliens' applications; and

"Whereas, The Immigration and Naturalization Service will apparently select either a site in Pennsylvania or a site in Tennessee as the central processing center for these applications; and

"Whereas, Being designated as the processing center will mean approximately 700 temporary jobs to the site selected and most likely would provide a number of permanent benefits; and

"Whereas, The Immigration and Naturalization Service would do well to choose a site in Pennsylvania because the State's economic situation would benefit dramatically, because there are excellent facilities already in place, and because of Pennsylvania's industrious workforce; therefore be it

"Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring), That the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania memorialize the United States Immigration and Naturalization Service to choose a site in Pennsylvania as the computer center to process aliens' applications as provided in the Immigration Reform Act if enacted; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be, upon final adoption, transmitted to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, each Senator and Representative from Pennsylvania, and the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service in the United States Department of Justice."

POM-528. A resolution adopted by the Southeast Conference of Mayors, borough managers, and council person relating to the Environmental Protection Agency; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

POM-529. A resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the State of Alaska; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"HOUSE RESOLVE No. 4

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives:

"Whereas Audun Endestad has lived in the United States since 1974, and is married to an American citizen; and

"Whereas he has substantially complied with the requirements for American citizenship; and

"Whereas he placed first in the United States cross-country skiing time trials, thus qualifying for a position on the United States Olympic Cross-country Ski Team, but will be allowed by the United States Olympic Committee to ski in the 1984 Winter Olympic Games only if he has been granted full American citizenship by January 29, 1984; and

"Whereas Audun Endestad developed his skiing ability in large measure in the United States and is an inspiration to the United States Olympic Cross-country Ski Team both as an athlete and personality; and

"Whereas the United States would be both honored and benefitted by Audun Endestad's participation on the United States Olympic Cross-country Ski Team at the 1984 Winter Olympic Games; and

"Whereas the State of Alaska would be honored if Audun Endestad was granted his citizenship in time to permit him to participate in the 1984 Winter Olympic Games as a member of the United States Olympic Cross-country Ski Team inasmuch as Mr. Endestad is a resident of this state and is married to a daughter of a Supreme Court justice of this state; and

"Whereas the United States Senate passed S. 1863 on November 18, 1983, to allow Mr. Endestad to become a naturalized citizen without delay but the United States House of Representatives has not yet passed the legislation;

"Be it resolved by the Alaska House of Representatives that Congress is respectfully urged to expedite favorable the citizenship of Audun Endestad; and be it

"Further resolved that the United States Immigation and Naturlization Service is respectfully urged to expedite the naturalization of Mr. Endestad before January 29, 1984.

"Copies of this resolution shall be sent to the Honorable George Bush, Vice-President of the United States and President of the U.S. Senate; the Honorable Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives; and to the Honorable Ted Stevens and the Honorable Frank Murkowski, U.S. Senators, and the Honorable Don Young, U.S. Representative, members of the Alaska delegation in Congress."

POM-530. Joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine; to the Committee on Appropriations.

"JOINT RESOLUTION

"We, your Memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Maine in the Second Special Session of the One Hundred and Eleventh Legislature, now assembled, most respectfully present and petition the Congress of the United States, as follows:

"Whereas, military action against recognized governments of nations in Central America is in violation of American and international law, and this violation is now under court-ordered investigation by the United States Department of Justice; and

"Whereas, convert paramilitary operations run a grave risk of provoking full scale war at a time when over 5,000 United States troops are in Honduras and United States warships are stationed off both coasts of Nicaragua; and

"Whereas, these covert paramilitary operations do serious injury to the world reputation of the United States as a defender of peaceful democratic change; and

"Whereas, funding of such covert paramilitary operations contradicts our own democratic process by denying the United States Congress and the American public any information or debate on this action; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved: That We, your Memorialists, do hereby respectfully urge and request the United States Congress to vote to end immediately the funding for United States covert paramilitary operations in Central America; and be it further

"Resolved: That a duly authenticated copy of this resolution be immediately submitted by the Secretary of State to the Honorable Ronald W. Reagan, President of the United States, the Honorable George Bush, President of the Senate and the Honorable Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress, and to the members of the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives from the State of Maine."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. D'AMATO:

S. 2249, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to exclude from gross income amounts distributed from individual retirement accounts and certain qualified trusts which are attributable to tax exempt interest; to the Committee on Finance.

DIVERSIFICATION OF IRA INVESTMENTS

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today I introduce legislation which would diversify the range of investments available to individuals contributing to Individual Retirement Accounts (IRA's) and Keogh plans and, at the same time, provide a much-needed infusion of funding for city and State governments. My proposal would permit the distribution of income from IRA and Keogh plans to be tax exempt if the income was derived from investments in State or local bonds.

There are many IRA proposals presently before the Senate. Unfortunately, most of these bills involve significant revenue losses for the Federal Government. My bill, on the other hand, would provide the municipal bond market with over $20 billion a year in additional funds, with only a negligible cost to the Treasury in the first year, and $100 million in each of the following 2 years, according to estimates completed by the Congressional Budget Office.

As part of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (ERTA), Congress greatly expanded the use of IRA's and retirement plans for self-employed individuals (Keoghs). Congress expanded these investment vehicles because of concern that a large number of the country's workers would otherwise face the prospect of retiring without the resources needed to provide adequate income levels.

These provisions were designed to promote retirement savings by individuals during their working years by increasing the amount which individuals could set aside in an IRA or Keogh plan. The expanded use of IRA's and Keogh's is consistent with the Reagan administratin's goal of encouraging capital formation, rather than consumption. IRA's and Keogh's were part of an array of investment vehicles created or expanded by ERTA, all designed to assure sustained economic growth through higher savings levels.

IRA's and Keogh's have been a tremendous success. In 1982, over $28 billion flowed into IRA and Keogh instruments. Individuals received substantial tax breaks, while our Nation's economy was stimulted by the accumulation of investment capital.

IRA and Keogh plans provide two tax benefits: contributors enjoy tax deferral on the principal invested and the interest earned, and most individuals are in a lower tax bracket when the funds eventually are distributed.

In spite of the great benefits of these savings programs, however, there has been an unintended side effect: they encourage people to invest in taxable, rather than tax-exempt securities. This is because IRA's and Keogh's have reduced tax rates for contributors and lower tax rates reduce the incentive to purchase municipal bonds. This otherwise beneficial program can produce a trend of long-term damage to the municipal bond market. I do not oppose IRA's and Keogh's, but as a former local official, I remain sensitive to how vital the municipal market is for the continued health of city and State governments.

The tax-exempt municipal market is the primary source of funding for State and local governments. Without this avenue of financing, local governments would simply be unable to provide essential services for their citizens.

Several factors in the past few years have contributed to the decline of this important market. The 3-year, 25 percent reduction in personal income taxes mandated in ERTA has had the positive effect of encouraging investment by corporations and saving by individuals. However, as I noted, lower tax rates also have had the effect of encouraging individuals to shift their investments from tax-exempt securities to taxable activities. This, in turn, reduces the demand for municipal bonds and drives up tax-exempt rates. I say this not as a criticism of the President's tax strategy. I believe the tax cuts have been beneficial to the economy. I only point out the negative effect this has had on the municipal bond market.

The recession has also had a detrimental impact on the tax-exempt bond market. The tax base has been eroded, causing the credit quality of States and cities to deteriorate. This lower credit quality makes municipal bonds less attractive. The Federal Government also has reduced aid to local governments, which has further exacerbated their credit decline. In addition, the demand for municipal bonds by commercial banks and savings and loans has dropped. Heretofore, financial institutions have been the single largest purchaser of municipal securities. Part of this decline in demand can be attributed to the provision of TEFRA which dissallowed 15 percent of the otherwise allowable interest deduction allocable to debt incurred to purchase tax-exempt obligations by financial institutions. Finally, reduced capital gains rates have worked to weaken the municipal bond market. Again, a decline in tax rates reduces the incentive to shelter income in municipal bonds.

IRA's and Keogh's have had a beneficial effect on savings and on the economy in general, but unfortunately have contributed to the deterioration of the municipal bond market. Because all tax-deferred income distributions from an IRA or Keogh are treated as ordinary income, individuals saving for retirement have no incentive to place their contributions in tax-exempt assets. This is because interest rates on municipal bonds are lower than rates on taxable bonds. Thus, the IRA's overall yield net of tax would be lower if the funds were invested in municipal securities, as opposed to in taxable bonds. The result is that billions of dollars in IRA's and Keogh's are now being funneled into taxable investments, rather than into city and State bonds. This phenomenon has contributed to the further erosion of the ability of local government to raise capital. The resultant reduced demand for municipal bonds will mean higher interest rates. These increased interest expenses are passed along in the form of either higher taxes, borne primarily by middle-class local property owners, or a reduction in services. This reduction in services hurts all citizens, but the burden falls most heavily on the needy.

My proposal, Mr. President, would help rectify this problem. By allowing individuals who invest their IRA or Keogh contributions in municipal bonds to receive tax-exempt distributions of income, we would not be creating another tax shelter—we would simply be returning to the municipal bond market a potential pool of capital which it has been deprived of since the creation of IRA's and Keogh's. Furthermore, my proposal would not mandate that any funds be directed into municipal securities. It would simply give investors of IRA's and Keogh's this option. The municipal bond market, as well as the corporate market, should benefit from IRA and Keogh investment capital.

In 1982, there were 14.5 million individuals participating in IRA's and 865,000 participating in Keogh's. Many of these people would benefit from my proposal. In fact, the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) estimates that if this bill were to go into effect in fiscal year 1984, up to 12 million people would invest their IRA contributions in tax-exempt obligations. This is because IRA funds can be distributed before a person retires, as early as age 59½. Because these people are still working, many of them are in a tax bracket high enough to benefit from the special tax status afforded municipal bonds. CBO estimates that these people could invest up to $15 to $20 billion the first year, and $23 to $24 billion the second year, a much needed infusion of capital into the municipal bond market.

As I noted, the revenue loss from this program is estimated to be very small, negligible the first year and only about $100 million a year for the 2 years following. This is surely a small price to pay for the tremendous benefits of a stimulated municipal bond market and additional savings incentives for individuals planning for retirement.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to support this legislation.●

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself and Mr. MOYNIHAN):

S. 2250. A bill to authorize Federal financial assistance to the government of Nassau County, N.Y., for necessary antiterrorist and security-related expenses associated with hosting the 1984 International Games for the Disabled; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SECURITY ASSISTANCE FOR INTERNATIONAL GAMES FOR THE DISABLED

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation authorizing the Department of Justice to assist Nassau County, N.Y., in meeting extraordinary and necessary antiterrorist and security-related expenses during the 1984 International Games for the Disabled.

I am pleased to have my distinguished colleague from New York join me as a cosponsor of this legislation. In June of this Year, these games will bring together, for the first time in the United States, world-class amputee and blind athletes, and athletes with cerebral palsy, multiple sclerosis, muscular dystrophy, and other handicaps; 1,500 disabled athletes from dozens of countries will compete in a variety of Olympic events.

These games are a significant, formally recognized, international athletic competition, officially sanctioned by the International Olympics Committee. They require of their host-country-support services, similar to those required of Los Angeles, to assure that they are conducted in a secure and hospitable environment.

Unfortunately, we live in a time of increased terrorist activity. Thus, there is cause for concern over possible terrorist activity at the games. The Nassau County Police Department estimates that its cost for security at the games will exceed $6 million.

Even under the legislation I am introducing today, however, local government will meet approximately 90 percent of the security costs for the games. Nevertheless, it is appropriate that the Federal Government provide some small measure of assistance. The recent bombings at the Capitol and elsewhere are vivid reminders of the destruction that can result when security is not adequate. For reasons I do not pretend to understand, international athletic events have been especially favorite targets of terrorists.

Last November, the Congress approved $45 million in the Department of Defense appropriations bill to provide security and other essential services at the Olympics being held this year in Los Angeles. The International Games for the Disabled may not be as well publicized as the Olympics, but they, too, might become the targets of terrorism. They are certainly no less deserving because they feature the physically disabled.

For these reasons, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation and the humanitarian goals and principles it seeks to promote. I also ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that my legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2250

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representative of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. The Congress finds that—

(1) the 1984 International Games for the Disabled, which are to be held in Nassau County, New York, in June, 1984, will provide the citizens of the United States the unique opportunity to host an athletic competition involving disabled athletes;

(2) the Games will bring together for the first time in the United States world-class amputee, blind, cerebral palsy, and les autres athletes representing dozens of nations in a variety of athletic events;

(3) the Games will increase appreciation for life-long physical fitness and expand competitive sports programs for the disabled throughout the United States; and

(4) Nassau County will incur extraordinary and substantial cost in providing police protection and security for the Games, particularly against terrorism, and, because of the substantial national benefit to be derived from these Games, it is appropriate for the Federal government to provide financial assistance.

SEC. 2. The Attorney General shall make grants totaling $850,000 to the government of Nassau County for anti-terrorist and other security-related expenses associated with hosting the 1984 International Games for the Disabled.

SEC. 3. The Attorney General is authorized to prescribe such rules as are necessary to carry out ths Act.

SEC. 4. Grants under this Act may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement.

SEC. 5. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated $850,000 for the fiscal years ending September 30, 1984 and September 30, 1985 for payments to the government of Nassau County for anti-terrorist and other security-related expenses associated with hosting the 1984 International Games for the Disabled.

SEC. 6. The preceding provisions of this Act shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.●

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today and join my colleague from New York, Senator D'AMATO, in offering legislation authorizing financial assistance, in the form of grants to the government of Nassau County, N.Y., to help defray certain expenses incurred in hosting the 1984 International Games for the Disabled. It is traditional for the host of the Winter Olympics to host this competition 4 years later. The State of New York and the village of Lake Placid had the honor of hosting the 1980 Winter Games, and this summer Nassau County will reciprocate by hosting the games for the disabled. This unique competition will be one of the Nation's most important sporting events and will be widely attended. President Reagan himself is expected to be on hand for the games.

In view of the tremendous costs Nassau County already will be absorbing, I believe it would be appropriate to help the county defray the costs of the extensive security arrangements required to host these games. Hosting the games for the disabled is an honor for the entire country, and one that is not often bestowed upon us. The financial burden should not rest entirely on the shoulders of the county of Nassau, N.Y. I encourage my colleagues to support this legislation.●

By Mr. DURENBERGER:

S. 2251. A bill to establish a uniform Federal policy governing the use of Federal funds for lobbying by contractors and grantees and to provide for the disclosure to Members of Congress of the costs of certain exempted activities; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

LOBBYING BY FEDERAL GRANTEES

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today it is my pleasure to introduce the Uniform Lobbying Cost Principles Act of 1984. This bill establishes a uniform Federal policy governing the use of Federal funds for lobbying by contractors and grantees, and provides for the disclosure to Members of Congress of the cost of certain exempted communications. The legislation is designed primarily to provide specific legislative guidance to the Office of Management and Budget and other agencies currently promulgating lobbying cost principles through revisions to OMB Circular A-122 and Federal procurement regulations.

"A-122" is the name that has been given to the Reagan administration's proposal to establish general restrictions on the use of Federal funds for "lobbying and related legislative activities." By now, I doubt that many of my colleagues could have avoided hearing about the A-122 controversy—a small number of Washington-based organizations have expended a great many resources to keep it in the spotlight. These lobbying organizations have skillfully manipulated facts, dragged out conservative "defund the left" rhetoric, and tapped a reservoir of anger at the administration over other issues to inflame the emotions of many well-meaning members of the nonprofit community. They have generated thousands of letters, all of them urging exactly the same thing: Withdraw A-122.

Many of the individuals and organizations who have written in response to this orchestrated grassroots campaign are my friends. I care about their concerns, both real and imagined. But I also care deeply about the integrity of the legislative process. Except in certain cases, when I vote for Federal programs to purchase a good or service, or to assist a particular segment of society, I am not voting to fund aggressive lobbying campaigns in the Congress or State legislatures in behalf of any vested third-party interests. As a general rule, lobbying campaigns are not appropriate items of expenditure under Federal grants or contracts. And were Congress to precipitate the withdrawal of A-122, as we are being pressured to do, it would not only undercut this basic "good government" policy, but it would confirm in the minds of much of the body politic that Congress has lost control of its own process.

Accordingly, I am introducing S. 2251 as a constructive middle ground in this debate. The legislation would supersede A-122 with congressionally mandated cost principles specifically designed to resolve the major substantive issues surrounding the administration's proposal. One legitimate concern is that A-122 could inhibit desirable nonpolitical communications between the grantees and contracts, who carry out Federal programs, and the Congress, which authorizes them. Another is that organizations would face unnecessary recordkeeping costs in conforming to nonuniform procurement regulations and Circular A-122 definitions that differ from section 4911 of the Internal Revenue Code.

S. 2251 would restrict the use of Federal funds only with respect to costs knowingly incurred in direct support of "influencing legislation," as defined in the Internal Revenue Code with minor modifications. Exempt from this definition would be traditionally nonpolitical legislative activities such as legislative liaison, making available the results of nonpartisan analysis, and providing technical advice and assistance to governmental officials. Moreover, the legislation exempts from restrictions all local lobbying, all activities funded under block grants and competitive fixed priced contracts, and most State-level lobbying. In States that have waived the lobbying restrictions, all State-level lobbying would be exempt. Clearly, the design of this approach is to err, if we must err, on the side of free and open dialog between legislators and contractors and grantees.

But in opting for only minimal restrictions in this area, we are also leaving open the possibility that considerable grant and contract funds could be channeled into exempted communications that would otherwise constitute the influencing of legislation. To address this legitimate concern of OMB, I have included a provision in the legislation to require organizations to notify a Member of Congress when the cost of the technical advice they are providing the Member will exceed $100 and it will be allocated to a grant or contract. This modest disclosure requirement will assure that those of us who initiate requests for technical assistance will be aware of their cost and that they are publicly funded. This, in turn, will permit us to exercise appropriate restraint in making such requests and eliminate the need for suffocating rules to prevent abuses of this activity.

Finally, the legislation instructs the Director of OMB to develop, in full and open consultation with all interested parties, the minimum number of guidelines that are required to implement this policy. As part of this process, the Director would be required to identify and publicize any authorizations in Federal programs which promote the participation of certain underrepresented groups in the political process. Programs such as the Older Americans Act, the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, the Rehabilitation Act, the Head Start Act, and title IV-B of the Social Security Act all contain such authorizations. These authorized activities would not be restricted under this legislation.

Mr. President, I recognize that this bill is not yet perfect in the eyes of those affected. I am sure the specifics will change somewhat over the coming weeks of negotiations. What I am trying to begin here is a process in which all interested parties can work with me in a spirit of good will and nonpartisanship to develop a suitable policy to replace A-122. I will continue to negotiate for substantive changes in A-122 in hopes of narrowing the differences between the administration's proposal and my bill. However, I retain my belief that any policy that comprehensively regulates lobbying activities—even when they are federally subsidized—is more appropriately formulated in legislation than through initiatives of the executive branch.

The Congress is an affected party under A-122, and Congress should have the final say in formulating any such policy. Mr. President, I do not unconditionally oppose the withdrawal of A-122. But until it becomes clear that my efforts to develop a legislative compromise in this area cannot be successful, I will continue to oppose the withdrawal of A-122 and to urge my colleagues to join me on the constructive middle ground.

Mr. President, at this time I ask that a copy of S. 2251 a factsheet and a section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD, along with my comments this afternoon. Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2251

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Uniform Lobbying Cost Principles Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. Except as otherwise provided under Federal law, a commercial or nonprofit organization shall not allocate the cost of influencing legislation to—

(1) a Federal or federally assisted grant or cooperative agreement, other than a block grant; or

(2) a contract with a Federal agency, other than a competitive firm fixed price contract.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. (a) As used in this Act the term—

(1) "influencing legislation", except as otherwise provided in paragraph (2), means—

(A) any attempt to influence legislation through trying to affect the opinions of the general public or any segment thereof, and

(B) any attempt to influence legislation through communication with any member or employee of a legislative body, or with any government official or employee who may participate in the formulation of legislation,

(2) "influencing legislation" for the purpose of this section, does not include—

(A) making available the results of nonpartisan analysis, study or research;

(B) providing technical advice or assistance (where such advice would otherwise constitute the influencing of legislation) to a governmental body or to a committee or a subdivision thereof in response to a request by any official or employee of such body or subdivision, as the case may be;

(C) communication between an organization and its bona fide members with respect to legislation or proposed legislation of direct interest to the organization and such members, other than communications described in subsection (b);

(D) any communication with a government official or employee, other than—

(i) a communication with a member or employee of a legislative body (where such communication would otherwise constitute the influencing of legislation), or

(ii) a communication the principal purpose of which is to influence legislation;

(E) any communication (where such communication would otherwise constitute the influencing of legislation) in connection with an employee's service as an elected or appointed government official or member of a governmental advisory panel; and

(F) any communication (where such communication would otherwise constitute the influencing of State legislation)—

(i) in a State which has waived the applicability of this Act to such communication pursuant to section 4(a) of this Act, or

(ii) with respect to a possible decision by a governmental body or committee or subdivision thereof which might affect the ability of the organization or cost to the organization of performing any grant, cooperative agreement, or contract described in section 2 of this Act;

(3) "legislation" includes action with respect to Acts, bills, resolutions, or similar items by the Congress or any State legislature, or by the public in a referendum, initiative constitutional amendment, or similar items;

(4) "action", when used with respect to legislation, is limited to introduction, amendment, enactment, defeat, or repeal;

(5) "making available" means the least costly method of communicating the results of nonpartisan analysis, study or research to an official or employee of a governmental body or committee or subdivision thereof;

(6) "nonprofit organization" means any organization described in sections 501 (c)(3) and (c)(4) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 501(c) (3) and (4));

(7) "the cost of influencing legislation" means the total of expenditures knowingly undertaken in direct support of a communication when the purpose of such communication is to influence legislation; and

(8) "governmental body" means a Federal, or State executive or legislative body.

(b)(1) A communication between an organization and any bona fide member of such organization to directly encourage such member to communicate as provided in subsection (a)(1)(B) shall be treated as a communication described in such subsection.

(2) A communication between an organization and any bona fide member of such organization to directly encourage such member to urge persons other than members to communicate as provided in either subparagraph (A) or (B) of paragraph (1) shall be treated as a communication described in paragraph (1)(A).

STATE WAIVER

SEC. 4. (a) A State may waive the application of this Act to all communications which would otherwise constitute the influencing of State legislation by notifying the Director of Management and Budget of such election in writing.

(b) Except as provided in section 3(a)(2)(F)(ii), nothing in this Act shall prohibit a State which has provided a notification under subsection (a) from promulgating uniform rules for the allocation of the cost of influencing State legislation under federally assisted grants or cooperative agreements which are administered by such State.

DISCLOSURE OF FUNDING

SEC. 5. (a) Whenever the cost of an organization's technical advice or assistance to a Member of Congress, or the Member's staff, under section 3(a)(2)(B) will (1) be allocated to a grant, agreement, or contract described in section 2, pursuant to this Act, and (2) the amount so allocated will exceed $100, the organization shall provide a written notice to such Member setting forth the actual or estimated cost of such advice or assistance, and specifying the particular grant, agreement or contract to which such costs will be allocated.

(b) This section shall not apply with respect to any activity which has been specifically authorized by Congress.

(c) Whenever the cost of a communication described in subsection (a) will be allocated to more than one grant, agreement, or contract, an organization may, in lieu of specifying the particular Federal or federally assisted grant or agreement, or the particular contract with a Federal agency, to which such cost will be allocated, provide an estimate of the percentage of the organization's total revenues which are derived from Federal or federally assisted grants or agreements, or from contracts with a Federal agency.

ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 6. (a) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget (hereinafter referred to as the "Director") shall promulgate in full and open consultation with the heads of other Federal agencies, interested commericial and nonprofit organizations, and the Congress, such uniform guidelines as are minimally necessary to carry out this Act. Such consultation shall include public hearings designed to educate affected parties with respect to the applicability and intent of this Act.

(b) The heads of Federal agencies shall implement by regulations the guidelines promulgated under subsection (a).

(c) The guidelines promulgated under subsection (a) shall be developed in full accord with the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1980 (44 U.S.C 3501 et seq.) and chapter 6 of title 5, United States Code.

(d) Prior to promulgating any guidelines under subsection (a), the Director shall identify and publicize any authorization in the laws of the United States which permits any communication the purpose of which is to influence legislation.

REPEALS

SEC. 7. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any portion of any Federal rule, regulation, circular or guideline which is in conflict with this Act is hereby superseded.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 8. This Act shall take effect on the date of its enactment.

SECTION BY SECTION ANALYSIS: THE UNIFORM LOBBYING COST PRINCIPLES ACT

POLICY

Section 1. This section establishes a uniform Federal policy governing the use of Federal funds to influence legislation by contractors and grantees. It provides that, except as otherwise provided in Federal law, commercial and nonprofit organizations may not allocate the cost of influencing legislation to a grant, other that a block grant, or a contract, other that a competitive firm fixed price contract. Block grants are excluded from coverage under the Act because the purpose of such a grant is to give the administering State or local government the greatest possible discretion over the uses of the grant moneys. Currently, for example, federal grant cost principles contained in OMB Circular A-122 ("Cost Principles for Nonprofit Organizations") do not apply to block grants. Competitive firm fixed price contracts are excluded because the awarding of such contracts is based primarily on cost.

DEFINITIONS

Section 2. Subsection (a)(1) defines the term "influencing legislation," a term which is modified further throughout this section. This definition is essentially similar to the definition of such term in section 4911 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. Under paragraph (1), the general rule is that "influencing legislation" means any attempt to influence legislation through (1) trying to influence the opinions of the general public or any segment thereof, or (2) communication with any government official or employee who may participate in the formulation of legislation.

Paragraph (2) identifies those communications not included in the term "influencing legislation." These exceptions adhere closely to those provided in section 4911 of the IRC, with minor modification. Subparagraph (A) provides that "making available the results of nonpartisan analysis, study or research" is not influencing legislation. This exemption is to assure that Members of Congress and other governmental officials are appraised of objective facts which may assist them in policy formulation. As with other exemptions in this paragraph, the cost of making available such information would not be subject to general disallowance. However, auditors will continue to have the discretion to disallow reimbursement for such activity when it is not an "ordinary and necessary expenditure" within the purpose of the grant or contract. This definition is modified in paragraph (5), which provides that the term "making available" is limited to the least costly method of communicating the results of nonpartisan analysis, study or research to an official or employee of a governmental body. This modification is designed to prohibit extravagant expenditures.

Subparagraph (B) exempts from general disallowance any "technical advice and assistance" provided at the specific request of an official or employee of a governmental body. The purpose of this exception is to assure that governmental officials may continue to have access to the technical expertise of contractors and grantees who administer Federal programs. This exception differs from an analogous exception in section 4911 of the IRC in that it would not require a "written" request as documentation for the purpose of making this area of expenditure reimbursible under a grant or contract. However, prudent accounting principles would dictate that in the vast majority of cases, it will be desirable to solicit a written request from a governmental official or employee in order to document that such advice and assistance is not "influencing legislation." Since nonprofit organizations require such records under section 4911, the impact of not requiring a written request is not expected to be significant; it is primarily to insure that oral responses to oral requests for information are not the subject of onerous recordkeeping burdens. Also, the notification required in section 4(a) would normally constitute sufficient documentation. Finally, it is intended that a general invitation to testify in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would constitute a request for assistance.

Subparagraph (C) provides that communications by an organization to its bona fide membership with respect to legislation or proposed legislation of direct interest to such members is not influencing legislation, except as provided in subsection (b). Subsection (b) modifies this subparagraph to provide that any communication to such members which directly encourages such members to influence legislation or to urge other persons to influence legislation constitutes the influencing of legislation. The language of subparagraph (C) and subsection (b) is drawn directly from section 4911 of the IRC.

Subparagraph (D) is also drawn from section 4911 and provides that any communication with a governmental official does not constitute the influencing of legislation, except where the communication (1) is with a member or employee of a legislative body, and would otherwise constitute the influencing of legislation, or (2) has as its principal purpose the influencing of legislation.

Subparagraph (E) provides that any communication made in connection with an employee's service as an elected or appointed governmental official or member of a governmental advisory panel does not constitute the influencing of legislation. This exception is not found in section 4911 of the IRC and has been added for the protection of State and local officials.

Subparagraph (F) provides that certain communications at the State level will not constitute the influencing of State legislation. Any communication in a State which has waived the applicability of this Act under section 3 is exempted. Also, any communication with respect to a possible decision by a governmental body or committee or subdivision thereof which might affect the ability of the organization or cost to the organization of performing any grant, contract or agreement identified in section 1 would not constitute the influencing of State legislation. These exceptions are not found in section 4911 of the IRC. However, a "self-defense" lobbying provision, analogous to the one described in this subparagraph, is found in section 4911 which excepts lobbying with respect to an organization's tax status. That section was omitted from this Act, as its purpose is specific to the Tax Code. The "self defense" provision in this subparagraph is to allow the grantee or contractor to lobby in behalf of the Federal Government when State actions would impose a burden on the efficient accomplishment of a grant, contract or agreement that is federally funded.

Paragraph (3) defines the term "legislation" to include action with respect to Acts, bills, resolutions, or similar items by the Congress or any State legislature, or by the public in a referendum, initiative, constitutional amendment, or similar items. This definition is taken from section 4911 of the IRC, except that section 4911 also covers action by local city councils. This legislation would not cover any action by a local city council.

Paragraph (4) defines the term "action" as limited to the introduction, amendment, enactment, defeat or repeal of legislation. This language is taken directly from section 4911 of the IRC.

Paragraph (5) defines the term "making available" as the least costly method of communicating the results of nonpartisan analysis, study or research to an official or employee of a governmental body.

Paragraph (6) describes a "nonprofit organization" as any organization described in sections 501 (c)(3) and (c)(4) of the IRC. This definition is purposely narrow in order to provide the Federal Government with the necessary flexibility to apply the policies and objectives of this Act to other kinds of nonprofit organizations in ways that take into account their particular circumstances and characteristics. However, this section is not intended to limit the applicability of this Act only to the kinds of nonprofit organizations that are described in this paragraph.

Paragraph (7) defines the "cost of influencing legislation" to mean any expenditure knowingly undertaken in direct support of a communication the purpose of which is to influence legislation. This is the basic cost principle of the Act, and is designed to provide that legislative liaison and other nonpolitical legislative activities are not construed to be unallowable items of expenditure under Federal grants and contracts.

Subsection (b) modifies subsection (a)(2)(C) to provide that an organization's communication with its membership would constitute the influencing of legislation if such communication directly encourages such members to influence legislation or to urge others to influence legislation.

STATE WAIVER

Section 3. This section set forth the procedure under which a State could waive the restrictions in this Act with respect to the influencing of State legislation, and establish State regulations governing the allowability of allocating the cost of influencing State legislation to grants and contracts. Subsection (a) provides that a State may waive the applicability of this Act to all communications which would otherwise constitute the influencing of State legislation by notifying the Office of Management and Budget or such an election in writing. Subsection (b) establishes that nothing in this section prohibits a State which has exercised a waiver under subsection (a) from promulgating its own regulations in this area, except that organizations will still be able to influence legislation as provided under section 2(a)(2)(F)(ii). The intent of this section is to give State governments the greatest possible discretion over whether or not there should be any general restriction with respect to the allowability of the cost of influencing State legislation. Nothing in this section, however, permits a State to develop regulations that allow the influencing of Federal legislation under Federal contracts or Federal or federally funded grants or cooperative agreements.

DISCLOSURE OF FUNDING

Section 4. This section provides for the disclosure to Members of Congress of the cost of certain exempted communications which would otherwise constitute the influencing of legislation. Subsection (a) requires an organization to notify any member when the cost of providing technical advice and assistance to such member or the member's staff will exceed $100 and will be allocated to a grant, contract or agreement. Such notification would include a statement of the actual or estimated cost of such assistance and the particular grant, contract, or agreement to which such cost will be allocated.

The intent of this section is to assure that Members of Congress who initiate requests for technical advice or assistance will be aware of its cost and that it is publicly funded, so that they may exercise the appropriate restraint in the absense of general rules to the contrary. This section is deemed necessary to complement the very narrow definition of "influencing legislation" used in this Act.

Subsection (b) establishes a special rule when the cost described in subsection (a) is an indirect cost that is allocated among more than one grant, agreement, or contract. In lieu of identifying the particular grants, agreements or contracts to which such cost would be allocated, the organization may provide an estimate of the percentage of the organizations revenues which are derived from all such grants, agreements, or contracts.

Subsection (c) provides that this section shall not apply with respect to any activity which has been specifically authorized by Congress. These include certain activities authorized under the Older Americans Act, the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, the Head Start Act, and title IV-B of the Social Security Act—a list that is not meant to be all-inclusive.

ADMINISTRATION

Section 5. This section establishes requirements for the implementation of this Act. Subsection (a) provides that the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall develop in full and open consultation with the heads of other Federal agencies, interested commercial and nonprofit organizations, and the Congress, the minimum number of guidelines necessary to implement this Act. The provision requires that such guidelines shall be designed to apply uniformly to all commercial and nonprofit organizations. Subsection (b) requires the heads of other Federal agencies to incorporate such guidelines in regulation. Subsection (c) requires that the guidelines developed pursuant to subsection (a) be undertaken in accord with the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1980 and the Regulatory Flexibility Act of 1980 in order to minimize paperwork costs.

Subsection (d) requires the Director of OMB to identify and publicize any authorization in Federal law requiring a State or local agency, or a nonprofit organization, to advocate for or otherwise promote the political interests of a particular segment of society. Such authorizations permit the influencing of legislation using federal grant funds. Examples of such authorizations include: the Older Americans Act (42 U.S.C. 3205, 3206, 3027); the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act (42 U.S.C. 6012, 6063, 6067); the Rehabilitation Act (29 U.S.C. 731); and the Social Security Act, title IV-B (42 U.S.C. 625). The intent of this section is that an exhaustive review of all Federal grant authorizations will identify all authorized activities that are not subject to the provisions of this Act.

REPEALS

Section 6. This section provides that any portion of any Federal rule, regulation, circular, or guideline which is in conflict with this Act would be superseded. The intent is not only to supercede OMB Circular A-122, to the extent that it is in conflict with this Act, but NASA, DOD, GSA and other procurement regulations as well. These agencies presently have the authority to promulgate procurement regulations that may vary from guidelines recommended by the Office of Management and Budget. It is expressly intended that this section constitute an exception to the authority in the Property Acts of such agencies to deviate from the guidelines developed pursuant to section 4(a) of this Act.

EFFECTIVE DATE

Section 7. This section provides that the Act will take effect immediately upon its enactment.●

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 2252. A bill to restructure the Federal employees health benefits program to strengthen financial control over the program and enhance competition among participating health benefits plans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES HEALTH BENEFITS REFORM ACT

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce and share with my colleagues an important legislative effort to increase Federal employees' freedom of choice in their selection of a health benefits' program.

The current Federal employee health benefit program offers considerable choice to employees and retirees. Federal employees have a wide range of health benefit coverage to select from at varying rates. The FEHB has demonstrated the feasibility of a competitive multiple choice health plan. In 1983, a large number of Federal employees were cost conscious in their selection of health insurance. Savings attributed to employees selecting low option plans with higher cost sharing or employees shifting to other health plans are estimated to be $90 to $150 per family.

Its reliance on employees' individual selection among competing health insurance plans makes the FEHBP illustrative of a free market competition plan. The legislation I am today introducing would improve upon it, to make the FEHB more competitive and so, more conducive to improving health care quality at less cost.

The Federal Employees Health Benefit Reform Act would convert the mammoth Federal health insurance program to a system that would provide workers and retirees with annual vouchers to buy their own health insurance.

The bill allows the Federal Government to issue a voucher to each employee and retiree that would more than cover the full cost of so-called no frills, low option health plans. Vouchers would come in two amounts: One for single coverage; or a higher amount for those purchasing more expensive family plans. The voucher would allow Federal workers to pick low-cost plans and pocket any difference between the premium and the amount of the voucher. It institutionalizes an incentive for health insurers to cut their premium costs, and for employers to choose more economical plans. Coverage for families would be assured while increasing patient awareness of the cost of services.

Last May, as chairman of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee, I chaired 2 full days of hearings on the rising tide of health care costs. For example, we learned that in 1982, health care costs were $322 billion or 10.5 percent of the gross national product, up from 6 percent in 1965. Economic forecasters suggested that unless effective action is taken, costs in health care will continue to rise unabated and that by 1990 projected costs will be over $750 billion or 12 percent of the GNP. It is no secret that our country's health care system is inherently inflationary and too often rewards waste, inefficiency, duplication of services, and overutilization.

This is principally why I advocate increased health care competition. I believe competition will control some of the problems. Competition among suppliers of health services must include a wider consumer choice and a greater price sensitivity on selection of the health benefits and protections.

My hearings and their conclusions lead naturally to the Federal Employees Health Benefit Reform Act. Others have reached the same conclusion. I would like to pay tribute to Representative DANNEMEYER who has introduced this same legislation in the House of Representatives, H.R. 3798, and to OPM Director, Dr. Donald J. Devine for daring this novel approach which exemplifies the legislative spirit of health care competition. In line with Dr. Devine's spirited advocacy of increased competition; I understand President Reagan is including Federal health insurance vouchers in his forthcoming budget request. As more of our Federal budget is absorbed by health expenditures, I applaud competitive approaches like these as the only solution in sight. How else are we as responsible legislators going to conquer health care cost inflation without vanquishing our liberties along with it.

Dr. Devine, Director of the Office of Personnel Management has suggested to me a number of important objectives which would be accomplished by the legislation:

Encourage vouchered competition among health benefit plans by opening programs to a broader range of private insurance carriers, to allow more choice to employees and to encourage price competition among plans. Decrease Government intrusion into benefit design and rate setting of these private insurance plans and rely on market forces instead to encourage carriers to offer the most attractive benefits at the lowest rates, subject to minimum requirements with respect to catastrophic protection.

Give Federal employees and annuitants a broader range of plans, with different benefits and rates, from which to choose a health benefits package best suited to the needs of themselves and their families.

Control costs to the Government, by replacing the present benefit-driven Government contribution formula with a new formula indexed to the percentage change in the implicit price deflator for the gross national product.

Encourage employees and annuitants to select lower cost plans, with their built-in incentives for discouraging overutilization of services, by removing the present 75-percent limitation on the Government contribution toward the cost of any particular health plan or level of benefits and by authorizing case rebates of up to 40 percent of the authorized Government contribution rate in cases of enrollees who select health benefits plans which cost less than such contribution.

Reduce administrative expenses for the entire program by lessening Government involvement in the private health plans and their relationship with their enrollees.

Require OPM to declare a 30-day open enrollment season in advance of any changes in benefits or premiums under approved health plans.

Although this legislation will probably be referred to the Governmental Affairs Committee, chaired by my distinguished colleague, Senator STEVENS, I have great interest in this legislation and give my full commitment to working with like-minded colleagues in fashioning a health insurance voucher system worthy of congressional approval and the President's signature. At this time I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the legislation be printed in the RECORD and I further urge my colleagues review this far-reaching positive approach to reducing health care costs.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"(A) an employee as defined by section 2105 of this title;

"(B) a Member of Congress as defined by section 2106 of this title;

"(C) a Congressional employee as defined by section 2107 of this title;

"(D) the President;

"(E) an individual employed by the government of the District of Columbia, unless otherwise provided by the District of Columbia Council in accordance with section 714(c) of the Act of December 24, 1973 (87 Stat. 819);

"(F) officers and employees of the United States Postal Service, unless otherwise provided by the Postal Service in accordance with section 1005(f) of title 39, United States Code;

"(G) an individual employed by Gallaudet College;

"(H) an individual employed by a county committee established under section 590h(b) of title 16; and

"(I) an individual appointed to a position on the office staff of a former President under section 1(b) of the Act of August 25, 1958 (72 Stat 838);

but does not include—

"(i) an employee of a corporation supervised by the Farm Credit Administration if private interests elect or appoint a member of the board of directors;

"(ii) an individual who is not a citizen or national of the United States and whose permanent duty station is outside the United States, unless the individual was an employee for the purpose of this chapter on September 30, 1979, by reason of service in an Executive agency, the United States Postal Service, or the Smithsonian Institution in the area which was then known as the Canal Zone;

"(iii) an employee of the Tennessee Valley Authority; or

"(iv) an employee excluded by regulation of the Office of Personnel Management under section 8909(b) of this title;

"(2) 'Government' means the Government of the United States and the government of the District of Columbia;

"(3) "annuitant" means—

"(A) an employee who retires on an immediate annuity under subchapter III of chapter 83 of this title or another retirement system for employees of the Government, after five or more years of service or for disability;

"(B) a family member who receives an immediate annuity as the survivor of an employee or of a retired employee described by subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;

"(C) an employee who receives monthly compensation under subchapter I of chapter 81 of this title and who is determined by the Secretary of Labor to be unable to return to duty; and

"(D) a family member who receives monthly compensation under subchapter I of chapter 81 of this title as the surviving beneficiary of—

"(i) an employee who died as a result of injury or illness compensable under that subchapter; or

"(ii) a former employee who died while receiving monthly compensation under the subchapter and who had been held by the Secretary to have been unable to return to duty;

"(4) 'service' as used in paragraph (3) of this section, means service which is creditable under subchapter III of chapter 83 of this title;

"(5) 'family member' means the spouse of an employee or annuitant and an unmarried dependent child under 22 years of age, including—

"(A) an adopted child or recognized natural child; and

"(B) a stepchild or foster child, but only if the child lives with the employee or annuitant in a regular parent-child relationship; or such an unmarried dependent child regardless of age who is incapable of self-support because of mental or physical disability which existed before age 22;

"(6) 'dependent', in the case of any child, means that the employee or annuitant involved is either living with or contributing to the support of such child, as determined in accordance with such regulations as the Office shall prescribe, or if the employee or annuitant is deceased, the deceased individual lived with or contributed to the support of such child immediately before death;

"(7) 'health benefits plan' means a group insurance policy or contract, medical or hospital service agreement, membership or subscription contract, or similar group arrangement provided by a carrier for the purpose of providing, paying for, or reimbursing expenses for health services;

"(8) 'carrier' means—

"(A) one or more not-for-profit corporations which are organized and authorized under the laws of a State or the District of Columbia for the primary purpose of operating a service benefit health plan, or plans, under which prepaid hospital, medical, surgical, and related services are provided to subscribers to such plan or plans pursuant to participation agreements between the corporation and physicians, hospitals, and other providers of health services, or any legal entity which is licensed under the laws of a State or the District of Columbia to issue group health insurance policies providing indemnity benefits to covered individuals for specified health care expenses and which chooses to offer a qualified health benefits plan, or plans, under this chapter;

"(B) an employee organization, as defined in paragraph (9) of this section, which sponsors, and administers in whole or in substantial part, a health plan available only to individuals, and their family members, who are regular or associate of the organization, provided however, that if an employee organization elects to offer limited associate memberships for purposes of health plan participation under this chapter, associate memberships must be offered to all employees and annuitants eligible to enroll in a qualified health benefits plan pursuant to this chapter;

"(C) a Federally qualified health maintenance organization within the meaning of section 1310(d)(1) of title XIII of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 200e-9(d)(1)); and

"(D) any corporation, association, partnership, or other organization which contracted with the Office of Personnel Management as of September 30, 1984, to offer a comprehensive medical plan or network of plans described in section 8903(4) of this title as then in effect, provided such organization continuously offers such qualified health benefits plan or network of plans under this chapter after September 30, 1984;

"(9) 'employee organization' means an association or other organization of employees or retired employees which is national in scope, or in which membership is open to all employees of a Government agency who are eligible to enroll in a qualified health benefits plan under this chapter;

"(10) 'open enrollment season' means a 30-day period, which shall be designated by the Office of Personnel Management prior to the beginning of any plan year with respect to which changes in premium rates or benefits are approved by the Office in its administration of this chapter, during which period any eligible employee who is not enrolled in a qualified health benefits plan described in section 8902 of this title may enroll and any enrolled employee or annuitant may change his enrollment to another plan or benefits option;

"(11) 'health care voucher' means a document for use in enrolling in a health benefits plan or changing enrollment to another plan or benefits option pursuant to this chapter on which an individual shall indicate a choice of a qualified health benefits plan and level of benefits, if applicable, under this chapter; and

"(12) 'plan year' means the twelve-month period beginning each October 1, corresponding to the Federal Government's fiscal year.

"§ 8902. Qualified health benefits plans

"(a) A carrier, as defined in section 8901(8) of this title, that wishes to offer one or more group health insurance plans to employees and annuitants pursuant to this chapter shall apply for approval of such plan or plans by the Office of Personnel Management in such manner as the Office may require by regulation. The Office shall approve all plans as qualified for participation under this chapter which satisfy the following conditions:

"(1) The carrier shall certify that premium charges for enrollments under this chapter in each level of benefits of the plan shall be consistent with the lowest schedule of rates charged for comparable benefits levels under the carrier's other group policies;

"(2) The carrier shall certify that each level of benefits under a proposed plan will provide comprehensive benefits for covered services and supplies provided to an enrollee or eligible family member in any plan year, with no out-of-pocket expenditure by the enrollee, after the enrollee has incurred creditable deductible and coinsurance expenditures in that plan year equal to a maximum enrollee financial participation requirement which shall be specified under the terms of the plan, and which shall not be greater than a maximum permissible enrollee financial participation amount which the Office establishes as appropriate for that category of health plan, and which shall take into consideration enrollee payments for such services as medical, hospital, and surgical benefits, as the Office determines appropriate;

"(3) The carrier agrees to offer each level of benefits to all eligible enrollees at a uniform premium rate for self-only enrollments, and a uniform premium rate for self-and-family enrollments, for a term of at least one plan year;

"(4) The carrier shall agree to operate, or contract for, a health services utilization review system satisfactory to the Office;

"(5) The carrier shall agree to accept for enrollment, without regard to race, sex, health status, or age, and in accordance with procedures established pursuant to section 8903 of this title, any employee or annitant who is eligible to enroll in a qualified health benefits plan pursuant to this chapter and, if the employee or annuitant so elects, family members, as defined in section 8901(5) of this title, provided, however, that plans offered by carriers described in subparagraph (B) of section 8901(8) of this title shall be open to employees and annuitants who reside in a State (or the District of Columbia) in which the carrier is licensed to do business, and plans offered by carriers described in subparagraph (B) of section 8901(8) of this title shall be open only to employees and annuitants who at the time of enrollment are members or associate members of the sponsoring employee organization, and plans offered by carriers described in subparagraphs (C) and (D) of section 8901(8) of this title may be limited to employees and annuitants who live or work in the geographic area served by a particular plan;

"(6) The carrier shall agree to provide detailed written statements of the rights and obligations of the plan and its enrollees, including services and benefits to which plan enrollees are entitled and any maximums, limitations, and exclusions applicable to such services and benefits, in a format approved by the Office, and to provide an enrollee identification card, and a description of procedures for obtaining benefits, to all who enroll in the plan pursuant to this chapter;

"(7) The carrier shall agree that if, during the course of a plan year, an enrollee changes his enrollment to another health benefits plan under conditions prescribed by this chapter, or applicable regulations issued by the Office, the former health plan shall permit such enrollee to terminate enrollment and shall not require any premium or other payment after enrollment in the plan is terminated;

"(8) The carrier shall agree to offer each employee, annuitant, or family member whose eligibility under this chapter is ended, except by voluntary cancellation of health plan enrollment, a 31-day extension of coverage during which such individual shall have the option to convert without evidence of good health to a nongroup contract with the carrier providing health benefits. Such nongroup contract shall provide benefits at least equal to the lowest level of benefits offered under the qualified health benefits plan from which the individual terminated. The premium for such nongroup contract shall be consistent with the lowest rates charged by the carrier under comparable nongroup policies. Any individual who exercises this conversion option shall pay the full periodic premium charges of the nongroup contract directly to the carrier;

"(9) The carrier shall furnish to the Office such evidence as the Office may require that the carrier has obtained adequate reinsurance of its health benefits plan against loss, except that the Office may waive such requirement for reinsurance if the carrier petitions the Office for such waiver, on the basis that such reinsurance is unnecessary because of the carrier's financial stability and capacity for risk absorption;

"(10) The carrier shall agree to furnish such reports as the Office determines to be necessary to enable the Office to carry out its functions under this chapter, and to permit the Office and representatives of the General Accounting Office to examine such records of the carrier as may be necessary to determine the carrier's financial stability and otherwise carry out the purposes of this chapter.

"(b) Approval of a plan for participation under this chapter as a qualified health benefits plan may be withdrawn by the Office, after notice of the reasons for withdrawal and opportunity for a hearing for the carrier concerned and without regard to subchapter II of chapter 5 and chapter 7 of this title, if the Office determines that the plan is not in compliance with any provision of this chapter or applicable regulations.

"(c) The provisions of any health benefits plan approved by the Office for participation under this chapter, which provisions are set forth in a written plan description furnished to enrollees pursuant to subsection (a)(6) of this section and relate to the nature or extent of coverage or benefits (including payments with respect to benefits), shall supersede and preempt any State or local law, or any regulation issued thereunder, which relates to health insurance and plans or the format of informational materials, to the extent that such law or regulation is inconsistent with such provisions.

"§ 8903. Enrollment procedures.

"(a) Each eligible employee shall, upon entering on duty, be issued by the employing office a list of qualified health benefits plans available pursuant to this chapter and the applicable premium rates, and a health care voucher, as described in section 8901(11) of this title, on which to indicate a choice of plans and, if applicable, level of benefits, and whether his enrollment is for self-only or for self-and-family.

"(b) An annuitant who at the time he becomes an annuitant has been enrolled in a qualified health benefits plan pursuant to this chapter—

"(1) as an employee for a period of not less than—

"(A) the five years of service immediately before retirement; or

"(B) The full period or periods of service between the last day of the first period in which he was eligible to enroll in a health benefits plan under this chapter (or similar provisions of prior law) and the date on which he becomes an annuitant, if less than five years; or

"(2) as a family member of an employee or annuitant; shall continue to be eligible while an annuitant to be enrolled in a qualified health benefits plan pursuant to this chapter so long as such individual remains continuously enrolled in any health benefits plan pursuant to this chapter.

"(c) If an employee or annuitant has a spouse who is also an employee or annuitant, either spouse, but not both, may enroll in a qualified health benefits plan for self-and-family coverage or each spouse may enroll as an individual. However, an individual may not be enrolled both individually as an employee or annuitant and as a family member of another enrollee.

"(d) Each eligible employee and annuitant shall, at the beginning of each open enrollment season, be issued, by his employing office or retirement system, such materials as the Office may prescribe for purposes of facilitating a choice among available health benefits plans, including: A list of qualified health benefits plans and their respective premium rates, instructions for obtaining benefit brochers from carriers, and a health care voucher to be completed and returned to the individual's employing office or retirement system indicating his choice of plan, level of benefits, and whether the enrollment is for self-only or self-and-family coverage. The Office shall take such steps as it considers appropriate and feasible to ensure that comparative information on available qualified health benefits plan is available to each eligible employee and annuitant during each open enrollment season. Employees and annuitants who are enrolled in a qualified health benefits plan under this chapter and who do not complete and return the health care voucher to their employing office or retirement system during the open enrollment season to change their enrollment shall continue to be enrolled in the same health benefits plan or, in the event such plan ceases participation under this chapter, in a plan which is reasonably similar to the discontinued plan, as determined by the Office.

"(e) An employee or annuitant may, under conditions prescribed by regulations of the Office, be issued a health care voucher for the purpose of changing his coverage, or that of himself and his family members, upon application filed with the employing office or retirement system within 60 days after a change in family status.

"(f) An employee or annuitant may be issued a health care voucher for use in transferring his enrollment from one qualified health benefits plan to another if the health benefits plan in which such individual is enrolled ceases participation under this chapter, and at such other times and under conditions prescribed by regulations of the Office.

"(g)(1) Each employing office or retirement system to which a completed health care voucher is returned by an eligible employee or annuitant under the provisions of this section shall promptly send a copy of the completed voucher to the carrier selected by the employee or annuitant.

"(2) Each employing office or retirement system that is responsible for the enrollment of employees or annuitants in qualified health benefits plans under this chapter shall promptly notify the affected carrier, in a manner to be prescribed by the Office, if an employee or annuitant becomes ineligible for continued coverage under that carrier's plan because the employee or annuitant has elected to transfer his enrollment to another carrier in accordance with the procedures under this section or has separated from the service or otherwise became ineligible for continued coverage.

"(3) Each employing office or retirement system that is responsible for the enrollment of employees or annuitants in qulified health benefits plans under this chapter shall, at the beginning of each calender year and in a manner to be prescribed by the Office, transmit to each carrier a list of all employees or annuitants for whom the employing office or retirement system is responsible and who are enrolled in the carrier's plan, together with an identification of the level of benefits under which the employee or annuitant is covered and whether the coverage is for self-only or self-and-family.

"§ 8904. Government contributions and enrollee premiums.

"(a)(1) The Office of Personnel Management shall determine in advance of each plan year the basic rates of Government contributions available under this chapter toward the premium cost of self-only and self-and-family enrollments, respectively, in qualified health benefits plans, in accordance with the provisions of this subsection.

"(2) For purposes of determining the Government contribution rates per enrollee for each plan year, the Office shall first determine for the fiscal year preceding the new plan year the average biweekly Government contribution made toward self-only and self-and-family health plan enrollments under this chapter, respectively, on behalf of enrollees other than active and retired officers and employees of the United States Postal Service and the survivors of such individuals, including in such average Government contribution the amount of any excess Government contribution paid to employees and annuitants under subsection (c)(1) of this section. The Office shall then adjust such average contribution rates in accordance with the Office's determination of the percentage change in the implicit price deflator for the Gross National Product for the calendar quarter ending March 31 immediately preceding a new plan year, relative to the implicit price deflator for the Gross National Product for the calender quarter ending the preceding March 31, as such quarterly figures are pubished by the Bureau of Economic Analysis of the Department of Commerce.

"(3) The Office shall provide for conversion of biweekly rates of Government contributions and enrollee premiums determined under this section to rates for employees and annuitants paid on other than a biweekly basis, and for this purpose may provide for the adjustment of the converted rate to the nearest cent.

"(b)(1) Except as provided by paragraph (2) of this subsection and paragraph (2) of subsection (e) of this section, for all periods during which an enrollment under this chapter continues, a Government contribution as determined by the Office under subsection (a) of this section shall be payable on behalf of each enrolled employee and annuitant. For employees, adjustments in the Government premium contribution rates computed by the Office in accordance with subsection (a) of this section and changes in health benefits plan premium rates shall take effect on the first day of the first pay period beginning on or after the beginning of the plan year. For an annuitant, the adjustments in contribution and premium rates shall take effect on the first day of the plan year.

"(2) In the case of an enrolled employee who is occuping a position on less than a full-time basis, the biweekly Government contribution shall be an amount which bears the same ratio to the adjusted contribution rates determined under subsection (a) of this section as the average number of hours of such employee's regulary scheduled workweek bears to the average number of hours in the regularly scheduled workweek of an employee serving in a comparable position on a full-time basis (as determined under regulations prescribed by the Office).

"(c)(1) Each employee or annuitant who elects to enroll in a qualified health benefits plan pursuant to this chapter shall be responsible for payment of any group premium charge applicable to such enrollment in excess of the biweekly Government contribution authorized under subsection (b) of this section for each pay period during which the enrollment continues. Withholdings for this purpose shall be made from the pay of each enrolled employee and the annuity of each enrolled annuitant.

"(2) If the periodic Government contribution rate authorized under subsection (b) of this section for self-only or self-and-family health plan enrollments exceeds the periodic premium charge for an approved health benefits plan and enrollment category selected by an eligible employee or annuitant under this chapter, the excess Government contribution shall be paid directly to the enrolled employee or annuitant each pay period in accordance with subsections (f) and (g) of this section, but only to the extent that such excess amount does not exceed 40 percent of the authorized Government contribution rate.

"(d) In addition to Government contributions authorized under subsection (b) of this section, there shall be contributed by the Government for each enrollment an amount which the Office determines to be necessary for administrative costs in accordance with section 8906(b) of this title.

"(e)(1) An employee enrolled in a health benefits plan under this chapter who is placed in a leave without pay status may have his coverage and the coverage of his family members continued under the plan for not to exceed one year, subject to payment of the appropriate amounts by the Government and the enrollee as required by subsections (b) and (c) of this section.

"(2) An employee who enters on approved leave without pay to serve as a full-time officer or employee of a labor organization, as defined by section 7103(a)(4) of this title, may, within 60 days after entering on that leave without pay, file with his employing agency an election to continue his enrollment under this chapter and arrange to pay currently into the Employees Health Benefits Fund, through his employing agency, both employee and agency contributions from the beginning of the period of leave without pay. The employing agency shall forward the enrollment charges so paid to the Office for deposit to the Fund. If the employee does not so elect, his enrollment will be subject to paragraph (1) of this subsection and implementing regulations.

"(f) The Government contributions toward health plan premiums and administrative costs under this section for an employee, and any payments to employees under subsection (c)(2) of this section, shall be paid—

"(1) in the case of employees generally, from the appropriation or fund which is used to pay the employee;

"(2) in the case of an elected official, from an appropriation or fund available for payment of other salaries of the same office or establishment;

"(3) in the case of an employee of the legislative branch who is paid by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, from the contingent fund of the House; and

"(4) in the case of an employee in a leave without pay status, from the appropriation or fund which would be used to pay the employee if he were in a pay status.

"(g)(1) Except as provided in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of this subsection, Government contributions toward health plan premiums and administrative costs authorized under this section relative to annuitant enrollments under this chapter, and any payments to annuitants under subsection (c)(2) of this section, shall be paid by the Office from annual appropriations which are authorized to be made for that purpose and which may be made available until expended.

"(2) In the case of annuitants who are retired officers or employees of the United States Postal Service or the Post Office Department, or the survivors of such individuals, the United States Postal Service shall pay all Government contributions authorized by this section and shall forward contributions required by subsections (b) and (d) of this section to the Employees Health Benefits Fund upon notification by the Office of the amounts which the Office determines are necessary for this purpose.

"(3) In the case of annuitants who are retired officers or employees of the government of the District of Columbia, or the survivors of such individuals, the District of Columbia government shall pay all Government contributions authorized by this section and shall forward contributions required by subsections (b) and (d) of this section to the Employees Health Benefits Fund upon notification by the Office of the amounts which the Office determines are necessary for this purpose.

"(4) In the case of annuitants who receive monthly compensation under subchapter I of chapter 81 of this title, all Government contributions authorized by this section shall be paid from the Employees' Compensation Fund established under section 8147(a) of this title, with such contributions charged back to the former employing agency in accordance with section 8147(b) of this title. The Secretary of Labor shall authorize payment to the Employees Health Benefits Fund of contributions required by subsections (b) and (d) of this section upon notification by the Office of the amounts the Office determines are necessary for this purpose.

"(h)(1) In accordance with regulations prescribed by the Office, an employing agency or retirement system which fails to collect enrollee premium contributions and forward them, along with Government contributions toward health plan premiums and administrative expenses, to the Office in the correct amounts and in a timely manner for deposit to the credit of the Employees Health Benefits Fund shall be liable for the appropriate amounts, plus interest at a rate determined by the Office and computed from the time such payment should have been forwarded to the Office.

"(2) If an agency fails to withhold the proper amount of health benefits premium contributions from an individual's salary, compensation, or retirement annuity, the collection of unpaid premiums may be waived by the agency if, in the judgment of the agency, the individual is without fault and recovery would be against equity and good conscience. However, if the agency so waives the collection of unpaid enrollee premium contributions, the agency shall submit an amount equal to the sum of the uncollected enrollee contributions and appropriate Government contributions, plus interest, as required by paragraph (1) of this subsection.

"(i) The Office shall forward enrollee premium contributions and applicable Government premium contributions for enrollees in each health benefits plan to the carrier no later than 30 days after such monies are received by the Office for deposit to the Employees Health Benefits Fund.

"§ 8905. Coverage of reinstated employees and restored annuitants.

"(a) An employee enrolled in a health benefits plan under this chapter who is removed or suspended without pay and later reinstated or restored to duty on the grounds that the removal or suspension was unjustified or unwarranted may, at his option, be issued a health care voucher for purposes of enrolling as a new employee or have his coverage restored, with appropriate adjustments made in contributions and claims, to the same extent and effect as though the removal or suspension had not taken place.

"(b) A disability annuitant whose annuity under section 8337 of this title, or a similar provision of another retirement system for employees of the Government, is terminated because the annuitant recovers from disability or is restored to an earning capacity fairly comparable to the current rate of pay of the position occupied at the time of retirement, and whose annuity is later restored due to recurrence of the disability or loss of earning capacity, shall upon such restoration, be issued a health care voucher by his retirement system for purposes of enrolling in a health benefits plan pursuant to this chapter, if such annuitant was covered by any such plan immediately prior to the termination of annuity.

"(c) A surviving spouse whose survivor annuity under this title was terminated because of remarriage and is later restored shall, under such regulations as the Office of Personnel Management may prescribe, be issued a health care voucher by the retirement system for purposes of enrolling in a health benefits plan under this chapter, if such spouse was covered by any such plan immediately before such annuity was terminated.

"§ 8906. Employees Health Benefits Fund.

"(a) Pursuant to this section and similar provisions of prior law, there is authorized to be in the Treasury of the United States an Employees Health Benefits Fund which shall be administered by the Office of Personnel Management. The contributions of employees, annuitants, and the Government toward health plan premium charges and administrative expense prescribed by section 8904 of this title shall be paid into the Fund. The Fund, other than accounts identified for specific purposes under this section and the Retired Federal Employees Health Benefits Act (74 Stat. 850), is available, without fiscal year limitation, for payments by the Office to approved health benefits plans of premium charges with respect to enrollments under this chapter.

"(b) An amount, as determined by the Office to be necessary from time to time, but not to exceed one percent of the Government contribution rates as determined by the Office pursuant to section 8904(a)(2) of this title, shall be set aside from Government contributions paid into the Fund for each enrollment during a plan year under section 8904 of this title as an administrative expense reserve to be available, within the limitations that may be specified annually by Congress, to pay the administrative expenses incurred by the Office under this chapter.

"(c) There shall be an enrollees' contingency reserve account in the Fund. The Office, from time to time and in amounts it considers appropriate, may transfer any amounts credited to the general Employees Health Benefits Fund in prior plan years in excess of premiums due carriers to the enrollees' contingency reserve account. This account shall be available to the Office, without fiscal year limitation, for payment of any expenses which the Office may, in its discretion, deem proper for the benefit of individuals enrolled in health plans pursuant to this chapter.

"(d) The Secretary of the Treasury may invest and reinvest any of the money in the Fund which is not immediately required for premium payments to carriers, adminstrative expenses, or authorized disbursements from the enrollee contingency reserve, in interest-bearing obligations of the United States, and may sell these obligations for the purposes of the Fund. The interest on and the proceeds from the sale of these obligations shall become a part of the enrollees' contingency reserve in the Fund as authorized under subsection (c) of this section.

"§ 8907. Studies and reports.

"(a) The Office of Personnel Management shall make a continuing study of the operation and administration of this chapter, including surveys and reports on health benefits plans available to employees and on the experience of the plans.

"(b) Each Government agency shall keep such records, make such certification, and furnish the Office with such information and reports as may be necessary to enable the Office to carry out its functions under this chapter.

"§ 8908. Jurisdiction of courts.

"The district courts of the United States have original jurisdiction, concurrent with the United States Claims Court, of a civil action or claim against the United States founded on this chapter.

"§ 8909. Regulations.

"(a) The Office of Personnel Management shall prescribe regulations necessary to carry out the purposes of this chapter.

"(b) The regulations of the Office may exclude an employee from coverage under this chapter on the basis of the nature and type of his employment or conditions pertaining to it, such as short-term appointments, seasonal or intermittent employment, and employment of like nature. The Office may not exclude—

"(1) an employee or group of employees solely on the basis of the hazardous nature of employment;

"(2) a teacher in the employ of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, whose pay is fixed by section 1501 of title 31, District of Columbia Code, on the basis of the fact that the teacher is serving under a temporary appointment if the teacher has been so employed by the Board for a period or periods totaling not less than two school years; or

"(3) an employee solely on the basis of occupying a position on a part-time career employment basis (as defined in section 3402(2) of this title).

"(c) The regulations of the Office shall provide for the beginning and ending dates of coverage of employees and annuitants and their family members under health benefits plans. The regulations may require the coverage to continue, exclusive of the temporary extension of coverage described by section 8902(a)(8) of this title, until the end of the pay period in which an employee is separated from the service, or until the end of the month in which an annuitant ceases to be entitled to annuity, and in case of the death of an employee or annuitant, may permit a temporary extension of the coverage of his family members for not to exceed 90 days.

"(d) The Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe regulations to effect the application and operation of this chapter to an individual named by section 8901(1)(H) of this title.".

(b)(1) The amendments made by subsection (a) of this section shall take effect on October 1, 1984, and shall be effective with respect to health plan enrollments and Government contributions under chapter 89 of title 5, United States Code, on and after that date, and the Office of Personnel Management shall take such steps as it considers necessary prior to that date, including scheduling a special open enrollment season, to ensure that such provisions will be able to be implemented on that date. The Office may, with respect to enrollees in health benefits plans available pursuant to chapter 89 of title 5, United States Code, before October 1, 1984, automatically assign any individuals who do not specify a choice with respect to health plan coverage effective on and after that date to an appropriate level of benefits in a successor plan offered by the same carrier, or, in the event such carrier is no longer a participant under this chapter, to a plan which the Office determines is reasonably similar to the individual's health plan coverage under this chapter before October 1, 1984, unless the individual enrollee gives notice in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Office that the automatic assignment is unacceptable.

(2) Notwithstanding section 8902(a)(9) of title 5, United States Code as amended by subsection (a) of this section, any carrier that, on the day before the date of enactment of this Act, is operating a health benefits plan under chapter 89 of title 5, as in effect before the amendments made by subsection (a) shall not be subject to the requirements of such section 8902(a)(9), provided that the Office of Personnel Management determines such carrier to be financially stable.

SEC. 3. (a) Section 8902 of title 5, United States Code, as in effect prior to October 1, 1984, is amended on the date of enactment of this Act by adding the following sentence at the end thereof:

"Notwithstanding the foregoing sentence, all contracts for health plans under this chapter which become effective as of January 1984 shall terminate effective September 30, 1984."

(b) Contingency reserve funds set aside in the Employees Health Benefits Fund for individual health benefits plans pursuant to section 8909(b)(2) of title 5, United States Code, as in effect on September 30, 1984, shall for a period of two years beyond termination of health plan contracts pursuant to section 8902(a) of title 5, United States Code, as amended by subsection (a) of this section, remain available to pay accrued claims against the respective health benefits plans to the extent that the Office of Personnel Management determines that other reserves held by the carrier of a terminated plan are insufficient to liquidate outstanding claims. Effective October 1, 1986, the Office shall determine the total of any individual health plan contingency reserve accounts remaining in the Employees Health Benefits Fund, and shall transfer all such contingency reserve funds, together with any interest income earned from the investment of such funds by the Secretary of the Treasury in interest-bearing obligations of the United States, to the enrollees' contingency reserve account established in the Employees Health Benefits Fund pursuant to section 8906(c) of title 5, United States Code.

(c) Any unused administrative reserve funds set aside in the Employees Health Benefits Fund pursuant to subsection 8909(b)(1) of title 5, United States Code, as in effect immediately before the effective date of section 2 of this Act, shall be available, without limitation, to pay administrative expenses incurred by the Office in implementing the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 4. (a) The Retired Federal Employees Health Benefits Act (74 Stat. 849) is amended as follows:

(1) The word "Commission" is deleted wherever it appears and the words "Office of Personnel Management" substituted in place thereof;

(2) Section 2(1) is amended to read:

"(1) the terms 'employee' and 'Government' have the same meanings when used in this Act as such terms have for purposes of section 8901 of title 5, United States Code.";

(3) Sections 3, 5, and 10 are repealed;

(4) Section 4 is amended by replacing the first two sentences with the following sentence:

"If a retired employee enrolls for self-only in a health benefits plan as provided for by section 6 of this Act, the Government shall contribute each month toward his subscription charge an amount equal to the current monthly premium of an individual for each month under section 1839(c)(3) of the Social Security Act.";

(5) Section 6(a) is amended in the first sentence by striking out ", other than the plan provided for under section 3 of this Act,";

(6) Section 7 is amended to read:

"Each retired employee shall, within such time after March 1, 1961, as the Office of Personnel Management shall prescribe, notify the Office of his election to enroll in or retain existing coverage in a private health benefits plan and receive Government contributions under section 6 of this Act, or not to participate in the program offered under this Act. If the retired employee elects to enroll under this section, his election shall be accompanied by a certificate of the carrier certifying the fact of his enrollment and the cost to him of the health benefits plan, or of the health benefits portion of the plan.";

(7) Section 8 is amended to read:

"(a) The Government contribution toward the cost of enrollments in private health benefits plans under sections 4 and 6 of this Act, and expenses incurred by the Office of Personnel Management in the administration of this Act, shall be paid from funds that shall be credited for this purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of money in the Treasury of the United States which is not otherwise appropriated, to the Employees Health Benefits Fund established in the Treasury of the United States for purposes of chapter 89 of title 5, United States Code, upon notification by the Office of the amounts which the Office determines are necessary for purposes of this section.

"(b) The funds credited to the Employees Health Benefits Fund under subsection (a) of this section shall be available without fiscal year limitation for payment of the Government contributions provided for by sections 4 and 6 of this Act through agencies of the Government which administer a retirement system for employees of the Government and for expenses incurred by the Office in administering this Act.";

"(8) The first sentence of section 9(b) is repealed;

"(9) Section 9(c) is amended by—

(A) striking out ", and withholdings required by section 5 of this Act" in clause (4);

(B) repealing clause (6); and

(C) striking out the words "and withholding" in clause (8); and

(10) Section 12 is amended by striking out the words "and withholdings".

(b) Subsection (a) of this section becomes effective on January 1, 1984. On that date, all monies credited to the Retired Employees Health Benefits Fund in the Treasury of the United States shall, except as provided by subsection (d) of this section, be transferred to the Employees Health Benefits Fund established pursuant to section 8909 of title 5, United States Code, and set aside for purposes of the Retired Federal Employees Health Benefits Act.

(c) Each individual enrolled in the Government-wide plan pursuant to section 3 of the Retired Federal Employees Health Benefits Act on December 31, 1983, shall be automatically transferred to an appropriate level of benefits under the Indemnity Benefit Plan described in paragraph (2) of section 8903 of title 5, United States Code, as in effect on the date of enactment of this Act, effective January 1, 1984, unless the individual elects enrollment in another type of plan described in section 8903.

(d) Effective January 1, 1984, any contingency reserve to the credit of the Government-wide plan under the Retired Employees Health Benefits Act, and any monies received on or after that date with respect to enrollments in such plan, shall be transferred to the contingency reserve of the Indemnity Plan in the Employees Health Benefits Fund established under section 8909(b) of title 5, United States Code, which contingency reserve shall be made available for payment of any outstanding obligations of the terminated Government-wide plan.

By Mr. KASTEN (for himself, and Mr. PROXMIRE):

S. 2253. A bill to name the Veterans' Administration Medical Center in Milwaukee, Wis., the "Clement J. Zablocki Veterans' Administration Medical Center"; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION MEDICAL CENTER

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today, joined by Senator PROXMIRE and in conjunction with our House colleagues of the Wisconsin delegation, I am introducing a bill that would honor the late Clem Zablocki, by renaming the Milwaukee Veterans' Hospital Administration Center after him.

Such an action cannot, of course, compensate us for the loss of our good friend, who served with distinction as Congressman of the fourth Wisconsin Congressional District for nearly 35 consecutive years, and as chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee since 1977. He was truly a man of the people, whose public career was characterized by warmth, simplicity, honesty and compassion.

As small a token as this act may be, it is still fitting and proper that we memorialize Clem in this fashion, given the great love he demonstrated for his constituency, and the care he manifested for its sons and daughters who served in the Armed Forces of the United States.

I hope that all of my colleagues will join Senator PROXMIRE and me in taking this opportunity to express our appreciation and love for Clem Zablocki, and that they will help us to honor him in this small but significant way.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2253

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Veterans' Administration Medical Center in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, shall after the date of the enactment of this Act be known and designated as the "Clement J. Zablocki Veterans' Administration Medical Center." Any reference to such medical center in any law, regulation, map, document, record, or other paper of the United States shall after such date be deemed to be a reference to the Clement J. Zablocki Veterans' Administration Medical Center.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleague from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) today in introducing a bill to name the Veterans' Administration medical center in Milwaukee, Wis., the Clement J. Zablocki Veterans' Administration Medical Center.

This is a small but fitting tribute to the 35-year career of a great legislator and my personal friend, Clem Zablocki.

It is fitting because in every sense of the word, Clem Zablocki was a patriot. His dedication to serving his country earned him the respect of his constituents, his colleagues and of Government officials around the world.

As chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Clem Zablocki was an able negotiator in foreign policy who sought balance during his tenure, and who sought bipartisan solutions to problems facing our country and the world. He favored a strong defense posture, but also was a leading proponent of the nuclear freeze resolution. He crafted the War Powers Resolution 10 years ago, but also supported a strong Presidency and a consistent U.S. foreign policy.

Congressman Zablocki was an unassuming legislator who never allowed the arrogance of power to affect his quiet method of consensus building. He effectively chose to work behind the scenes, and was a confident of Presidents, Secretaries of States, and foreign leaders worldwide. Few of us will serve with greater distinction than our departed friend.

As a person, Clem was full of warmth and accommodation. His devotion to his church and his family sets an example which all of us can admire.

We will miss his wisdom, his skill, and his great contibutions to our country.

I hope the Senate will see fit to pass this bill as a final tribute to one of the outstanding legislators of our time.

By Mr. BOREN:

S.J. Res. 224. Joint resolution to designate the week beginning April 1, 1984, as "National Amateur Wrestling Week;" to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL AMATEUR WRESTLING WEEK

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, today it is my pleasure to introduce a Senate joint resolution to designate the first week in April as "National Amateur Wrestling Week." Introduction of this resolution is particularly appropriate since 1984 is an Olympic year, with the summer games to take place in Los Angeles.

Oklahomans are proud of our wrestling heritage. The U.S. Wrestling Association, the national governing body for wrestling, is located in Stillwater, Okla. Oklahoma has been the home of many national and Olympic champion wrestlers.

It is estimated that over 1 million young people in the United States actively pursue the sport of wrestling at the amateur level.

Wrestling is a demanding sport filled with many hours of practice and conditioning. For the dedication of these young people who wrestle, their parents, families and coaches, I think it is appropriate that we honor them with this week of special activities and ceremonies.

Mr. President, our Nation's athletes have always brought great pride to our country with their accomplishments in the Olympics and other events. This resolution will be a small step toward returning some of that honor that these athletes have given us over the years.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the swift passage of this resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 224

Whereas the sport of wrestling has been recognized since ancient times as a test of both physical development and mental awareness;

Whereas an estimated one million young people throughout the United States actively pursue the sport of wrestling at the amateur level; and

Whereas those young people involved in amateur wrestling at all levels, as well as parents, families, coaches, officials, and others who support these young athletes, ought to be recognized for their accomplishments and dedication to this demanding sport: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the events of the National Open Greco-Roman and the National Open Free Style Championships serve to focus our attention on the sport of amateur wrestling and our respect and admiration for all those who participate in amateur wrestling; and be it further

Resolved, That the week beginning April 1, 1984, is designated "National Amateur Wrestling Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

By Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. NUNN, Mr. PERCY, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. TSONGAS, and Mr. WILSON):

S.J. Res. 225. Joint resolution designating the month of March 1984 as National Eye Donor Month; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL EYE DONOR MONTH

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I am honored today to introduce this joint resolution, proclaiming March 1984 as "National Eye Donor Month."

Each year, nearly 30,000 Americans suffer impaired vision due to corneal injury or disease. Between 22,000 and 25,000 of these victims—and their numbers increase annually—have their sight restored by an important procedure called the corneal transplant. This procedure was successfully performed for the first time in 1909; today it ranks as the most reliable and frequent of all human transplants. Over the last 75 years, nearly 150,000 corneal transplants have been performed, and the success rate has grown to 95 percent (depending on the underlying pathology). The success of the operation has made it practically routine.

The major problem facing the field of corneal transplants is not technique, but supply. The operation can be performed only when a cornea has been donated at death. If more Americans appreciated the importance of such donations, the necessary arrangements could be completed far in advance of a death or, at least, in the hours following the death of a loved one. A broad program of public education would increase these donations, and the proclamation of a National Eye Donor Month will contribute greatly to this effort. When Congress declared a month of recognition last year, the national network of patients, professionals, and eye-donor volunteers benefited immensely.

The pivotal organization here is the American eyebank, which collects, processes, and distributes eye tissue for transplant, research, and education. The first eyebank in America, the Eye-Bank for Sight Restoration, Inc., was founded in 1944, in my home State of New York. Since 1944, the Eye-Bank Association of America has grown from one pioneering institution to 93 affiliated eyebanks. This organization sets transplant standards, trains and certifies eyebank technicians, and works with the national network of eyebanks to locate and transport suitable corneal tissue. I cannot commend enough the devoted professionals and volunteers who have helped restore the vision of thousands of Americans. Proclaiming National Eye Donor Month for 1984 is one small step Congress can take to recognize these efforts and to educate the American people to the continuing need for cornea donations.

Mr. President, I would ask unanimous consent that the full text of the resolution be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 225

Whereas 1.4 million Americans suffer from serious disorders of the eye, many of which can be eased by the efforts of eye banks;

Whereas eye banks in the United States have grown from a single institution in 1944 to ninety-three in 1984;

Whereas eye banks have sought to encourage research into the prevention and treatment of eye disease and injury in the United States;

Whereas some 150,000 Americans have had their vision restored, and 22,000 to 25,000 such operations are performed annually in the United States; and

Whereas increased national awareness of the benefits of eye donations has lent impetus to expanded research activities, and helps Americans affected by blinding diseases: Now,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of March 1984 is designated as "National Eye Donor Month," and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on all citizens to join in recognizing this humanitarian cause with appropriate activity.●

By Mr. KASTEN:

S.J. Res. 226. Joint resolution to renounce the 1945 Yalta Agreement; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RENOUNCING THE 1945 YALTA AGREEMENT

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that calls on Congress to renounce an agreement that has plagued the conscience of this Nation for nearly two decades. I refer to the Yalta Executive Agreement of February 1945, which had the ultimate effect of establishing Soviet domination over Central and Eastern Europe, and which resulted in the enslavement of millions of people in those regions.

By introducing this joint resolution, I am acting in the spirit of President Dwight D. Eisenhower, who stated in his message to Congress of February 2, 1953, that he would ask that body to join in, "Making it clear that we would never acquiesce in the enslavement of any people in order to purchase fancied gain for ourselves, and that we would not feel that any past agreement committed us to any enslavement." I am acting in the spirit of Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Carter's National Security Advisor, who, in the wake of the 1981 Polish crackdown, called for a repudiation of the Yalta Agreements. And I am acting in the spirit of Secretary of State George Shultz, who, speaking at the Stockholm Conference on European Disarmament earlier this month, said, "The United States does not recognize the legitimacy of the artificially imposed division of Europe." That division of Europe has as its basis the Yalta Agreement.

The intention of the Western leaders who signed the Yalta Agreements was to help bring about peace and security in the post-war world. But, instead, the de facto division of Europe that resulted from the Yalta Agreement became a major source of tension and instability. This tension has been made worse by the fact that the Soviets massively violated the Yalta Agreements from the beginning by not holding free elections in the captive nations as promised, and the fact that they have used their conquest of Eastern and Central Europe as a springboard by which to threaten Western Europe.

I do not question the motives of the Western leaders who negotiated this agreement with Stalin in 1945. After all, the Red army already controlled much of Eastern Europe at the time of the meeting, and the Western leaders believed that by acquiescing temporarily to Soviet control of this region, they could extract valuable concessions from Stalin. History has proven them wrong. But the reasons for renouncing Yalta have less to do with questioning these political judgments than with fact that the agreements themselves were contrary to both the Atlantic Charter and the great founding principles of this Nation.

Both the Atlantic Charter and the founding principles of this Nation stress the idea of self-determination. There was no self-determination at Yalta. The representatives of the peoples whose fates were being determined were not even consulted. Instead, the future of millions of people was laid out on the basis of geographical location alone.

The Soviet Union looks to Yalta to justify its subjugation of Central and Eastern Europe. Therefore to renounce Yalta would make it clear that we do not accept the forcible division of Europe. To renounce Yalta would make it clear to the Soviet Union—and to our allies—that cooperation with the U.S.S.R. will not be at the expense of the subjugated people of Central and Eastern Europe. And to renounce Yalta would send a message to those subjugated people that we have not forgotten them.

Mr. President, I believe that it is cynical and immoral to determine the fate of nations on the basis of geography rather than on the aspirations and will of the people themselves. I believe that the recent events in Poland—as well as events in Prague in 1968, Budapest and Poznan in 1956, and East Berlin in 1954—make it clear that the desire for self-determination is strong among the enslaved peoples of Central and Eastern Europe, and that they certainly do not accept the bargain made for them at Yalta. I ask my colleagues to support me in this effort to send a clear message to the people of Central and Eastern Europe that we have not written off their hopes and aspirations for a better world.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my joint resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point, along with several editorials on the subject and a memo from the Polish Government-in-exile on the Yalta Agreements.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 226

Whereas, during World War II, representatives of the United States took part in secret agreements and understandings concerning other peoples who were not represented;

Whereas, for millions around the world, especially those residing in Central and Eastern Europe, the 1945 Yalta executive agreement is particularly associated with alleged United States acquiescence in the enslavement of entire nations under a Soviet totalitarian system of government;

Whereas, at the Yalta Conference, representatives of the United States recognized the Soviet-backed Lublin Committee of National Liberation as the Provisional Government of Poland, although it had no widespread support or following;

Whereas, at the Yalta Conference, representatives of the United States agreed to repatriate all Soviet citizens who remained abroad after the war, irrespective of their individual wishes and by force if necessary, resulting in mass death and suffering;

Whereas, at the Yalta Conference and the other wartime conferences, representatives of the United States failed to object to the forcible incorporation of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania into the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics;

Whereas, the Yalta agreement, resulting in the enslavement of half of Europe, did not bring about peace and security for the rest of the world, but rather became the source of permanent unbalance and tension;

Whereas, the Soviet domination of Central and Eastern Europe turned out to be not a final satisfaction of Soviet claims but rather a springboard for further Soviet expansion;

Whereas, the situation created in Central and Eastern Europe as a result of agreement such as the Yalta agreement continues to be dramatically contested by its victims, as for example in East Berlin in 1953, Poznan in 1956, Budapest in 1956, Prague in 1968, and Poland in 1970 and again in 1980, 1981, 1982, and 1983;

Whereas, these results of the Yalta agreement threaten the peace and security of all freedom-loving people;

Whereas, the Soviet Union violated the Yalta guarantee of free elections in the countries involved;

Whereas, it is appropriate for the United States, according to the principles on which this Nation was founded, to respect the desires and aspirations of all freedom-loving people around the world;

Whereas, it is appropriate that the United States express the hopes of the people of the United States for the freedom of the peoples subjected to the captivity of Soviet despotism in Central and Eastern Europe, as well as elsewhere around the world; and

Whereas, it is appropriate for the United States to reject any interpretation or application that, as a result of the signing of the 1945 Yalta executive agreement, the United States accepts the present position of nations being held captive by the Soviet Union. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States renounces the Yalta agreement, declares that it is no longer binding, and hereby expresses its solidarity with the desires and aspirations of the peoples of Bulgaria, Byelorussia, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Romania, Russia, Ukraine, Yugoslavia, and all the peoples of Central and Eastern Europe.

RENOUNCE YALTA?

The Yalta agreements that divided up Europe toward the close of World War II have long been the source of bitter controversy, much of it generating more heat than light. Now in the wake of the Polish crackdown, Zbigniew Brezinski, President Carter's national security adviser and scarcely one of the anti-FDR isolationists, has suggested that the U.S. renounce the 1946 agreements.

Such a renunciation would of course be mostly a symbolic step. Symbols should not be a substitute for real action, such as shutting down the flow of Western credits that help keep the Soviet economy and military machine afloat. But symbols do have their uses, and Mr. Brzezinski's suggestion not only deserves to be taken seriously but has much to recommend it.

At the Yalta Conference in February 1945, Roosevelt and Churchill implicitly acquiesced in Soviet hegemony over Eastern Europe in return for what they thought were valuable concessions by Stalin, among them Russia's entry into the war against Japan and agreement to go forward with the United Nations. Stalin, of course, proved the better bargainer. He provided little real help against Japan and he managed to persuade the allies to accept a voting formula in the UN that reduced the body to a shell.

It's true, of course, that the Red Armies already controlled much of Eastern Europe. There was no real prospect of making the Soviets relinquish their gains without a fight. In that sense Yalta ratified the inevitable.

But what is happening now in Poland—and in Hungary in 1956 and Czechoslovakia in 1968—shows that the oppressed peoples of Eastern Europe have themselves never accepted the Yalta bargain. At long last we should give serious consideration to following their lead. In many ways it would be the most fitting of all our possible symbolic responses to the Polish tragedy.

The Soviets, after all, have massively violated the Yalta agreements by not holding free elections in the captive countries as promised in the Yalta communique. And though Yalta may have been viewed at the time as an act of Realpolitik, surley it's no act of Realpolitik to refuse to acknowledge that times and circumstances have changed, or to ignore the manifest yearnings for freedom and independence of the East Europeans.

We suspect that Poland, even more than the Hungarian and Czech uprising, signifies a dramatic and historic change in the postwar situation. Detente was premised on certain assumptions, among them that Communist systems were at least economically stable and thus susceptible to amelioration of their political harshness. But we suspect that Poland will reveal both these assumptions as untrue. Renouncing Yalta would prepare the way for an urgent and vital debate on the implications of this untruth.

Lastly, renouncing Yalta would send a clear message to Eastern Europe's peoples that we have not written off their aspirations for a better future. It would also be a message of hope to Western Europe, which has found detente so attractive in part out of natural concern for Europeans behind the Iron Curtain. As Mr. Brzezinski puts it, Yalta stands as the symbol of the division and the decline of Europe vis-a-vis the two superpowers. We should take the occasion to make clear to all Europeans that we don't simply consider them as pawns on a chessboard to be divided up into "spheres of influence."

THE SPIRIT OF YALTA STILL HAUNTS EUROPE

(By William Pfaff)

"This war is not as in the past. Whoever occupies a territory also imposes on it his own social system. Everyone imposes his own system as far as his army can reach."

Josef Stalin made this statement to Marshal Tito in April, 1945. It explains why Europe has been divided ever since then. It is the reason the Soviet Union reacts so violently when "Yalta" is challenged—"Yalta" being the shorthand term for Europe's division.

French President Francois Mitterrand said in his New Year's message. "Anything which would permit us to escape from Yalta would be good, on condition that we never confuse our wishes with the reality of the present day." For that, he got a jeering response from the Soviet press—suggesting, in its very violence, uneasiness that Mitterrand's comment might be true.

The Yalta system is the foundation of Soviet European policy, which finds itself at an impasse. It is difficult for the Soviets to concede this, because Stalin's policy expressed a much older Russian expectation that safety would lie in the domination of the East European states. If an East European system rested on shared interests and consent, it could be secure. The present system relies, of course, on force and repression, and therefore has proved to be a recurrent source of both risk and insecurity.

Yalta is a symbol, not the real cause, of Europe's division. The war had already divided Europe before Stalin, Winston Churchill and Franklin D. Roosevelt met at the Black Sea resort in 1945. Only Poland was discussed at Yalta. The issue was which government to install in Warsaw the London exiles, to whom the underground Home Army and the Polish Legion serving with the British army were loyal, or the so-called Lublin Committee of communists, which had entered Poland in the train of the Red Army. The Allies decided that the Lublin group would take in some noncommunists, and that free elections would be held. The elections eventually took place in 1947, after large-scale arrests of noncommunists, including 135 opposition parliamentary candidates, and a purge of the election lists.

The division of the Balkans had been ratified four months before Yalta, when Churchill met Stalin in Moscow in October, 1944. The Soviet army was in Romania and Bulgaria, the British in Greece. Churchill wrote out percentages on a half-sheet of paper: in Romania, 90% Russian influence, 10% "for the others" in Greece, the reverse; in Yugoslavia and Hungary, "50-50"; in Bulgaria, 75% to Russia. Stalin took the paper, paused, then "took his blue pencil and made a large tick upon it." Churchill's account goes on: "At length I said, might it not be thought rather cynical if it seemed we had disposed of these issues, so fateful to millions of people, in such an offhand manner? Let us burn the paper. No, you keep it, said Stalin."

This, too, was after the fact. Britain was in no position to expel the Soviet Union from the Balkans, and the United States at the time would not have imagined doing so. American diplomacy remained suspicious of British intentions and indulgent toward Russians. The recurrent sentiment expressed in the American records during 1944 is that the United States "will not pull Britain's chestnuts out of the fire."

It took another three years before the United States began seriously to contest what the Soviet Union was doing in Eastern Europe. By then it was much too late. Moscow was not only in possession, but the non-communist forces in the area had been maimed, their leaders sent to camps, or in exile, or dead. The West eventually conceded the contest by allowing the East Berlin rising of 1953 and the Hungarian revolution of 1956 to be crushed.

Nothing has changed since then in Western policy. The sanctions that President Reagan imposed on the Soviet Union and Poland in December are, regrettably, empty gestures, changing nothing.

The future choice is simple. Either "Yalta" is reversed or the West goes on practicing an effective complicity in Europe's division, tolerating the dictatorships that exist in the East and the consequent dangers. There are two ways by which Yalta might be undone, by the peaceful way, and by war. It obviously will not be done by war, short of some immense catastrophe brought about against the will of the West.

That leaves the peaceful way—to persuade the Soviet Union that its occupation of Eastern Europe produces insecurity and trouble for Russia, and that a better solution can be found. Stalin himself described that solution to Churchill at Yalta. He said that Poland in the past had been the corridor through which Russia's enemies repeatedly had attacked it. The corridor had to be closed, Stalin said, by Poland, "of her own strength." For that reason, he went on, "Poland must be free, independent and powerful"

If only Stalin had believed in the plain meaning of his own words, the Soviet Union's western borders today would be secure, not insecure Poland would be at peace with itself Yalta would be a term of approbation rather than of reproach. Stalin's successors must have this said to them by the Western governments, and repeated again and again.

The safety of both East and West depend on a European security system that rests on consent. Without consent, nothing is settled, nothing is final, nothing is secure.

Memorandum of the Polish Government-in-Exile on the Repudiation of the Yalta Agreements of February 1945

SUMMARY

1. The Yalta decisions have their origin in the Soviet territorial expansion in the period from 1939 to 1941, made possible by the Soviet-German collaboration following the Ribbentrop-Molotov Pact.

2. The Yalta decisions on Poland constituted an internationally consecrated satellisation of an independent state.

3. The real meaning of the Yalta agreement was that it facilitated further Soviet expansion up to the Elbe by way of both, formal annexations and the creation of a belt of satellite states. It is, however, incorrect to speak of the partition of Europe into two spheres of influence, the situation in Western Europe not being comparable in any way to that prevailing in the East.

4. The legal nature of the Yalta decisions remains obscure; whether or not these constitute an international treaty, there is no legal obstacle to their termination.

5. Such termination cannot by itself change the actual situation in Central and Eastern Europe; it would, however, be of major moral and political significance in the shaping of new policies aiming at such a change.

6. The Polish Government-in-Exile which, in 1945, vigorously protested against the Yalta decisions and refused to recognize their validity, now requests the Governments of the Free World to repudiate the Yalta agreements and to declare them null and void.

INTRODUCTION

The recent events in Poland have broken the silence which has prevailed over the Yalta decisions for 37 years. As the question is now reopened, it seems useful to attempt a reassessment of the Yalta agreement, its origins, meaning and consequences for Europe.

THE ORIGINS

The Yalta meeting between Churchill, Roosevelt and Stalin on 4-11 February 1945 was not an isolated event but a link in the chain of historical events of which it grew. Soviet-German collaboration for almost two years after the start of the Second World War brought the Soviet Union important territorial acquisitions: from a strip of Finnish territory in the north, through the three Baltic states, Eastern Poland, down to Rumanian Bessarabia and Bukovina, i.e. to the mouth of the Danube in the South. The acquisition of Eastern Poland proved to be of decisive influence for the future.[1]

Even prior to the German attack on 22 June 1941, the Soviet Union made it clear that she expected Great Britain to recognize here annexation of the Baltic states before relations between the two countries could improve.[2] Having found herself in the Allied camp as a result of the German attack, the USSR made her position unmistakably clear as early as December 1941: she intended not only to keep all the gains achieved during the period of Soviet-German collaboration but demanded moreover the right to establish basis in Finland and Rumania, while signalling her agreement to possible future British bases in Denmark and Norway.[3] It soon became evident that the intended Soviet expansion would take two forms: straightforward annexations and the creation of a belt of satellite states endowed with "friendly" governments along the Soviet formal frontiers. It is impossible, within the limits of this paper, to trace the long road the Western powers have travelled from an initial categorical rejection of all such demands, through successive partial concessions, to their complete endorsement. The process is now fully documented both in official publications and in memoirs of statesmen.

THE YALTA DECISIONS

In this process the Yalta Conference represents a crucial development. The Conference dealt with a wide range of problems.[4] It was, however, the Polish question which occupied most of its time and which, by common admission, was of particular importance. The decisions on Poland must therefore briefly be recalled.

Poland, the ally on whose behalf Britain and France want into war, was absent from a conference which was to decide her future frontiers and her government. Moreover, Poland was treated as if she existed only in a vacuum, possessing no statehood, no government, no frontiers and not even a population which need be consulted. This vacuum was now filled in complete accordance with the long standing Soviet claims. Poland's eastern frontier was drawn as the Soviet Union demanded, thus confirming the territorial gains already made under the 1939 Ribbentrop-Molotov agreement. Against this decision, the compensation Poland was to receive in the West was left undetermined both in its geographical extent and in its legal status. This new territorial entity, determined in the loss but undetermined in the gain, was to be endowed with a "friendly" government which, by common consent,[5] was to be a Soviet puppet, intended to act as an instrument of Soviet policy, which the Western powers for this very reason had consistently refused to recognise. To make such recognition now palatable, this body had to be slightly refashioned by the inclusion of an insignificant number of outsiders, the refashioning to take place in Moscow, under the auspices of Molotov, the Soviet Foreign Minister, accompanied by the British and American ambassadors accredited to the Soviet Government. This "new" Polish government itself not a party to the decision—was to conduct "free and unfettered" elections at an unspecified date and in the absence of all institutional guarantees.

The Yalta decision on Poland was thus a clear case of an internationally consecrated satellisation of an independent state, to be borne out later by events within Poland and outside.

THE REAL MEANING OF YALTA

The question must now be asked a/what was the real meaning of Yalta and b/what it was not.

(a) If the decision on Poland was given pre-eminence in this paper it was because it transcends by far the fate of the Polish nation. Indeed, the abandonment of Poland to the Soviet empire, combined with the already existing Soviet occupation of Baltic states and the impending control of Eastern Germany, was inexorably bound to result in the loss of independence of all countries lying between Germany and Russia and in the establishment of Soviet domination up to the Elbe. It may be a matter of speculation whether a joint military occupation of Germany, on the model of the joint occupation of Berlin and Vienna, would have impeded or at least rendered more difficult such domination.[6] The fact remains that the attribution of individual Allied zones of occupation had already been decided long before the Yalta conference [7] and that this obviously helped to close the Soviet ring around Poland.

The satellisation of Poland, an international act performed at a single stroke, was followed by unilateral and more gradual satellisation of the other countries in Central and Eastern Europe. Thus, for instance, the subjugation of Czechoslovakia took place as a result of unilateral Soviet pressure and as late as February 1948.[8]

As a result, this stage of Soviet empire-building was completed around 1953, with formal annexations including strips of Finland, the Baltic states, part of East Prussia with Konigsberg, Eastern Poland, Subcarpathian Ukraine, Bessarabia and Bukovina. The formal Soviet frontiers now surpass anything Czarist Russia even held in Europe. To the West of these formal frontiers there was erected an advanced glacis of satellite states, including Poland, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and Albania, although the last two succeeded later in recovering their independence from the Soviet suzerainty.

This then is the real meaning of Yalta: the extension of the formal Soviet frontiers and the enslavement of half of Europe not by way of a formal stipulation to this effect, but as a result of an internationally consecrated satellisation of a state holding a geographical key position in the area.[9]

It was in this way that Yalta has become the foundation of the Soviet colonial empire in Europe.[10]

This is why the USSR clings to the Yalta decisions with the utmost tenacity and violently reacts to all attempts to re-open the question.

(b) This situation has given rise to the widespread myth of a Yalta partition of Europe into spheres of influence. The myth does not correspond to reality. Yalta has indeed divided Europe into a vast Soviet-dominated area and one that is not Soviet-dominated; but this has been done not by a parallel attribution of respective spheres of influence to the participating powers, but by the Western allies condoning unilateral Soviet expansion. Neither in their text nor by their implications do the Yalta decisions provide for either territorial gains by or a hegemony of the Anglo-Saxon powers in Western Europe.

This remains true in spite of the fact that the idea of spheres of influence did in fact time and again appear in the course of the Western-Soviet negotiations during the war. Suggestions to this effect originated with the USSR, in the obvious intention of strengthening its own expansionist case [11] Such suggestions were met with the same vacillations as were all other Soviet demands, ranging from straight refusal [12] through partial acceptance, qualified as a matter of military responsibility and for a limited period of time [13] to downright local deals of sordid character.[14] While such developments should in no case be glossed over, the general context would seem to indicate that what was at stake for the Western powers was less an actual establishment of their own spheres of influence than an attempt to set limits to growing Soviet expansion. This led to differing results, such agreements being in some cases respected,[15] and in others disregarded.[16]

The myth of Yalta partition of Europe into two spheres of influence founders equally on further developments and on the present day situation. Indeed, what has come to be known as the two blocs or alliance systems, is not comparable. As already mentioned, there are neither territorial gains by the Anglo-Saxon powers in Europe, nor any sort of hegemony. Great Britain is anyway no longer a world power and the United States heads an alliance system within which she is confronted not with vassal states but with authentic and, at times, very difficult allies. This system is based on a free decision of its members. France and Greece were free to leave the military organization of NATO without American tanks rolling into Paris or Athens and every Western European state is free to determine its own political, social and economic system without facing the danger of "normalisation". The existing division of Europe must be seen for what it is: a monolithic empire in the East from which no secession is permitted and within which no deviation, however slight, is tolerated, and a free alliance of heterogenous states in the West, with freedom of decisions, diverging interests and, all too often, conflicting policies.

THE LEGAL ASPECTS OF THE YALTA DECISIONS

The Yalta decisions have been described by a prominent American international lawyer as a "legal monstrosity".[17] They certainly stand unique in the history of international instruments both in form and in contents.

As regards forms, they lack all normal characteristics of an international treaty, even by most lenient standards. However great the flexibility of international law in matters of form, some minimum requirements have yet to be met for an instrument so to quality. Thus, an international treaty, whatever its designation/treaty, convention, agreement, protocol, etc./is an agreement between two or more subjects of international law, giving rise to rights and obligations under that law; it is not an agreement between individuals, however elevated their rank.

Nowhere in the Yalta decisions is there any mention of the participating states. They are couched in the form of personal understandings between three highly placed political figures, speaking in their own name "we have considered", "we have agreed", "we came", "we discussed", in the absence of any indication of their acting as organs of their respective states. They thus bear such a personal character as to prompt the question "whether the United States, in contrast possibly to President Roosevelt, was ever legally bound upon signature of the agreement by the latter."[18] Nor do the Yalta decisions carry any of the usual final clauses determining the coming into force of the treaty, its duration, termination, possible denunciation, etc. In fact, the decisions did not provide for ratification without at the same time indicating their entry into force upon signature. While purporting to deal with problems of general interest, they do not carry an accession clause and were in fact not acceded to by any other state.[19]

As regards contents, the instruments are a monument of obscurity, couched in a language of political proclamations, rarely encountered in legal acts, full of general statements with no discernible normative meaning and abounding in ambiguous qualifications "democratic", "free and unfettered", "peace-loving", etc. which were bound to give rise to widely differing interpretations, especially in the obvious absence of any common value judgment. This, by the way, is exactly what was to happen long after the Yalta conference. It is finally unclear what precise rights and obligations arise out of these decisions for the contracting parties, though this may result from the fact that these deal mostly with rights and obligations of third states, Poland, China, Yugoslavia, etc.

The participants at the Yalta conference chose, however, to qualify ex post the Yalta decisions as an international treaty and it must be conceded that they were free to do so. It was on the strength of such qualifications that the Western powers were repeatedly to accuse the Soviet Union of its violation.

But if that is so, and if the Yalta decisions in fact constitute a treaty, then it is a treaty tainted ab initio with illegality, being concluded in violation both of the basic principle of general international law according to which no state can, without its consent, be deprived of its rights by other states, and also of an impressive list of existing treaties to which the Yalta participants were contracting parties.[20]

Summing up: on all generally accepted criteria, the treaty character of the Yalta decisions is subject to doubt; on the authentic interpretation of the contracting parties, it is not. On either assumption, the way is free for putting an end to Yalta: for either the decisions do not constitute an international treaty and thus have no legal existence whatsoever; or else, they do constitute such a treaty binding on the three contracting parties, but have been, as forcefully asserted by the two Western powers, repeatedly violated by the Soviet Union and are thus ripe for denunciation on the strength of the general principle of international, as of any law, that of inadimplenti non est adimplendum, i.e. termination of the treaty on account of its violation by a contracting party.[21]

Thus there is no legal obstacle to ending the Yalta decisions for their participants; for the third states, Yalta anyway was and remains a res inter alios acta—a matter settled between other parties.

CONCLUSION

The Yalta decisions, spelling the enslavement of half of Europe, did not even bring about the expected peace and security for the rest of the world. On the contrary, the division of Europe became the source of permanent unbalance and tension. Moreover, the Soviet domination of Central-East Europe turned out to be not a final satisfaction of Soviet claims but a mere springboard for further Soviet expansion which is nowdays spreading over all continents.

Last but not least, the situation created in Central-East Europe as a result of Yalta keeps on being dramatically contested by its victims. East Berlin 1953, Poznan 1956, Budapest 1956, Prague 1968 and Poland 1970 and again 1980-81, bear witness to the determination of the enslaved peoples of that region to re-assert the rights of which they have been deprived. Nothing indicates that this process will stop, sparing the Western world recurring crises and even greater tensions. The end of Yalta is therefore in the common interest of those who are already enslaved and those who are still free.

Admittedly, the situation of fact prevailing in Central-East Europe will not cease by a mere withdrawal of its legal or pseudo-legal basis. Such withdrawal would, however, represent an immense moral and political asset in the shaping of new policies aimed at bringing about an effective change in Europe and the world. It is long overdue.

The so-called "Protocol of Proceedings, released only on 24 March 1947, repeated textually the decisions mentioned above under 5/, 6/ and 7/, as well as the decisions under 8/ in a slightly abridged form, while carrying moreover an enlarged section on World Organisation, a distinct section on the dismemberment of Germany, though with no precise indications and subject to future study, a distinct section on the French zone of occupation in Germany as well as the French participation in the Control Council for Germany, and finally an enlarged section on German reparations. Furthermore, the questions of major war criminals, the Italo-Yugoslav and the Italo-Austrian frontiers, relations between Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, South Eastern Europe, Iran, the Montreux Convention and the question of the Straits were mentioned as problems for further study and consideration. A separate protocol on German reparations was attached. The agreement regarding entry of the Soviet Union into the war against Japan was classified top secret and was released only on 11 February 1946. [18] Briggs, op. cit., p. 380. While not concluded under Article 2, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution, requiring the "advice and consent of the Senate", the Yalta decisions could of course have fallen into the category of executive agreements for which such advice and consent are not required. Concerning the Far Eastern part of the decisions, Prof. Briggs held, however, that they "contain commitments of such uncertain meaning and doubtful duration as to raise serious doubts as to the President's constitutional competence to commit the United States by executive agreement." Ibid., p. 381. Here again, "uncertain meaning" and "doubtful duration" are characteristic of the whole of the Yalta packet and not only of its Far Eastern part.

[19] Curiously enough, not even the Yalta-sponsored government of Poland accomplished a formal act of accession, choosing instead the rather unusual formula of "recognition" of the Crimean decisions on Poland. "Documents on American Foreign Relations," VII, p. 904.

At the request of Mr. PRYOR, the name of the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 292, a resolution expressing the appreciation of the Senate to certain organizations for their efforts in carrying out an emergency food distribution and shelter program provided for in Public Law 98-8.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 91—RELATING TO BUILDER BONDS

Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. DODD) submitted the following concurrent resolution: which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

S. CON. RES. 91

Whereas the homebuilding industry is critical to the health of our Nation's economy;

Whereas certain mortgage-backed bonds, known as "builder bonds", are means of self-help developed by the homebuilding industry within the limitations of traditional tax laws and business practices to provide needed financing for construction and purchase of homes;

Whereas mortgage-backed builder bonds have provided the means by which thousands of home buyers have been able to acquire homes;

Whereas mortgage-backed builder bonds are currently a useful method for making housing available during periods of high interest rates;

Whereas additional benefits are obtained by both home buyers and the economy through the use of GNMA or other Federal agency securities as collateral for such bonds;

Whereas the taxation of mortgage-backed builder bonds is currently governed by principles of taxation that have existed for almost sixty years, and whereas these principles of taxation were not modified when the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 was substantially amended in 1980 after several years of careful study; and

Whereas any precipitous change in the currently existing taxation of mortgage-backed builder bond transactions could have a catastrophic impact on the homebuilding industry: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), that it is the sense of the Congress that the provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 relating to installment sales and the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury under such provisions, or any other provision of the Internal Revenue Code or regulation, should not be modified or amended in any way that will alter the manner in which mortgage backed builder bond transactions are currently taxed.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, today I am introducing a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the tax treatment of builder bonds should not be altered.

Homeownership is a fundamental element of the American dream. The homebuilding industry is one of the largest employers in the United States and a dominant contributor to the economy. As we all well know, the homebuilding industry has, in recent years, been subjected to unprecedented strains. We in Congress have considered a number of proposals to try to help this beleaguered industry. Now, when the homebuilding industry is seeking to help itself, the Treasury is seeking to stop that self-help in its tracks.

I will remind my colleagues of some of the gruesome facts of the past few years. From well over 2 million housing starts in 1978, the industry plunged to a historic low of just 1 million housing starts in 1982. During the past 4 years, there have been more than 100 changes in the prime rate and more than 25 changes in the VA/FHA mortgage interest rates. Interest rates have been at historic highs, the savings and loan industry has been sick, and practically every source of long-term financing has been strained. The fact that housing starts are once again nearing the 2 million mark demonstrates the resilience and creativity of the homebuilding industry.

In simple terms, builder bonds are bonds sold to the public as a means of raising construction capital and financing the purchase of homes by consumers. The collateral used to back these bonds comes from home mortgages held by the issuer. Under present provisions of the Tax Code, the funds raised through builder bonds are not considered taxable; however, the funds generated from the home mortgages serving as collateral are considered taxable income. This tax treatment also serves the purpose of allowing the builder to obtain the maximum level of usable investment capital through the long recognized installment sales method of reporting income.

Builder bonds allow the builder to pay taxes only on income received from payment of mortgages and not on moneys borrowed through the sale of bonds.

The Treasury Department is now considering sending legislation to Congress which would eliminate the builder bond source of home mortgages. This legislation would impose a tax on builders when moneys are borrowed; that is, the bonds are sold, as opposed to when actual income is received; that is, the mortgages are paid off. The Treasury proposal would be devastating to the homebuilding industry and to the home buying public without significantly increasing overall revenues to the Federal Government.

This administration has consistently pushed for private sector support and initiatives. The homebuilders did not come to Congress or the administration and ask for help. Instead, through their own initiative they found a new financing mechanism within already existing perimeters. Yet, this administration seeks to stymie that initiative and return homebuilders to the position they were in 2 years ago.

Therefore, today, I am introducing a sense of the Congress resolution that this Congress is opposed to any modification of the installment sales reporting provisions of the IRS Code as it applies to mortgage-backed bond transactions.

Mr. President, I frankly do not understand what the administration is attempting to do with this threat of new legislation or administrative action. To pick on the homebuilding industry, an industry that has suffered and now is making a comeback, while at the same time refusing to make any serious efforts to overhaul the tax system or to make inroads into this outrageous deficit, baffles me. I hope that my colleagues will join me in sending a signal to the Treasury Department and this administration that says leave builder bonds alone.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 92—RELATING TO THE WITHDRAWAL OF U.S. ARMED FORCES IN LEBANON

Mr. BIDEN (for himself, Mr. BYRD, Mr. PELL, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. DIXON, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. EXON, Mr. FORD, Mr. HART, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. LONG, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. SASSER, and Mr. TSONGAS) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That (a) the Congress finds as follows:

(1) Lebanon is important to United States interests in the Middle East, and the goal of United States policy with respect to Lebanon remains the territorial integrity and independence of Lebanon.

(2) There is, however, widespread confusion among the American people about the mission of the United States Marines in Lebanon, and the President has been unable to present a convincing rationale for continued participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon under present circumstances.

(3) As the situation in Lebanon has deteriorated in recent months, it has posed increased dangers to the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon and has prohibited them from performing the peacekeeping mission which was the original justification for their presence in Lebanon.

(4) As the Department of Defense Commission on the Beirut International Airport Terrorist Act of 23 October 1983 (commonly known as the "Long Commission") concluded, United States policy with respect to Lebanon has emphasized military options and the expansion of the United States military role and there is an urgent need for a reassessment of alternative means to achieve United States objectives in Lebanon in light of the changed circumstances.

(5) The Investigations Subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives, in its report dated December 19, 1983, concluded that, "Sustained deployment of personnel in the situation of almost certain further casualties should only be undertaken if the policy objectives are visible, profoundly important and clearly obtainable. Failure of the administration to adequately reexamine its policy and relate it to present conditions will only mean that such reexamination will have to be done by Congress".

(6) The United States Marines in Lebanon have performed superbly despite the lack of a realistic United States policy and the confusion about their mission, and every effort must be made to ensure that, pending their withdrawal from Lebanon, measures are taken to protect their security which are commensurate with the risks of further terrorist and other attacks.

(7) The situation in Lebanon, which is mired in internal domestic stalemate because of internal fighting and the refusal of the parties to the conflict to make the compromises necessary to promote progress toward a peaceful resolution of the country's problems, requires a United States policy which gives higher priority to diplomatic and political solutions.

(8) The situation in Lebanon is drifting out of control and the administration's policy regarding Lebanon is not working. The United States is reacting to events rather than implementing policies which are in the national interest of the United States.

(9) The administration has failed to impress upon the Government of Lebanon the urgent need for it to develop a viable reconciliation plan, which might include such objectives as more equitable power sharing, early parliamentary elections, a new census, and the formation of a government of national reconciliation.

(10) The administration has allowed the situation in Lebanon to dominate the United States agenda in the Middle East to the detriment of efforts for progress in the broader, and ultimately more important, Middle East peace process.

(11) The failure of the administration's policy has led to widespread concern among the American people that continued participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is not in the national interest.

(b) Therefore, the Congress declares that United States policy toward Lebanon should include the following elements:

(1) The prompt and orderly withdrawal of the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon, in consultation with other members of the Multinational Force.

(2) A concerted diplomatic effort at the United Nations to replace the Multinational Force in Lebanon with another international peacekeeping force under United Nations auspices, as called for in section 5(c) of the Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution, such effort to include discussions with the Secretary General of the United Nations, the President of the Security Council, and all members of the Security Council. If this is not successful, the United States must intensify efforts to obtain agreement by other countries to assume peacekeeping responsibilities in the Beirut area.

(3) Advising the Government of Lebanon of the urgent need for that Government to develop a reconciliation plan which recognizes the legitimate aspirations of all confessional groups.

(4) Development of intensified diplomatic efforts with Syria, as soon as possible, to achieve acceptance by Syria, and the factions it supports in Lebanon, of a reconciliation plan for Lebanon.

(5) Promotion of a continuing dialogue between the Governments of Israel and Lebanon concerning security arrangements and a reconciliation plan for Lebanon.

(6) Continuation of other efforts to achieve the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon and the reestablishment of a sovereign independent Lebanon, taking into account the legitimate security concerns of Syria and Israel.

(7) Renewal of efforts to pursue vigorously a broader Middle East peace to reduce tensions through the region as a step in facilitating peace and reconciliation in Lebanon.

(8) Intensification of United States efforts to retrain and reequip the Lebanese Armed Forces, including efforts to increase military assistance and the delivery of defense articles and defense services to enable the Government of Lebanon to assume the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon and enable local security forces to assume internal security functions among various communities in the country.

(9) Implementation of an economic assistance program for Lebanon with funds already appropriated, and with the immediate assistance of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, to start sound economic reconstruction and development projects and energize the Lebanese Government to provide better services and more presence in as much of the country as possible.

(10) Implementation of a series of plans, including military contingency plans, to protect against the increasing threat which terrorism poses to the United States and its friends and interests in the region. Such plans should include improvement of United States intelligence gathering, coordination, and assessment capabilities in Lebanon in order to protect United States interests, citizens, and Armed Forces in Lebanon and to guard against terrorist attacks.

(c) Not later than 30 days after the adoption of this resolution, the President shall submit a written report to the Congress on the actions he has taken to implement these policies.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Senators BIDEN, PELL, myself, and 29 other Democratic Senators, I am introducing a Senate concurrent resolution which, among other things, urges the prompt and orderly withdrawal of U.S. Armed Forces participating in the multinational force in Lebanon.

The resolution stipulates that such a withdrawal should be carried out in consultation with the other members of the multinational force. In addition, the resolution calls upon the President to submit within 30 days of enactment by the Congress a written report to the Congress on actions he has taken to implement the withdrawal.

This resolution is identical to the one introduced by the House Democrats yesterday.

Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary to go into a lengthy discussion of the administration's Lebanon policy. It suffices to point out that the policy has failed. I also believe it is cynical of administration spokesmen to characterize the House resolution as being blatantly partisan and undercutting the President's policies in the Middle East.

On September 29, 1983, the Senate followed the lead of the House of Representatives and passed an authorization bill extending by 18 months the continued participation of U.S. troops in the multinational force. All Democratic Senators, except two, voted against that 18-month authorization. On October 23, 1983, 241 U.S. servicemen were killed in a terrorist attack on the Beirut Airport.

Presidential press spokesman Larry Speakes stated yesterday that any talk of withdrawal in the Congress "aids and abets" Syria "and others" bent on a destructive route in the Middle East. He stated: "We have some deep concerns that the Democrats are playing politics with a critical issue."

Well, let us talk about politics. In effect, the Congress gave the President carte blanche last fall when we passed the 18-month authorization. And what did it produce? Today, we are further away from achieving the stated goals of this administration than ever before. The stated goal of administration policy is as follows: Our presence in Lebanon is required until all foreign forces are withdrawn from that country and until the Lebanese Government is able to exercise sovereignty over all its territory. The Lebanese Government can hardly exercise sovereignty over Beirut, let alone the countryside.

Yet, since Congress gave the administration what it wanted, 255 marines have died. And while 255 marines have died since Congress passed the President's authorization, the American people still do not know why we are in Lebanon.

I wonder whether the administration spokesmen are more concerned about the image of this administration than they are the prestige and credibility of this Nation? I wonder whether the administration's standing-tall slogan has been placed above the concern for the lives of American boys who are virtual hostages at the Beirut Airport?

It is with these concerns in mind—the concerns that 1,600 American boys are being held hostage to events beyond their control—that the Democrats have proceeded with this resolution. Accusing Congress of playing partisan politics is no substitute for a policy. The administration does not have a workable policy and it knows that. The administration is only looking for a scapegoat to blame for its failed policy in Lebanon. It is tragic that rhetoric about partisanship is the only answer the administration can give the American people as to why our marines remain in Lebanon.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I wish to take a few moments to speak in support of the resolution that Senator BYRD has just introduced. We all have differing views on the situation in Lebanon. We argued this point at length when the issue came up as to whether or not to extend the 18 months that the President wanted and some of our colleagues on the Democratic side and on the other side of this building, along with Republicans, were inclined to do so.

I, and the Democratic leader and others, thought that was not a good idea. But now we find ourselves, quite frankly, in a situation where we are faced with one of three alternatives. We can move in the direction that some on both sides of the aisle and both ends of the building want to setting a date certain—which I think is a mistake to say to the President of the United States that you must, in fact, withdraw, particularly when I do not think it is very practical for that to occur, and even if we could do it, I do not think it is a good idea to do it.

The second alternative is to do nothing at all and let the President work his way. Well, what concerns some of us is that I am not sure—and I realize there is strong disagreement on this—but I am not at all sure that the administration has figured out the way they wish to deal with the matter and I am not sure they have thought through the next several steps. They may have thought them through, but I am not sure that their judgment is correct.

And there is a third alternative, and that is that the U.S. Senate and the U.S. House of Representatives go on record and say, "Mr. President, to the extent that there was a consensus before, to the extent that you had bipartisan support, and that, in turn, emboldened you to continue to move in this direction, we have concluded there is no longer any useful purpose for the marines to be on the ground in Lebanon and we suggest a blunt movement and withdrawal of those marines."

That seems to me to give the President both the message and the flexibility that a President should have.

Quite frankly, I hope that the President, who has been saying—I forget his exact words—something like he does not pay attention or does not care or "I will not pay attention to what the Congress says on this matter," I suspect that he may be able to use this resolution in a whole host of ways that will allow him maybe to change his mind.

Quite frankly, I, as one Senator, do not care whether or not he removes the marines and blames the Democrats, removes the marines and blames the Congress, or removes the marines and compliments anybody. I do not care why they are out. I do not care how he gets them out. But the fact of the matter is I think they are counterproductive to U.S. interests in the region and they are a hazard to their own safety. There is no way we can protect them.

For those reasons, I think that this resolution sends a clear message, assuming we pass it, a clear message to the President that we believe that the marines do not serve a useful purpose and that we leave it up to his good judgment to figure out when and under what conditions they should be moved, but to move on it promptly.

So that is the reason I have worked on this matter.

With that, I yield the floor to the leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I now send to the desk a concurrent resolution for appropriate referral, offered on behalf of Mr. BIDEN, Mr. PELL, and myself, and 27 other Senators.

Would the majority leader be opposed to my request that Senators have until 6:30 this afternoon to add their names?

Mr. BAKER. Of course not.

Mr. BYRD. It was acted upon in caucus today, but I have not had time to do a thorough canvass of all the Senators who were not present. If that could be done, it would be appreciated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the portion of the request that it remain open for additional cosponsors is included also?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

SENATE RESOLUTION 330—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED AUTHORIZING EXPENDITURES BY THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

SEC. 3 The committee shall report its findings, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than February 28, 1985.

SEC. 4 Expenses of the committee under this resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee, except that vouchers shall not be required for the disbursement of salaries of employees paid at an annual rate.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

IMPROVEMENTS TO RIVERS AND HARBORS

DOMENICI AMENDMENT NO. 2692

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. DOMENICI submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1739) to authorize the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to construct various projects for improvements to rivers and harbors of the United States, and for other purposes; as follows:

On page 104, following line 18, insert the following:

SEC. 334. The Secretary is authorized, at Federal expense, to modify the outlet conduit of the Galisteo Dam, New Mexico, in order to increase the sediment-trapping efficiency of the project. For the purpose of this section, the sum of $2,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, or thereafter, such sums to remain available until expended.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send to the desk for printing an amendment to authorize a modification at Galisteo Dam in New Mexico.

This amendment is noncontroversial. It is a proposal that will cost the taxpayers at most $2,000,000, yet make the dam far more effective in protecting this Nation's waters.

The current outlet to the dam can best be described as a pipe. When flood waters flow into the reservoir, those waters flow out as rapidly as the pipe can handle them. No capability exists to retain the waters, and thus allowing sediments that are carried in the water to settle out.

My amendment would direct the corps to modify the Galisteo outlet, permitting the retention of water, at least temporarily, to augment the effectiveness of the dam in trapping sediment. This will allow cleaner, better water to flow downstream.

Such a change might be accomplished by installation of a gated structure, or a riser at the inlet to the pipe. The corps is expected to select whichever alternative would prove most cost-effective.

It is my hope that the Senate will approve this proposal when S. 1739 is considered on the Senate floor.

FEDERAL SENTENCING REFORM

KENNEDY AMENDMENT NO. 2693

"(d) TIME AND METHOD OF PAYMENT.—Payment of a fine is due immediately unless the court, at the time of sentencing—

"(1) requires payment by a date certain; or

"(2) establishes an installment schedule, the specific terms of which shall be fixed by the court.

On page 129, between lines 6 and 7, insert the following:

"(g) RESPONSIBILITY TO PROVIDE CURRENT ADDRESS.— At the time of imposition of the fine, the court shall order the person fined to provide the Attorney General with a current mailing address for the entire period that any part of the fine remains unpaid. Failure to provide the Attorney General with a current address or a change in address shall be punishable as a contempt of court.

"(h) STAY OF FINE PENDING APPEALS.—Unless exceptional circumstances exist, if a sentence to pay a fine is stayed pending appeal, the court granting the stay shall include in such stay—

"(1) a requirement that the defendant, pending appeal, to deposit the entire fine amount, or the amount due under an installment schedule, during the pendency of an appeal, in an escrow account in the registry of the district court, or to give bond for the payment thereof; or

"(2) an order restraining the defendant from transferring or dissipating assets found to be sufficient, if sold, to meet the defendant's fine obligation.

"(i) DELINQUENT FINE.—A fine is delinquent if any portion of such fine is not paid within 30 days of when it is due, including any fines to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(j) DEFAULT.—A fine is in default if any portion of such fine is more than 90 days delinquent. When a criminal fine is in default, the entire amount is due within 30 days of notification of the default, notwithstanding any installment schedule.

On page 129 strike out line 7 through line 4 on page 130 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"§ 3573. Modification of remission of fine

"(a) PETITION FOR MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—A defendant who has been sentenced to pay a fine, and who—

"(1) can show a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence and concerning whom the circumstances no longer exist that warranted the imposition of the fine in the amount imposed or payment by the installment schedule, may at any time petition the court for—

"(A) an extension of the installment schedule, not to exceed two years except in case of incarceration or special circumstances; or

"(B) a remission of all or part of the unpaid portion including interest and penalties; or

"(2) has voluntarily made restitution or reparation to the victim of the offense, may at any time petition the court for a remission of the unpaid portion of the fine in an amount exceeding the amount of such restitution or reparation.

Any petition filed pursuant to this subsection shall be filed in the court in which sentence was originally imposed, unless that court transfers jurisdiction to another court. The petitioner shall notify the Attorney General that the petition has been filed within ten working days after filing. For the purposes of clause (1), unless exceptional circumstances exist, a person may be considered to have made a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence only after payment of a reasonable portion of the fine.

"(b) ORDER OF MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—If, after the filing of a petition as provided in subsection (a), the court finds that the circumstances warrant relief, the court may enter an appropriate order, in which case it shall provide the Attorney General with a copy of such order.

On page 141, line 13, strike out "and".

On page 141, between lines 13 and 14, insert the following:

"(g) keep informed concerning the conduct, condition, and compliance with any condition of probation, including the payment of a fine or restitution of each probationer under his supervision and report thereon to the court placing such person on probation and report to the court any failure of a probationer under his supervision to pay a fine in default within 30 days after notification that it is in default so that the court may determine whether probation should be revoked; and

On page 141, line 14, strike out "(g)" and insert in lieu thereof "(h)".

On page 145, after line 7, strike the item relating to section 3613, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"3613. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine.
"3614. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine.
"3615. Criminal default.

On page 145, strike out lines 16 through page 146, line 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) DISPOSITION OF PAYMENT.—The clerk shall forward each fine payment to the United States Treasury and shall notify the Attorney General of its receipt within 10 working days.

"(b) CERTIFICATION OF IMPOSITION.—If a fine exceeding $100 is imposed, modified, or remitted, the sentencing court shall incorporate in the order imposing, remitting, or modifying such fine, and promptly certify to the Attorney General—

"(1) the name of the person fined;

"(2) his current address;

"(3) the docket number of the case;

"(4) the amount of the fine imposed;

"(5) any installment schedule;

"(6) the nature of any modification or remission of the fine or installment schedule; and

"(7) the amount of the fine that is due and unpaid.

On page 146 line 12, strike out "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof "(c)".

On page 146, after line 18, add the following:

"(d) NOTIFICATION OF DELINQUENCY.—Within 10 working days after a fine is determined to be delinquent as provided in section 3572(i), the Attorney General shall notify the person whose fine is delinquent, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is delinquent.

"(e) NOTIFICATION OF DEFAULT.—Within 10 working days after a fine is determined to be in default as provided in section 3572(j), the Attorney General shall notify the person defaulting, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is in default and the entire unpaid balance, including interest and penalties, is due within 30 days.

"(f) INTEREST, MONETARY PENALTIES FOR DELINQUENCY, AND DEFAULT.—Upon a determination of willful nonpayment, the court may impose the following interest and monetary penalties.

"(1) INTEREST.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, interest at the rate of 1 per centum per month, or 12 per centum per year, shall be charged, beginning the 31st day after sentencing on the first day of each month during which any fine balance remains unpaid, including sums to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(2) MONETARY PENALTIES FOR DELINQUENT FINES.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a penalty sum equal to 10 per centum shall be charged for any portion of a criminal fine which has become delinquent. The Attorney General may waive all or part of the penalty for good cause.

On page 146, strike out line 19 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"§ 3613. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine

On page 149, after line 17 and before the subchapter heading insert the following:

"§ 3614. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine

"(a) RESENTENCING.—Subject to the provisions of subsection (b), if a defendant knowingly fails to pay a delinquent fine the court may resentence the defendant to any sentence which might originally have been imposed.

"(b) IMPRISONMENT.—The defendant may be sentenced to a term of imprisonment under subsection (a) only if the court determines that—

"(1) the defendant willfully refused to pay the delinquent fine or had failed to make sufficient bona fide efforts to pay the fine; or

"(2) in light of the nature of the offense and the characteristics of the person, alternatives to imprisonment are not adequate to serve the purposes of punishment and deterrence.

"§ 3615. Criminal default

"Whoever, having been sentenced to pay a fine, willfully fails to pay the fine, shall be fined not more than twice the amount of the unpaid balance of the fine or $10,000, whichever is greater, imprisoned not more than one year, or both.".

On page 156, line 22, after the period insert the following: "No prisoner shall be released on supervision unless such prisoner agrees to adhere to an installment schedule, not to exceed two years except in special circumstances, to pay for any fine imposed for the offense committed by such prisoner.".

On page 210, line 15, strike "and".

On page 211, line 17, strike the period, and insert in lieu thereof "; and ".

On page 211, after line 17, insert the following:

On page 215, after line 20, insert the following:

SEC. 227. (a)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), for each criminal fine for which the unpaid balance exceeds $100 as of the effective date of this Act, the Attorney General shall, within 120 days, notify the person by certified mail of his obligation, within 30 days after notification, to—

(A) pay the fine in full;

(B) specify, and demonstrate compliance with, an installment schedule established by a court before enactment of the amendments made by this Act, specifying the dates on which designated partial payments will be made; or

(C) establish with the concurrence of the Attorney General, a new installment schedule of a duration not exceeding two years, except in special circumstances, and specifying the dates on which designated partial payments will be made.

(2) This subsection shall not apply in cases in which—

(A) the Attorney General believes the likelihood of collection is remote; or

(B) criminal fines have been stayed pending appeal.

(b) The Attorney General shall, within 180 days after the effective date of this Act, declare all fines for which this obligation is unfulfilled to be in criminal default, subject to the civil and criminal remedies established by amendments made by this Act. No interest or monetary penalties shall be charged on any fines subject to this section.

(c) Not later than one year following the effective date of this Act, the Attorney General shall include in the annual crime report steps taken to implement this Act and the progress achieved in criminal fine collection, including collection data for each judicial district.

SEC. 228. (a) Title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding the following new chapter after chapter 227:

"CHAPTER 228—IMPOSITION, PAYMENT, AND COLLECTION OF FINES

"Sec.

"3591. Imposition of a fine.

"3592. Payment of a fine, delinquency and default.

"3593. Modification or remission of fine.

"3594. Certification and notification.

"3595. Interest, monetary penalties for deliquency, and default.

"3596. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine.

"3597. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine.

"3598. Statute of limitations.

"3599. Criminal default.

"§ 3591. Imposition of a fine.

"(a) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED IN IMPOSING A FINE.—The court, in determining whether to impose a fine, the amount of any fine, the time for payment, and the method of payment, shall consider—

"(1) the ability of the defendant to pay the fine in view of the income of the defendant, earning capacity and financial resources, and, if the defendant is an organization, the size of the organization;

"(2) the nature of the burden that payment of the fine will impose on the defendant, and on any person who is financially dependent on the defendant, relative to the burden which alternative punishments would impose;

"(3) any restitution or reparation made by the defendant imposed upon the defendant to make such restitution or reparation;

"(4) if the defendant is an organization, any measure taken by the organization to discipline its employees or agents responsibile for the offense or to insure against a recurrence of such an offense; and

"(5) any other pertinent consideration.

"(b) EFFECT OF FINALITY OF JUDGMENT.—Notwithstanding the fact that a sentence to pay a fine can subsequently be—

"(1) modified or remitted pursuant to the provisions of section 3592;

"(2) corrected pursuant to the provisions of rule 35; or

"(3) appealed;

a judgment of conviction that includes such a sentence constitutes a final judgment for all other purposes.

"§ 3592. Payment of a fine, delinquency and default

"(a) TIME AND METHOD OF PAYMENT.—Payment of a fine is due immediately unless the court, at the time of sentencing—

"(1) requires payment by a date certain; or

"(2) establishes an installment schedule, the specific terms of which shall be fixed by the court.

"(b) INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITIES FOR PAYMENT.—If a fine is imposed on an organization, it is the duty of each individual authorized to make disbursement of the assets of the organization to pay the fine from assets of the organization. If a fine is imposed on an agent or shareholder of an organization, the fine shall not be paid, directly or indirectly, out of the assets of the organization, unless the court finds that such payment is expressly permissible under applicable State law.

"(c) RESPONSIBILITY TO PROVIDE CURRENT ADDRESS.—At the time of imposition of the fine, the court shall order the person fined to provide the Attorney General with a current mailing address for the entire period that any part of the fine remains unpaid. Failure to provide the Attorney General with a current address or a change in address shall be punishable as a contempt of court.

"(d) STAY OF FINE PENDING APPEAL.—Unless exceptional circumstances exist, if a sentence to pay a fine is stayed pending appeal, the court granting the stay shall include in such stay—

"(1) a requirement that the defendant, pending appeal, to deposit the entire fine amount, or the amount due under an installment schedule, during the pendency of an appeal, in an escrow account in the registry of the district court, or to give bond for the payment thereof; or

"(2) an order restraining the defendant from transferring or dissipating assets found to be sufficient, if sold, to meet the defendant's fine obligation.

"(e) DELINQUENT FINE.—A fine is delinquent if any portion of such fine is not paid within 30 days of when it is due, including any fines to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(f) DEFAULT.—A fine is in default if any portion of such fine is more than 90 days delinquent. When a criminal fine is in default, the entire amount is due with 30 days of notification of the default, notwithstanding any installment schedule.

"§ 3593. Modification or remission of fine

"(a) PETITION FOR MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—A person who has been sentenced to pay a fine, and who—

"(1) can show a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence and concerning whom the circumstances no longer exist that warranted the imposition of the fine in the amount imposed or payment by the installment schedule, may at any time petition the court for—

"(A) an extension of the installment schedule, not to exceed two years except in case of incarceration or special circumstances; or

"(B) a remission of all or part of the unpaid portion including interest and penalties; or

"(2) has voluntarily made restitution or reparation to the victim of the offense, may at any time petition the court for a remission of the unpaid portion of the fine in an amount not exceeding the amount of such restitution or reparation.

Any petition filed pursuant to this subsection shall be filed in the court in which sentence was originally imposed, unless that court transfers jurisdiction to another court. The petitioner shall notify the Attorney General that the petition has been filed within ten working days after filing. For the purposes of clause (1), unless exceptional circumstances exist, a person may be considered to have made a good faith effort to comply with the terms of the sentence only after payment of a reasonable portion of the fine.

"(b) ORDER OF MODIFICATION OR REMISSION.—If, after the filing of a petition as provided in subsection (a), the court finds that the circumstances warrant relief, the court may enter an appropriate order, in which case it shall provide the Attorney General with a copy of such order.

"§ 3594. Certification and notification

"(a) DISPOSITION OF PAYMENT.—The clerk shall forward each fine payment to the United States Treasury and shall notify the Attorney General of its receipt within 10 working days.

"(b) CERTIFICATION OF IMPOSITION.—If a fine exceeding $100 is imposed, modified, or remitted, the sentencing court shall incorporate in the order imposing, remitting, and modifying such fine, and promptly certify to the Attorney General—

"(1) the name of the person fined;

"(2) his current address;

"(3) the docket number of the case;

"(4) the amount of the fine imposed;

"(5) any installment schedule;

"(6) the nature of any modification or remission of the fine or installment schedule; and

"(7) the amount of the fine that is due and unpaid.

"(c) RESPONSIBILITY FOR COLLECTION.—The Attorney General shall be responsible for collection of an unpaid fine concerning which a certification has been issued as provided in subsection (a).

"(d) NOTIFICATION OF DELINQUENCY.—Within 10 working days after a fine is determined to be delinquent as provided in section 3592(e), the Attorney General shall notify the person whose fine is delinquent, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is delinquent.

"(e) NOTIFICATION OF DEFAULT.—Within 10 working days after a fine is determined to be in default as provided in section 3592(f), the Attorney General shall notify the person defaulting, by certified mail, to inform him that the fine is in default and the entire unpaid balance, including interest and penalties, is due within 30 days.

"§ 3595. Interest, monetary penalties for delinquency, and default

"Upon a determination of willful nonpayment, the court may impose the following interest and monetary penalties:

"(1) INTEREST.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, interest at the rate of 1 per centum per month, or 12 per centum per year, shall be charged, beginning the 31st day after sentencing on the first day of each month during which any fine balance remains unpaid, including sums to be paid pursuant to an installment schedule.

"(2) MONETARY PENALTIES FOR DELINQUENT FINES.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a penalty sum equal to 10 per centum shall be charged for any portion of a criminal fine which has become delinquent. The Attorney General may waive all or part of the penalty for good cause.

"§ 3596. Civil remedies for satisfaction of an unpaid fine

"(a) LIEN.—A fine imposed as a sentence is a lien in favor of the United States upon all property belonging to the persons fined. The lien arises at the time of the entry of the judgment and continues until the liability is satisfied, remitted, or set aside, or until it becomes unenforceable pursuant to the provisions of subsection (b). On application of the person fined, the Attorney General shall—

"(1) issue a certificate of release, as described in section 6325 of the Internal Revenue Code, of any lien imposed pursuant to this section, upon his acceptance of a bond described in section 6325(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code; or

"(2) issue a certificate of discharge, as described in section 6325 of the Internal Revenue Code, of any part of the person's property subject to a lien imposed pursuant to this section, upon his determination that the fair market value of that part of such property remaining subject to and available to satisfy the lien is at least three times the amount of the fine.

"(c) APPLICATION OF OTHER LIEN PROVISIONS.—The provisions of sections 6323, 6331, 6334 through 6336, 6337(a), 6338 through 6343, 6901, 7402, 7403, 7424 through 7426, 7505(a), 7506 7701, and 7805 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6323, 6331, 6332, 6334 through 6336, 6337 (a), 6338 through 6343, 6901, 7402, 7403, 7424 through 7426, 7505(a), 7506, 7701, and 7805) and of section 513 of the Act of October 17, 1940 (54 Stat. 1190), apply to a fine and to the lien imposed by subsection (a) as if the liability of the person fined were for an internal revenue tax assessment, except to the extent that the application of such statutes is modified by regulations issued by the Attorney General to accord with differences in the nature of the liabilities. For the purposes of this subsection, references in the preceding sections of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to 'the Secretary' shall be construed to mean 'the Attorney General,' and references in those sections to 'tax' shall be construed to mean 'fine'.

"(d) EFFECT ON NOTICE OF LIEN.—A notice of the lien imposed by subsection (a) shall be considered a notice of lien for taxes payable to the United States for the purposes of any State or local law providing for the filing of a notice of a tax lien. The registration, recording, docketing, or indexing, in accordance with 28 U.S.C. 1962, of the judgment under which a fine is imposed shall be considered for all purposes as the filing prescribed by section 6323(f)(1)(A) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6323 (f)(1)(A)) and by subsection (c).

"(e) ALTERNATIVE ENFORCEMENT.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, a judgment imposing a fine may be enforced by execution against the property of the person fined in like manner as judgments in civil cases.

"(f) DISCHARGE OF DEBTS INAPPLICABLE.—No discharge of debts pursuant to a bankruptcy proceeding shall render a lien under this section unenforceable or discharge liability to pay a fine.

"§ 3597. Resentencing upon failure to pay a fine

"(a) RESENTENCING.—Subject to the provisions of subsection (b), if a person knowingly fails to pay a delinquent fine the court may resentence the person to any sentence which might originally have been imposed.

"(b) IMPRISONMENT.—The defendant may be sentenced to a term of imprisonment under subsection (a) only if the court determines that—

"(1) the person willfully refused to pay the delinquent fine or had failed to make sufficient bona fide efforts to pay the fine; or

"(2) in light of the nature of the offense and the characteristics of the person, alternatives to imprisonment are not adequate to serve the purposes of punishment and deterrence.

"§ 3598. Statute of limitations

"(a) LIABILITY TO PAY A FINE EXPIRES.—

"(1) 20 years after the entry of the judgment;

"(2) upon the death of the person fined.

"(b) The period set forth in subsection (a) may be extended, prior to its expiration, by a written agreement between the person fined and the Attorney General. The running of the period set forth in subsection (a) is suspended during any interval for which the running of the period of limitations for collection of a tax would be suspended pursuant to section 6503(b), 6503(c), 6503(f), 6503(i), or 7508(a)(1)(I) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6503(b), 6503(c), 6503(f), 6503(i), or 7508(a)(1)(I)), or section 513 of the Act of October 17, 1940 (54 Stat. 1190).

"§ 3599. Criminal default

"Whoever, having been sentenced to pay a fine, willfully fails to pay the fine, shall be fined not more than twice the amount of the unpaid balance of the fine or $10,000, whichever is greater, imprisoned not more than one year, or both.".

(b) Section 3651 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting after "May be required to provide for the support of any persons, for whose support he is legally responsible." the following new paragraph:

"If the court has imposed and ordered execution of a fine and placed the defendant on probation, payment of the fine or adherence to the court-established installment schedule shall be a condition of the probation.".

(c) Section 3651 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out the last paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"The defendant's liability for any unexecuted fine or other punishment imposed as to which probation is granted, shall be fully discharged by the fulfillment of the terms and conditions of probation.".

(d) The second paragraph of section 3655 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"He shall keep informed concerning the conduct, condition, and compliance with any condition of probation, including the payment of a fine or restitution of each probationer under his supervision, and shall report thereon to the court placing such person on probation. He shall report to the court any failure of a probationer under his supervision to pay a fine in default within 30 days after notification that it is in default so that the court may determine whether probation should be revoked.".

(e) Section 4209 of title 18, United States Code, is amended in subsection (a) by striking out the period at the end of the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "and, in a case involving a criminal fine that has not already been paid, that the parolee pay or agree to adhere to an installment schedule, not to exceed 2 years except in special circumstances, to pay for any fine imposed for the offense.".

(f) Subsection (b)(1) of section 4214 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after "parole" the following: "or a failure to pay a fine in default within 30 days after notification that it is in default".

(g)(1) Section 3565 of title 18, United States Code, is repealed.

(2) The table of sections for chapter 227 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out the item for section 3565 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"3565. Repealed.".

(h) Section 3569 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) striking out "(a)"; and

(2) striking out subsection (b).

(i) This section shall be repealed on the first day of the first calendar month beginning 24 months after the date of enactment of this Act.

At the appropriate place in the bill, add the following:

SEC. 27. Since, due to an impending crisis in prison overcrowding, available Federal prison space must be treated as a scarce resource in the sentencing of criminal defendants;

Since, sentencing decisions should be designed to insure that prison resources are, first and foremost, reserved for those violent and serious criminal offenders who pose the most dangerous threat to society;

Since, in cases of non-violent and non-serious offenders, the interests of society as a whole as well as individual victims of crime can continue to be served through the imposition of alternative sentences, such as restitution and community service;

Since, in the two years preceding the enactment of sentencing guidelines, federal sentencing practice should insure that scarce prison resources are available to house violent and serious criminal offenders by the increased use of restitution, community service, and other alternative sentences in cases of nonviolent and nonserious offenders: Now, therefore, be it

Declared, that it is the sense of the Senate that in the two years preceding the enactment of the sentencing guidelines, federal judges, in determining the particular sentence to be imposed, consider—

(1) the nature and circumstances of the offense and the history and characteristics of the defendant;

(2) the general appropriateness of imposing a sentence other than imprisonment in cases in which the defendant has not been convicted of a crime of violence or otherwise serious offense; and

(3) the general appropriateness of imposing a sentence of imprisonment in cases in which the defendant has been convicted of a crime of violence or otherwise serious offense.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON BANKING, HOUSING, AND URBAN AFFAIRS

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public, the scheduling of a public hearing before the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs on the Cash Discount Act and proposals to extend the ban on credit card surcharges which expires on February 27, 1984. The hearing will be held on Tuesday, February 7, beginning at 9:30 a.m. in room SD-538 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. For further information regarding this hearing, please contact Ms. Linda Zemke of the Banking Committee staff at 224-1564.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public the scheduling of a public hearing before the Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations on the subject of "Metropolitan Regional Governance." The hearing will be held on Monday, February 6, beginning at 9:30 a.m. in room SD-342 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

Over the past 20 years, Congress has defined a national interest in promoting "substate regionalism"—efforts to solve the problems of metropolitan regions on an areawide basis. This oversight hearing will examine the concept of metropolitan regionalism in this historical perspective. Also to be discussed will be the role Congress envisioned for metropolitan councils within our federal system, whether that role has been realized and where metropolitan regional government may be headed in the future.

A major objective of the hearing will be to define principles to guide an approach to regionalism in the future: What are the appropriate circumstances for States and local governments to coordinate their efforts to solve collective problems on an areawide basis rather than by independent action of each separate government; What is the role of regional councils in this coordinated approach; What is the Federal role, if any, in promoting and supporting regional governance; and what are the most appropriate means available to Congress when such action is desirable?

Those wishing to testify or who wish to submit written statements for hearing record should write to the Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations, room 432, Senate Hart Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20510. In accordance with the rules of the committee, witnesses should have 20 copies of their testimony sent to the subcommittee 3 days—February 2—before the hearing, and make 80 copies available on the day of the hearing. Witnesses are requested to limit their oral testimony to 5 minutes.

For further information regarding this hearing, you may wish to contact Mr. Mike Quaranta, of the subcommittee staff at (202) 224-4718.

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public the scheduling of a public hearing before the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources to consider the nominations of Ann Dore McLaughlin, of the District of Columbia, to be Under Secretary of the Interior; and Richard Thomas Montoya, of Texas, to be an Assistant Secretary of the Interior (Territorial and International Affairs).

The hearing will be held on Monday, February 6, beginning at 10 a.m., in room SD-366 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

Those wishing to testify or who wish to submit written statements for the hearing record should write to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, room SD-360, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C. 20510.

For further information regarding this hearing you may wish to contact Mr. Gary Ellsworth of the committee staff at 224-5304.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON WATER AND POWER

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public the scheduling of a public hearing before the Subcommittee on Water and Power to receive testimony on S. 2176, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the Lake Andes-Wagner unit, South Dakota pumping division, Pick-Sloan Missouri basin program, South Dakota; and S. 2189, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the central South Dakota water supply system

The hearing will be held on Tuesday, February 14, beginning at 9 a.m. and concluding about 4:30 p.m., at the National Guard Armory, East Highway 34, Pierre, S. Dak.

Those wishing to testify or who wish to submit written statements for the hearing record should contact either the office of Senator ABDNOR, 260 Federal Building, Pierre, S. Dak. 57501, telephone 605-224-2891; or Mr. Russ Brown, Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, Subcommittee on Water and Power, room SD-360, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C. 20510, telephone 202-224-2366.

For further information regarding this hearing, you may wish to contact Mr. Russ Brown, of the subcommittee staff, at the above-listed number.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

S. 888—THE ECONOMIC EQUITY ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to lend my full support as a cosponsor of S. 888, the Economic Equity Act. This legislation would provide improved economic opportunity for all American women.

Women have been citizens of the United States since the Declaration of Independence in 1776. However, it took another 143 years before women acquired suffrage. Despite the right to vote, women are still discriminated against under the law. The economic rights of women are quantitatively inferior to those of men.

Data abounds that describe the plight of women in the working world. Of the 441 job classifications described by the U.S. Census Bureau, women are concentrated in the 20 lowest paid occupations. Women, on average, earn only 59 percent of what men earn. These statistics are shocking, but the real story is their impact on average people.

The laws established by Congress have erected barriers to the further advancement of women. S. 888 would eliminate many of these barriers. This legislation would allow, among other things, nonworking women equal access to pension and retirement benefits. For instance, nonworking wives are currently denied any claim to pension survivorship benefits accrued during marriage. Such benefits would flow to the second wife. S. 888 would rectify this inequity. Also, the legislation would reform individual retirement account provisions that clearly discriminate against nonworking women. The legislation would increase the zero bracket amount for the head of household to that of a married couple filing jointly. In this way, women independently running a family would receive the same minimum tax deduction as a married couple.

I am pleased that the President has endorsed many of the provisions of S. 888 in his fiscal year 1985 budget. In particular, the President has proposed that the dependent care tax credit be increased and made more available to low income individuals. Furthermore, the President has proposed that qualifying nonprofit day care centers be given tax-exempt status.

The Congress has also taken the first step toward equal economic rights for women by passing the Pension Equity Act, H.R. 4032, last November. This legislation, which I was proud to cosponsor in the Senate as S. 19, made necessary corrections in retirement law. In particular, the bill required that joint or survivor insurance coverage be canceled only with consent of the spouse. Previously, a man could cancel coverage without informing his nonworking wife. The legislation also reduced the age for vesting under ERISA from 25 to 21. This is important since women quite often enter the work force at an earlier age than men. The legislation also insures that maternity leave not constitute a break in service and, thus, a forfeiture of vesting.

Mr. President, the Congress and the President have begun to address the economic discrimination against women prevalent in our pension and tax laws. Enactment of S. 888 would continue the process of extending women equal economic treatment under the law. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this vital legislation.●

EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE FOR EMPLOYEES

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, today I would like to place in the RECORD an article written by Timothy Clark for the National Journal. The article deals with tax-free employer-provided educational assistance plans, section 127 of the Internal Revenue Code. These plans have been tax-free to employees since 1978, but expired at the end of 1983.

Last January, I introduced S. 249 which would make tax-free employer-provided educational assistance plans a permanent part of the law. Hearings were held in the Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Management in April. A 2-year extension of the law was approved as part of the Senate Finance Committee's deficit and spending reduction tax package. You will note that the article incorrectly states this point.

I hope that the Finance Committee and the Senate can act on the tax package promptly and that this vital means of learning new skills to improve one's job will remain tax free.

I submit the article for the RECORD.

IN AN ERA OF $200 BILLION BUDGET DEFICITS, EVEN MODEST TAX BREAKS FACE CHALLENGE

(By Timothy B. Clark)

The Reagan Administration is opposing renewal of a five-year-old tax break for career advancement courses that would cost the Treasury only $25 million this year.

Because a five-year-old tax break was allowed to expire on Dec. 31, thousands of workers seeking to advance their careers by taking courses financed by their employers face substantial additional federal tax payments in 1984.

Whether they will actually pay the additional taxes is not clear, because a broad coalition of companies, unions and educators will push for retroactive reinstatement of the tax break when Congress returns. In the meantime, many tuition payments by employers count as income to employees, withholding on some payments must begin and workers can deduct only those educational expenses that they can prove are directly related to their current jobs.

This seems out of line with the Reagan Administration's support of tuition tax credits and improved education and training for the American labor force. Yet the Treasury Department opposes extending the 1978 law that excluded nonjob-related employer-education expenses from employees' income, arguing that the tax break discriminates in favor of those lucky enough to have employer-financed education programs and that high-income taxpayers benefit disproportionately.

Another concern for Treasury is the revenue loss that would result from extending the tax break: $25 million in 1984, and in the five years ending in 1988, a total of $218 million.

Paltry as these sums are in an era of $200 billion deficits, they are large enough to have stymied congressional action last session on bills to extend the education tax break. In earlier times, the extension would likely have sailed through Congress. That it has encountered difficulty so far, and faces an uncertain future, is testimony to the controversy that virtually every tax proposal attracts in these times of high deficits. The fate of the legislation last November, particularly in the House Ways and Means Committee, illustrated what is becoming a new fact of life for those pushing tax bills: any proposals entailing tax losses must be accompanied by measures to raise offsetting revenues.

Supporters of the extension were not able to get it added to the modest revenue-raising bill (HR 4170) approved by the Ways and Means Committee or to the tax package that was considered by the Senate Finance Committee. And the education provision may get lost in the shuffle again in 1984 as Congress debates the size and content of a tax bill, whether to have more than one bill or whether to have a bill at all.

All of this is frustrating to the companies, unions and educational interests that have been pushing for extension of the 1978 law. They have argued that failure to extend the tax break would work against the interests of American companies and workers struggling to stay abreast of foreign competition in technologically sophisticated lines of business. Workers faced with additional taxes stemming from education frequently pursued on their own time, would be inclined simply to quit their studies, advocates say. The burden would be especially harsh on participants in relatively new, union-negotiated programs aimed at helping unemployed workers in the automobile industry.

Finally, supporters of the program contend that it has particularly benefited women and minorities because companies have frequently aimed educational benefits at these groups as a means of meeting affirmative action goals. These beneficiaries cannot afford to shoulder added taxes, advocates say.

At a Finance Committee meeting last November, Bob Packwood, R-Ore, blew up at Treasury witnesses who insisted on imposing corporate reporting requirements and limiting the duration and scope of the tax break if it were extended. Packwood, the chief Senate backer of the extension, later wrote a letter asking Treasury not to require employers to withhold taxes on tuition payments to employees while Congress considers an extension early this year. But assistant secretary John E. Chapoton declined in a Dec. 22 reply.

"I do not expect them to take any public action to encourage withholding," Packwood said in a Jan. 4 interview. Nonetheless, major employers are prepared to start withholding. Packwood said that he was confident Congress would enact an extension and that he saw no reason to raise the issue at higher levels within the Administration. "We have the votes," he said. "There is no serious opposition."

But others are not so sure. At Treasury, the education tax break is seen as part of increasing efforts by workers and companies to shift compensation from taxable wages to nontaxable fringe benefits. Treasury has tried to resist this erosion of the tax base and has found some sympathy in Congress from Members concerned about the financing of the social security system. (For a report on fringe benefits. see NJ. 6/25/83. p. 1332.)

Packwood says the Treasury opposition cannot be seen as "serious," but the same might be said of support for the extension, which is broad but not particularly deep. "In the universe of tax issues facing corporations, many have a higher panic level than this one does," said Mark D. Wineck, who is lobbying for the extension on behalf of several clients of his law firm, Kilpatrick & Cody. The reluctance of top corporate officers to use up political capital on such a small issue is matched in the government, Wineck said.

"This issue is relegated to the staff level at Treasury and elsewhere in the Administration and to the staff level on the Hill," he said.

Another obstacle is the federal budget deficit, which has motivated Congress to raise taxes, not cut them. "Last year, in the congressional budget, we were ordered to raise $73 billion over three years," said a Ways and Means staff member, "and so a lot of people looked with a great deal of care at any proposals that entailed revenue losses." Committee leaders last year saw extension of the education tax break as entailing "fairly important revenue losses," he said.

ORIGINS OF PROGRAM

The Internal Revenue Code treats most educational expenditures as non-deductible personal expenses. No deductions are allowed for the costs of private secondary school, vocational school or college education to prepare people for entry-level jobs in occupations of their choice.

But the tax code makes an exception for educational expenditures individuals make to maintain or improve their job skills or to meet requirements of their employers. These "job-related education" expenses can be deducted. Not deductible, however, are expenses for education or training designed to qualify a worker for a new trade or business.

Until 1978, the code treated educational and training expenditures by corporations the same way. The cost of education or training financed by corporations and designed to maintain or improve workers' skills in their present jobs was not considered compensation to the employee. If, however, companies financed education that was not directly job-related, the cost had to be considered part of the employee's compensation and taxes withheld.

It proved difficult to determine what education was job-related. As the Joint Taxation Committee said in its explanation of the 1978 law, which eliminated the job-related test: "The 'job-related' distinction often seems both ambiguous and restrictive. For example, if a person with little or no work experience is employed in an entry-level position and receives training from his employer to advance to a job requiring some greater skills or experience, the value of the training may be taxable. This may discourage self-improvement.

"If a typist, for example, receives training to be a secretary, or if a secretary receives training in a paralegal program, it might be considered not job-related. Also, if a clerical employee receives computer training, it may be treated as not job-related, even though the employee's job may require computer skills in the future because of normal advances in business technology."

Companies had to decide on their own whether the education and training they were providing employees met the job-relatedness test and thus required no withholding. Or, in some instances, they relied on Internal Revenue Service agents' analyses of individual cases. Inevitably this led to variations in the tax treatment of similar situations.

A "more serious" reason for changing the law, the Joint Taxation Committee said, was that it served as a "disincentive to upward mobility. Although most citizens recognize the need to provide greater access to educational and economic opportunity to those who have had limited access in the past, the tax law . . . required out-of-pocket tax payments for employer-provided educational assistance from those least able to pay, even though they receive only services, not an increased paycheck."

And so, in 1978, Congress said that employees could exclude from income the cost of tuition or other educational fees, books, supplies and equipment provided or financed by his employer. In a new Section 127 of the Internal Revenue Code, the job-relatedness test was eliminated, and virtually any course of study could receive this favorable tax treatment, except those involving sports, games or hobbies.

Congress also tried to make sure there would be no discrimination against rank-and-file workers. Section 127 provided that not more than 5 per cent of the benefits in an educational assistance program could be paid to anyone owning more than 5 per cent of the company. And it included a sunset clause stipulating that the program would terminate on Dec. 31, 1983.

EMPLOYER EXPENSES

Public and private employers in the United States spend an estimated $30 billion a year on education and training. Most of these outlays are designed to improve the performance of employees in their current occupations.

In addition, a small but growing portion is spent to help employees advance to new jobs. Just how much is not known, but the Treasury Department's office of tax analysis on Nov. 8 estimated that if Section 127 were made permanent, the government would forego $25 million in revenues in 1984, $43 million in 1985, and an average of $50 million a year in 1986-88. These figures represent the taxes that would be paid by employees who were obliged to count as income education aid not directly related to their current jobs. Treasury assumed that these employees, on average, would have a marginal tax rate of a bit less than 25 per cent, implying that the actual value of the education assistance would be roughly four times the revenue loss. Thus Treasury estimated that companies in 1984 will spend about $100 million on education assistance unrelated to employees' jobs and that this will rise to $200 million within three years.

Treasury concedes that these are only guesses; indeed, one of its objections to the program is that there is no way to find out who is benefiting. But anecdotal evidence suggests that Treasury's estimate may be low and that the popularity of education assistance is growing fast.

Tuition aid programs are offered by 80-90 per cent of companies with more than 500 workers, according to estimates compiled by the American Society for Training and Development Inc., which is leading the lobbying drive for extension of Section 127. A growing number of companies offer courses that employees can count toward bachelor's or master's degrees, and 14 companies, including Rand Corp. and Chrysler Corp., actually offer bachelor's degrees.

Citibank spends $1 million a year on tuition reimbursement. About 10 per cent of the 45,000 employees at Rockwell International Corp.'s West Coast operations participate in employer-reimbursed education, at a cost of $2.8 million in 1983—16 per cent higher than in 1982. At Caterpillar Tractor Co., 2,750 employees were reimbursed for more than $500,000 in tuition costs during the 1981-82 academic year. Carolina Power and Light Co.'s educational assistance program has paid for an average of 667 courses completed by employees during the past four years. In 1983, 943 courses were completed, at a cost to the company of about $80,000, according to James P. Stone, who is manager of manpower planning and career development.

American Telephone & Telegraph Co. (AT&T), which had about 1 million employees before its breakup on Jan. 1, has sponsored probably the nation's largest corporate tuition assistance program. In the 1981-82 academic year, the company spent about $16 million on tuition aid. About 4 percent of the company's 800,000 nonmanagement workers benefited, as did 8 per cent of management employees.

Educational aid programs are also found at some small companies. Machine tool shops, which have an average of 25 employees, frequently send their machinists and die and mold makers to high schools, vocational schools and junior colleges for training. The industry has a larger number of government-registered apprentices than any other, according to John A. Bell, training manager of the National Tooling and Machining Association.

According to testimony at hearings held by a Finance subcommittee in April and a Ways and Means subcommittee in November, interest and participation in tuition aid programs have increased markedly since Section 127 took effect on Jan. 1, 1979. Caterpillar's participation has jumped by 50 per cent, and "we believe this is directly related to changes in the tax laws that made reimbursement for courses related to future opportunites tax-exempt," a Caterpillar witness told the Senate panel. After increasing by only 1 per cent from 1974-77, participation in Carolina Power and Light's tuition reimbursement program increased by 66 per cent in the next three yeas.

The fact that taxes were not withheld from the paychecks of workers whose companies were giving them education assistance very likely helped boost participation. A 1977 study conducted by AT&T showed that withholding served as a powerful deterrent: three times as many employees participated in continuing education when companies did not withhold.

The tax break has helped people at both ends of the spectrum of skills and income. For many of Rockwell's highly educated scientists and engineers, continuing education "is an indispensable means of avoiding technological obsolescence," M. Patrick Crotty, Rockwell's vice president for industrial relations told the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Select Revenue Measures on Nov. 3. "Continued education for them is a must, not a luxury." Tuition for the kind of advanced study the scientists pursue can "easily" run to $2,000 a year or more, Crotty said in an interview.

These scientists probably would not be hurt much if the education tax break is not renewed. The company could raise their compensation to ensure that they did not suffer financially. And a good case could probably be made that most of their continuing education was job-related and therefore tax-exempt under the old regulations, which now apply again. The company would face an added administrative burden, because it would have to determine case-by-case if the education pursued by employees was job-related.

Relatively low-paid, rank-and-file employees of companies such as AT&T and Carolina Power and Light might be more seriously affected. A key argument for enacting Section 127 was that the old job-relatedness test discriminated in favor of relatively highly paid management employees who, unlike secretaries, clerks and janitors, could make a case that many kinds of courses were related to their responsibilities. AT&T contends that its educational assistance program has been particularly helpful to women and minorities. Similarly, Stone said that his utility's program "provides opportunities for minorities to get education and improve their skills in areas they might not be able to if they had to pay directly, or pay taxes on the value of their education."

Major labor unions are worried that the lapse of the education tax break will affect laid-off members as well as those who are working. At both General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co., the United Auto Workers (UAW) union has negotiated training programs worth, respectively, about $10 million and $40 million a year. Workers can be reimbursed for as much as $1,000 a year in tuition expenses over a four-year stretch. Recently, the training programs have been focusing on laid-off workers, providing upfront tuition money instead of tuition reimbursement.

The object is to enable them "to pursue self-chosen education and training to improve their chances for reemployment within or outside the company." UAW research director Sheldon Friedman told the House subcommittee. "Very few people could have taken advantage of these . . . opportunities had the assistance received been taxable," he said. At Ford, 18,000 brochures advertising the tuition assistance program were mailed to workers in August 1982, and the response was enthusiastic. More than 2,800 course enrollments had been approved by last November, and applications were flowing in at a rate of 100 a week.

The Communications Workers of America, most of whose 675,000 members work for AT&T and the Bell System, has also emphasized training in its recent contracts, partly out of fear that the breakup of AT&T will force the divested companies to search for labor-saving productivity improvements. For several years, the union has had a national training fund that has spent about $200,000 a year to help union locals operate training centers in cities around the country. And in the labor settlement that ended last summer's telephone workers' strike, the union and AT&T agreed to establish "personal or career development training" programs throughout the telephone company. If union members were forced to pay income taxes on the value of employer contributions toward training programs, "there would be a tremendous disincentive to participate, with the ultimate result being our members' inability to compete for jobs in the modern economy," CWA executive vice president M. E. Nichols told the House subcommittee.

LEGISLATIVE ACTION

Action on legislation to extend the education tax break began last year with an April 29 hearing on Packwood's bill (S. 249) to liberalize Section 127 and make it permanent. Packwood is Congress's most ardent advocate of tax-free fringe benefits, arguing that some social goals are more cheaply achieved through the tax code than through direct spending programs.

Packwood's bill would not only have permanently excluded corporate educational aid from employees' income, but also would have extended this benefit to tuition aid provided by companies to employees' spouses and dependents. And it would have allowed tax-free reimbursement for the cost of education-related meals, travel and lodging, which was prohibited under Section 127.

Treasury strongly opposed these provisions and said that the entire program should be scrapped because it was not fair to favor people whose employers would pay for their education.

Treasury was fighting a lonely battle. A coalition of unions, companies and educational institutions, coordinated by the American Society for Training and Development, testified in favor of extending the tax break. A desire for greater achievements by workers and companies was not their only motive. As Dorothy Walsh, government affairs coordinator for the Training and Development Society, said. "The educational community is very dependent on adult students, and this means more bodies and money for them."

As time passed, Treasury began to suggest compromises, including limiting the extension to two years, placing a cap of $1,000 a year on aid to an individual employee and, in an effort to generate reliable data on who was benefiting, imposing reporting requirements on companies with education aid programs. At a Finance Committee session shortly before Congress adjourned, Packwood objected strongly to these suggestions, but he was not able to get his bill added to the Finance tax package, which itself was not approved by the committee before Congress adjourned.

In the House, a bill (HR 2568) to make the tax break permanent was introduced by Rep. James M. Shannon, D-Mass. In early November, the Ways and Means Select Revenue Measures Subcommittee amended it to include the two-year iimit and corporate reporting requirements. And the panel also sought to offset about a third of the revenue loss by adding provisions designed to stop professional corporations formed by doctors, lawyers and others from taking current tax deductions on money set aside to spend on their children's future college education. It then sent the bill to the full committee, but chairman Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., refused to add revenue loss measures to the small tax bill (HR 4170) he was preparing for floor action.

Will Section 127 see the light of day again? No one knows, but it seems clear that an extension cannot move through Congress on its own, and so it must seek a larger train to ride.

The Finance Committee seems likely to become embroiled again in a debate over broader tax measures to reduce the huge budget deficits; its staff has been instructed to prepare a four-year, $75 billion package of revenue increases by Feb. 15. But if the committee approves a tax bill, Section 127's chances of hopping on board seem reasonably good. Prospects for an extension "have aways been good," said chief committee counsel Roderick A. DeArment. "Nobody has said, 'Hey, let's eliminate the tax-exempt status of these fringe benefits.' "

In the House, Rostenkowski is not planning to open his tax bill to amendment before trying to pass it on the floor. Last year, the committee planned to send a second, minor tax bill to the floor that would have been the vehicle for Shannon's bill. But discussions have not yet begun on the possibility of a second bill, and likely would not unless the first is enacted.

In the meantime, employees benefiting from education assistance may soon begin to see the paychecks cut by additional withholding. Stone of Carolina Power and Light said withholding would not begin before February, while the company gauged the mood of Congress on extending the tax break. At Rockwell, Crotty predicted that withholding would begin quickly. "That's the law," he said.●

THE VICTORIA PRINCIPAL

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, this past Tuesday I was privileged to join Victoria Principal, national campaign chairperson for the Arthritis Foundation, at a Capitol Hill reception. Miss Principal, star of the popular television show, "Dallas," is well known as a proponent of physical fitness. Now she is lending her support and influence on behalf of the Arthritis Foundation, to raise public awareness and to raise funds to help conquer arthritis.

At a luncheon attended by a number of Members of Congress, Miss Principal spoke eloquently for improved national awareness of the problems of arthritis in America. She is personally involved because both her parents have arthritis-related diseases.

Senator ORRIN HATCH, chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, introduced Miss Principal and indicated his strong support for a separate institute for arthritis at the National Institutes of Health. His committee oversees the Nation's biomedical research effort, including the NIH.

As Miss Principal pointed out, arthritis is the No. 1 disabling disease in our country, affecting 1 of every 7 Americans. I believe that insufficient attention has been given to government-supported research on the more than 100 forms of arthritis and other musculoskeletal diseases. This lack of attention has led me to become an active proponent of a separate Institute for Arthritis and Musculoskeletal Diseases within the National Institutes of Health.

I hope that after reading Miss Principal's remarks, my colleagues in the Senate will want to join me and the 45 Senators who have consponsored S. 540, Senator GOLDWATER's legislation establishing the separate institute for arthritis. Provisions for the separate arthritis institute are also included in Senator HATCH's authorizing legislation for NIH research, S. 773, which has been reported by the Labor and Human Resources Committee and is on the Senate Calendar.

I ask that Miss Principal's remarks be printed in the RECORD in their entirety.

The remarks follow:

REMARKS BY VICTORIA PRINCIPAL

My mother is a victim of an arthritis-related disease, Lupus erythematosus, and my Father has osteoarthritis. So actually it was my parents who generated my interest in serving as national campaign chairperson for the arthritis foundation. In that capacity, I am very honored to be here today and to address such a distinguished group.

For the past 25 years, I have seen my parents suffer the pain of arthritis. Pain has been a part of their daily lives, and their pain was part of my life as I was growing up. I became sensitive to their suffering . . . and sensitive later in life to friends, colleagues and coworkers who also suffer the pain of arthritis. I have seen arthritis erode the quality of their lives. Simple tasks such as writing a letter, dressing or crossing the room can be difficult, if not impossible. Helping those who are near to me, who suffer from arthritis, has become part of my life . . . and I was eager to extend myself to the Arthritis Foundation in any capacity that would be of help. It has been my privilege to serve this organization and cause.

I stand before you today representing a vast constituency . . . 36 million Americans with arthritis. I care about them and I want to make life better for them. I appeal to you because we need your help.

This disease is so often pictured as an affliction of the elderly, an inevitable process of erosion as you get older. No doubt there are many Americans that suffer this degenerative process, but arthritis is not just a disease of old age . . . it is a disease of all ages and it affects so many young people, so many people in the prime of life. This disease is a serious, staggering health problem. Arthritis is our country's number one crippling disease. The most staggering fact is, that 1 in every 7 Americans has one form of arthritis or another. One in every seven. That means if this statistic holds true, one of the persons you love most in your life . . . whether it be your mother, father, sister or brother, your spouse, or your dearest friend or your child . . . one of these seven so very dear to you will be a victim of arthritis.

In fact, I did a little research and I found that the average age of the Senators and Representatives invited here today is 58.5 years of age. Men in their age group have a 26.5 percent chance of developing arthritis. Within 10 years from now, at least 41.8 percent of the people in this room will develop some form of arthritis. That means that right now, one in four will develop some form of arthritis . . . and within 10 years, almost half of you will have arthritis.

One of every three families is affected, as is mine. Every 32 seconds another American develops arthritis. That's a million new victims each year. If people were developing something as simple as the flu at this rate, our Nation would consider this a major epidemic and a top priority. Why should arthritis deserve any less?

I suspect that arthritis has received less attention than other diseases because, as former First Lady Betty Ford—who serves on the Arthritis Foundation's board of trustees—has said, (quote) "arthritis is not a very glamorous disease." (end quote) I believe that Mrs. Ford is right. Arthritis does not relate to mortality so much as morbidity. There are no fatalities. But if having a fatal disease is considered a death sentence, then having arthritis should be considered life imprisonment.

Our society is very conscious of fitness and exercise and well-being. Many of us work hard to improve our health. But people with arthritis must work hard just to stay even. We're a country of jogging and tennis and skiing and sailing and golf. Yet millions of Americans can't tie their shoes or comb their hair or walk up a flight of stairs. We must overcome this disease with both research and treatment, and yet this is so difficult to do when the public is so apathetic about arthritis. My hope is that you will help me to overcome this public apathy and indifference.

When I volunteered my services to the arthritis foundation, I fully expected to be making public service spots, attending fund raising events and talking to the media. My goal being to raise awareness and to raise money. As flattered as I am to be here today speaking to all of you, my goal remains the same, to raise your awareness and to raise more money . . . on behalf of the millons of Americans who are counting on me—and you—to help conquer arthritis. You, as this country's leadership, are in a position to not only allocate the essentially needed funds, but also to inspire our fellow Americans to pitch in and do their share.

I know that as legislators, you are called upon to deal with the full range of moral issues that affect the quality of American life, from civil rights and national security to education and the preservation of the environment. It is just that issue about which I speak . . . the quality of American life. Science and technology have done so much in recent decades to improve our longevity, the quantity of our lives. But, it is the quality of life which is so greatly compromised by this disease.

The problems of arthritis are another such moral issue you must address. The challenge is before all of us now to strike a major blow against arthritis through Federal action and commitment. This is a moral responsibility which I do not believe can be postponed any longer. In 1968, President Lyndon Johnson said, (quote) "surely no more vexing health problem can be named than arthritis. Like most of our problems, it is within our power to solve it. If we have the will, we will find the way." (end quote) Sixteen years later, I am here to ask your help in finding a way.

America is the land of the free and the home of the brave. Let us assume our full responsibility in freeing those millions of Americans who have lost their freedom. Give them freedom of motion, freedom from pain. And let us acknowledge their bravery in coping and living with such a dreadful disease. Let us not turn our backs on so many Americans who suffer from this disease without glamour . . . a disease which deprives them of enjoying their full potential and the richness of life.

Thank you for sharing your time . . . and lunch with me today. This is a most memorable day for me for many reasons . . . but I pray to God that when I reflect upon this occasion in the future, I will remember it as having taken place the year that Congress established the Arthritis Institute.

Thank you.●

THE HANDICAPPED ENTREPRENEURS OF THE POSSIBLE

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, it is all too easy to forget, in the course of a hectic day, how challenging our daily routines would be if we were handicapped; to be without sight, or a limb, or to be paralyzed or to suffer from epilepsy. And yet, millions of Americans hampered by disabilities meet these challenges every day. They not only cope with their daily routines, they master them.

As old myths and preconceptions of the handicapped slowly disappear, millions of Americans are learning to be productive and enjoy their lives. These valiant people are taking advantage of many opportunities and are utilizing their experiences to achieve personal accomplishments. They can do this because they live in a free society. Our Nation has helped to provide a more suitable environment for opportunities for the disabled, but it is the dogged, untiring quest for independence that drives the handicapped. That drive springs from the need to be useful, as basic a human need as food or air. And that need has blossomed into a great adventure in human achievement in the last decade. The American handicapped have become the new entrepreneurs—the entrepreneurs of the possible.

Mr. President, in this spirit, I would like to introduce into the RECORD brief, inspiring descriptions of 15 handicapped individuals in the Boise area who have met the challenge, who have become their own masters. Although they are a small representation of the handicapped throughout Idaho and America, these 15 are as outstanding as the group they represent.

I ask that the publication "They Can Do," by the Idaho Veterans Administration Medical Center, be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

THEY CAN DO

Many times employers and handicapped people themselves do not realize what is possible to achieve with a little ingenuity and determination.

This booklet contains a small representation of successful handicapped persons in the Boise area. Their stories may give you an idea of what is possible and what "they can do."

JOSEPH KARPACH, JR.

In 1974, Joe received a neck injury while participating in an unusual sport at Bogus Basin. The contestants would race down the snow-covered hill on kitchen trays and dive into a man-made pound. When Joe dove into the pond, he broke his neck. The accident resulted in Joe becoming a quadriplegic.

Joe continued his education and earned a BA in History in 1979, with minors in Psychology and Communications from Boise State University. He graduated with a 3.1 grade point average. In 1982 he received a Doctorate of Law from the University of Idaho, College of Law, in Moscow, Idaho and is currently a licensed attorney.

While at BSU, Joe was a member of the Handicapped Advisory Committee and assisted them in making the dorms and campus accessible to handicapped students. He also performed general advocacy work for CO-AD, Coalition of Advocates for the Disabled.

Joe was a member of the University of Idaho Handicapped Advisory Committee, Sergeant of Arms of the Student Bar Association and a member of the Board of Director's of the Stepping Stones, which was a grant program to promote and educate handicapped adults in Latah County.

Always athletically inclined, Joe is now an avid Bronco Booster. He watches sporting events on television and attends games in Boise and other states. He has recently become interested in fishing.

Joe is currently a law clerk for Judge Newhouse, researching legal motions presented in the courtroom. Joe says, "My future goal is to become more involved in trail work. I also have a major interest in working on the rights of handicapped persons."

MIKE WETHERELL

At the age of five, Mike was stricken with a disease which caused loss of balance and high fevers. Doctors gave him six months to live. However, massive dosages of penicillin, used as a last resort, saved his life. Twenty years later, five months after he was married, he suffered a grand mal seizure. It was determined that Mike suffered from epilepsy.

"Epilepsy is an especially difficult disability," Mike says, "because it is hidden, except for brief but dramatic periods when you are actually having a seizure and because it is so misunderstood. Only a few years ago a nationally prominent entertainer said he considered epilepsy to be caused by the sufferer being possessed by the devil."

"Epilepsy, in fact," Mike continues, "is no different from any other disability. It can vary in its intensity and effect upon a person. I have been fortunate, in that like 80% of those who have epilepsy, my seizures are now completely controlled by medication. I take the position that I think most persons with a disability take. I can do basically anything I want to, only other people have a problem if they think I can't."

During the time Mike has known of his epilepsy, he finished law school. He then became chief counsel to United States Senator Frank Church and later Church's Administrative Assistant, the highest staff position it is possible to attain in the United States Senate. Mike helped set-up Church's presidential campaign effort, traveled throughout the United States with Church, acted as the road coordinator for the campaign and was Church's chief liaison with the U.S. Secret Service.

He left Church's staff in 1975 and returned to Idaho. In 1976 he was the Democratic Party's nominee for the Office of Idaho State Attorney General.

He is a member of the Idaho Epilepsy League Board of Directors and performs free legal services for the League. In 1979 he acted as a friend of the court in filing a brief with the Idaho Supreme Court in the case of Moye v. Moye, which established the rights of parents of epilepsy in custody proceedings in the Idaho Courts.

In 1980 he was awarded the Idaho State Bar Association's Outstanding Public Service Award for his work on behalf of the rights of the disabled. In 1979 he was elected to the National Board of Directors of the Epilepsy Foundation of America, where as Chairman of that group's litigation subcommittee, he helps determine in what cases the EFA will take an active role to establish the legal rights of those who suffer from Epilepsy.

Since 1978, he has served on the Board of Governors of the Idaho Trial Lawyers Association and edits their magazine, "The Idaho Trial Lawyer". He is active in Boise Little Theatre, Vice President of the Kiwanis Club of Boise and Chairman of the Kellogg Foundation's Volunteer Leadership Advisory Committee.

He recently opened his own private law practice in Boise under the firm name of Hyde and Wetherell. He specializes in copyright, real estate, and personal injury law.

JUNE BUSH

In 1949, at the age of 16, June became seriously ill. Diagnosis: Infantile Paralysis, more commonly known as "polio." June was in quarantine for two weeks and then transferred to the Elks Convalescent Home on Sycamore Drive. (This was before the new Elks Rehabilitation Center was built). June was a patient for over two years.

After being discharged from the Elks, June was ready to "get on with her life." She married and had two children. June says of those early years, "It was a real challenge being a full-time wife, mother, and housekeeper, all from a wheelchair. We were a very active family, fishing, camping, hunting, snowmobiling, and boating. There are always problems to solve, and believe me, experience is the best teacher." June speaks of the early years when most handicapped people were still "in the closet;" you rarely saw a disabled person out on the street. She is so glad for the changes and better acceptance by the majority of people towards handicapped individuals. June can remember when people would literally shut the door in her face because of the word "polio."

After June's children married and left home, the days were long and boring. She then decided to set some goals for herself; (1) to get a job; (2) learn to drive; (3) get her own vehicle. She has accomplished all three of her goals. She's now making a list of new goals to achieve.

June works at the VA Medical Center, operating an IBM System 6 Information Processor. She had on-the-job training and says the work is interesting and varied because she does work for numerous departments. "My co-workers and fellow employees are a wonderful group of people and have been so supportive," she commented.

Shortly after starting her job, June became a member of the VA's Handicapped Advisory Committee. She is now the current Chairperson. "I hope that by setting good examples, more disabled persons will go out and seek work. Twenty or thirty years ago it was unheard of to have a handicapped employee. Now the jobs are there. You have to have the courage to go out and find it. And keep trying if at first you don't succeed, " she said.

June wants to become more involved with handicapped groups and to see as many advances in the next thirty years as she has seen in the past thirty years.

I asked June about her feelings on being handicapped. Her reply was, "I'm not handicapped or disabled, I have a slight inconvenience. Where you use your legs to get around, I have wheels. It might take me a little longer to get something done, or I might have to figure out a way to do it, but I'll get the job done or accomplish any goal I set for myself."

SCOTT PARRISH

Scott Parrish was born in Boise, Idaho on October 24, 1961. He was discovered at the age of three to have a rare form of Down's Syndrome, Mosaic Mongolism. Since Scott's potential was not known, doctors and parents, after extensive testing, decided that he should be trained in regular school to see how far he could progress.

Prior to attending school, Scott had special training at the Idaho Easter Seal Center in both speech therapy and motor skills where it was discovered that he had a potential in drawing.

Scott attended schools in Sandpoint, Riggins, and Boise, graduating from Boise High School in 1981 where he received the Student of the Month Award and the Boise High Art Award.

While in school, Scott took advantage of all of the art classes possible. Two of his most inspirational instructors were Mr. Hollis Richardson of Salmon River High School and Mr. Robert Auth of Boise High School.

His most enjoyable forms of art are the pencil sketching and woodburning of various animals, with members of the cat family being his favorites. Calligraphy, photography, and painting ceramics are other forms of art enjoyed by Scott.

Recently, one of Scott's sketches was selected for the Idaho State Elks Association and Elks Rehabilitation Hospital Christmas card for 1983. A reproduction of one of his wood burnings and a pencil sketch were published in a newly established magazine, "The Idaho Sportsman."

DEE LOWE

Dee Lowe lost his right leg below the knee in Southern France, October 30, 1944, during World War II. The story of how he received his disability is certainly worth telling.

Dee and several of his buddies had befriended a goat while in Southern France. On returning from a patrol mission "Uncle Billy" was there to greet them. As they were about to move into the shambles of a blasted farmhouse, the goat crossed directly in front of Lowe's foot and exploded a land mine. The explosion blasted Dee's right foot but blew the goat into a million pieces. Dee feels that "Uncle Billy" saved his life and that of a fellow standing near him.

Dee has worked as a carpenter, rancher, welder, and truck driver. He is currently employed at Idaho Power where he has been a custodian for the past three years. he trims and shoes horses in his spare time.

When asked about his recreational activities or hobbies, Dee responded, "My first love is horseback riding. I also like to fish and hunt when I get the chance. I have enjoyed umpiring softball and refereeing basketball for many years."

He and Helena, his wife of 36 years, raised four children, one of which is still at home.

Dee stated, "After I became accustomed to my artificial leg, life went on as before. In fact, I was so active I wore out 13 legs in 13 years. I am happy that I have been able to lead a normal life and do nearly all of the things that I was able to do before, despite my disability."

CORKY CARICO

In 1967, while working as a lineman for Idaho Power Company, Corky fell from a power pole, breaking his neck at the 5-6 cervical vertebrae. This resulted in quadriplegia. Corky has some movement of both arms and hands with the use of a prehensile splint.

While receiving rehabilitation in Denver, Colorado Corky used his G.I. benefits and completed a four-year course in Engineering from ICS.

When asked about his disability Corky responded, "When I was in Denver, the doctors told me I should try to accept my disability and make the best of my life. I decided the doctors were right."

In 1972 Corky ran for and was elected as County Commissioner for Payette County. United States Senators James McClure and Steve Symms have known Corky for years. Both agree he has achieved accomplishments that would challenge the most ambitious nonhandicapped person.

Corky began his Federal career in 1979 as a Civil Engineering Technician for the Boise National Forest. In 1980 he obtained a position at the Boise VA Medical Center where he is currently employed as a Maintenance Scheduler.

Corky has redesigned ventilation, duct, and electrical systems at the Medical Center. These have been significant accomplishments as he often cannot visit worksites because of their inaccessibility and must rely on verbal descriptions and "as-built" prints in order to accomplish the work.

In 1982 he received the Outstanding Handicapped Employee of the Year Award from both the Boise Mayor's Committee for Hiring the Handicapped and the Governor's Committee for Hiring the Handicapped. He was Idaho's nomination for the President's Trophy for Outstanding Handicapped American of the Year.

"I enjoy reading and listening to country music," says Corky, "but most of all, I love to travel. If I had the time and money, I would travel a lot more."

CHARLES HIRSCH

Charles Hirsch has a voice and breathing disability caused by scar tissue masses in the throat, called lipoidproteinosis. He has had this disability since childhood. When asked about his handicap, Mr. Hirsch responded, "It is distinctly a social rather than a physical handicap."

As Building Maintenance supervisor for Boise City, Charles has spent the last six years supervising the operations and maintenance program for 38 city buildings. He directs the work in roofing, structural, mechanical, landscaping, and custodial areas.

Charles is currently restoring a 1940 Dodge business coupe. He also enjoys floating down the Boise River. He is active in neighborhood groups, the Boise Ditch Safety Committee, and a professional society. He also counsels inmates at the Idaho State Correctional Institution.

Hirsch comments, "In every community program or involvement I've chosen, the rewards have always made my personal costs seem insignificant. We do best when we all work together."

Charles is currently a Certificate Member of the Refrigeration Service Engineer's Society and Chairman of the Architectural Barriers Subcommittee for the Mayor's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped and Elderly.

DENNIS WALKER

Mr. Walker was born and raised on a farm in eastern Idaho. He joined the 116th Combat Engineer National Guard unit shortly after graduating from high school. The unit was federalized in 1968 and sent to Viet Nam.

While operating a bulldozer, he hit an enemy booby trapped rocket, which resulted in total blindness. He was hospitalized at Fitzsimmons General Army Hospital for almost the entire year of 1969 where he underwent several operations for his eyes.

He was discharged from the military in December of 1969 to the Veterans Administration Western Blind Rehabilitation Center in Palo Alto, California.

Completing the training in about three months, I had learned to travel with the use of a long cane, read braille, and many other skills that have proven to be very useful in my life as a blind person. I was determined to overcome the disability and live my life as normally as I possibly could.

I enrolled in Ricks College in the fall of 1970. I transferred to Boise State University where I received a Bachelors degree in Business Administration.

I met my wife Carol while I was at the Blind Center. We were married in 1971 and now have three children, Matthew, Jennifer and Steven.

I was hired by the Veterans Administration as a Veterans Benefits Counselor in 1974. I am able to perform my job as well as the sighted counselors with the assistance of a braille writer, talking computer and a talking calculator. I was the first blind Viet Nam era Benefits Counselor the V.A. hired.

I have been honored with several awards during my employment with the V.A. I received the No Greater Love Award and was honored by the governor during handicapped week. In 1977 I was selected as one of the Outstanding Handicapped Federal Employees of the year. My family and I were flown to Washington, D.C., to be honored. We had the opportunity to meet the administrator, Max Cleland.

Since I have been blind I have always tried to live my life without letting my blindness interfere. Some of my hobbies are wood working, gardening, and camping. I spend a lot of my time in my workshop working on projects and making saw dust.

CHARLENE LIDGARD

I was born 31 years ago in California with cerebral palsy. My greatest accomplishment has been the constant battle with myself in overcoming the effects of my disability. However, I believe that I have overcome most of the hang-ups that I had in association with my disability.

I was born in Burbank, California in 1951, and at the age of three was one of two children selected as a National Cerebral Palsy Poster Child.

In 1963 we moved to Idaho from New Jersey, settling first in Boise and then later moving to Idaho Falls. I returned to Boise in 1970 to recuperate from surgery and decided to stay in the Idaho Capital.

After my release from the Elks Rehabilitation Center, I attended Vocational Technical courses at Boise State University, taking classes for GED preparation and job orientation. Upon completion of my schooling and receipt of my GED, I worked as a Teacher's Aid for a short time at the Elks.

Later, I worked as a cab dispatcher for a year, followed by work as a switchboard operator at an answering service for two years.

While working as a switchboard operator, my Vocational Rehabilitation Counselor contacted me about a position with the U.S. Civil Service Commission (OPM). I was hired under a Schedule A (handicapped) appointment as a Staffing Clerk in the Job Information Center, a position I held for two years before applying for my current position as Information Receptionist for the Bureau of Land Management at BIFC.

Along with my duties as Information Receptionist, I compile, collate, and type the material for the Federal Women's Program Vacancy Listing, distributed each week to Federal agencies within the Boise area and to various Federal agencies in other states. I received a Certificate of Appreciation from FWPM's for my work on the Vacancy Listing. I am also the Upward Mobility Coordinator for BLM-BIFC.

As a single, working mother with a 4½-year-old son, my career goal is to someday get back into the personnel field.

My biggest accomplishments have been overcoming the fear of doing things new and becoming more self-confident.

When you are born with a disability, at least in my case, you tend to grow up with very little confidence and, "I can't," is a big part of your vocabulary. I believe that it may take me a little longer, but I can and will do whatever I set out to do. This includes driving a car with confidence. Right now I am overcoming the fear of driving at night, and I know I will succeed.

ADAM HAMILTON

Adam was born deaf and although he does not read lips, he has learned to communicate by using sign language. He will begin his junior year at Borah High School this fall. He says, "The teachers write me notes to let me know what my assignments will be. My friends have been very helpful, too."

He worked in the Pharmacy at the Boise VA Medical Center this past summer and co-workers agreed that he did a very good job. His duties consisted of opening the mail, pulling and processing files, and helping prepare prescriptions to be mailed out. One Pharmacy Technician learned enough sign language to assist the other staff in communicating with Adam.

One of Adam's career goals is to be an architect. He enjoys snow skiing, water skiing, soccer and dancing. He currently lives at home with his mother, step-father, and sisters.

Adam is particularly proud that he was on the winning All-Star Soccer Team, the Boise Timbers, who came in fifth in the Far West Regional Championship games in Las Vegas, Nevada.

WARREN TOOPS

Warren Toops, called "T" by his many friends, was injured in May of 1980. While at work, a container fell from a truck and landed on top of him. As a result of the accident, "T" was paralyzed from the waist down.

For the past two years, "T" has worked at the Van Factory where he is the store manager. He also orders parts and gives estimates on van conversions.

He enjoys playing exhibition basketball with the "Star Riders." Although informally organized, this team recently played the inmates of the Idaho State Penitentiary and won the game. One of the requirements of the game is that all players must use a wheelchair.

Softball, hiking, and camping are among "T's" other recreational interests. He commented, "I enjoy many activities. I even do stained glass work, mostly windows, lamps, and personal items. I have not completed any large scale stained glass projects, but I would love to do a few."

His five-year old daughter, Amanda, is a special joy and "T" spends as much time with her as possible. Sometimes "T", in his sportschair and Amanda on her bicycle have races. Other times they may just go for a walk.

In the past, "T" was an active member of a disabled support group called "Different Spokes," and has assisted the State Industrial Commission with counseling newly disabled people in the community.

"T" says, "I have a very supportive wife who helped me realize I could still do anything I wanted to do. My friends and family have all been very understanding. They would help when needed, but stayed away when not needed. The only accomplishment I think I've made is that I didn't lay down and quit when I got hurt."

CHARLES F. HANSEN

Chuck Hansen, the Chief of Social Work Service at the Boise VA Medical Center, has an "invisible" disabling medical condition called Narcolepsy (invisible in the sense that the condition does not show to the individual making casual contact). Narcolepsy is known by its two most important and disabling symptoms: Sleep Attacks, responsible for excessive daytime sleepiness (EDS) and usually expressed as, "always being tired and sleepy, lack of energy, falling asleep at inappropriate times," etc.; Cataplexy, a rapid or abrupt short lasting loss of voluntary muscle control leading to partial muscle weakness or a complete body collapse.

Chuck reports that in retrospect he probably had narcolepsy from childhood but was not diagnosed and treated for the problem until he reached the age of 40. Prior to that time he went to a number of different physicians for help because of his difficulty in staying awake, but with little success. Finally, around 1966, a VA neurologist that Chuck worked with became aware of his narcoleptic symptoms. She explained Narcolepsy to him and got him started on proper treatment. Chuck noted that proper diagnosis and treatment improved his quality of life and staying awake became easier, especially if he kept pushing.

The pushing, uptight and other aggressive behavior that helped Chuck stay awake, had its positive and negative effects. On the plus side Chuck has been successfully employed by the VA in a number of different Social Work positions for the past 26 years, the last 16 in Idaho. In his free time he has been very involved in community affairs, including representing the VA Medical Center in the Treasure Valley Comprehensive Health Planning Agency for five years, serving as Chairman of the grant review committee; past president of the Ada County Mental Health Assoc., (he called the first meeting of what was to become the Idaho Planned Parenthood Assoc.) and served as organizing chairman and first board president. He was elected Boise Federal Employee of the Year, was very involved in helping to lobby through the State Legislature a Social Work Licensing Bill, was appointed by the governor to the first full term on the Social Work Licensing Board, and was the first board chairperson. He is the past president of the Idaho Chapter of the National Association of Social Workers and has served on a large number of Community Advisory Boards.

On the negative side his constant pushing has at times offended those he worked with. "When you are always tired and have to push to keep going, you sometimes unfairly expect that others should do the same," commented Chuck. To others who have who had Narcolepsy he suggests, "You can't sit back and relax. You have to keep pushing or you won't stay awake."

BILL KINKADE

In 1962 Bill Kinkade was logging when a log swung around and broke his back in the thoracic-lumbar region. He is a paraplegic, but with the aid of long leg braces he is able to stand.

Bill enjoys his work at Brownfields Prosthetic and Orthotic Services. He says, "I have been Brownfield's leather finish man for 20 years. That means I make a number of leather items used in manufacturing prostheses. The work is challenging and there is a lot of variety. I really like my job."

As an avid archer, Bill won the 1973 Class B in the State of Idaho. Aside from archery, his next love is fishing. He also swims and has even tried scuba diving. Bill commented, "I tried scuba diving once and I really enjoyed it. I would like to try it again sometime."

Bill likes to hunt and, in the past, has played basketball with the "Whirling Wheelers," an exhibition team that played other teams such as Channel 7-TV and church groups all over the valley. Donations were accepted at the door and the team used the funds to help other handicapped people.

In the past he has been honored by the Mayor's and Governor's Committees for Employment of the Handicapped as Handicapped Employee of the Month. He has assisted the Mayor's Committee in their efforts to get curb-cuts installed in the city.

Bill states, "Ten years ago, when we were trying to get the community involved in helping the handicapped, there was little interest. I am pleased with the progress the community has made in those ten years. Now most people are interested in seeing the city accessible to the handicapped."

From 1966 to 1967, Bill was president of the Indoors Sports Club. The club developed recreational activities, such as square dancing, for the handicapped.

Bill and his beautiful wife, Sandy, are raising a 14-year-old daughter, Tammy, and a 10-year-old son, Steven. They spend as much time as possible together and enjoy camping, fishing and going on picnics.

In September Bill will start Bible College at the Word of Life on Fairview. He says, "I will be studying the Bible. I don't know where that will lead me—maybe into something great."

Commenting on his disability, Bill says, "The biggest handicap people have is the six inches between their ears. Handicapped people can do whatever they want to do and should realize that there are enough people around who are willing to help them accomplish their goals."

CHARLES DANNHEIM

In Texas, in 1970, Charles was taking down a television antenna from his house when he fell in the electrical high-line wires, burning both arms and both legs. The burns were so extensive, amputation was needed on all four extremities.

Charles was determined to make the best of the situation and while receiving rehabilitation at the VA Medical Center in Shreveport, Louisiana, he was using artificial legs and walking within six months.

He returned to farming and ranching for the next two years and used this time learning how to use his four prostheses.

Recognizing the need for more education, Charles went to college, majoring in Agri-Business.

During 1976 through 1978, he worked for the Science and Technology Committee of the U.S. House of Representatives, showing them how to apply their technology in the field of the physically handicapped.

Hot weather is an enemy of an amputee as they are more susceptible to heat stroke. In 1979 Texas suffered 45 days of 100° weather. It became apparent to Charles that he should make a change from his farming and ranching career. Wanting to work with the handicapped, he applied for a training position as a Prosthetics Representative for the Veterans Administration in Dallas, Texas. Since then, he has been at the Denver VAMC and is currently the Chief of Prosthetics at the Boise VA Medical Center.

He and his wife Beth are raising two boys, Chuck and Chad. Charles says, "I love to ride horses and hunt deer, elk or birds as well as fishing. I often ride a three-wheeled motorcycle and have recently become an avid photographer. My philosophy is to enjoy life and look for the good instead of the bad. With this attitude, I have been able to accomplish the goals I have set for myself."

Nilla Kniffin was thrown from a racehorse 23 years ago and broke her back. She has been a paraplegic since she was 16 years old.

For the past six years, Nilla has worked for the Social Security Administration in Boise. She spent five years as a Claims Development Clerk. She is presently employed as a teletypist and states, "I really enjoy the job I have now." In the past she worked 12 years as a switchboard operator for various banks and answering services in Idaho.

Nilla says, "My hobbies include sewing, stitchery, reading and refinishing furniture. I love the outdoors, and my recreational interests encompass a wide variety of activities. I swim, ride motorcycles, do some gardening, and go horseback riding. I recently returned from a one week camping and fishing trip where I had a wonderful time.

I am engaged to a fantastic guy, and I'm training to be the stepmother of his three children," continued Nilla. "My family has been very supportive and helped guide me through the years of adjustment that were necessary for me to live a normal life."

About her handicap, Nilla comments, "After becoming a paraplegic, I found that simple things like driving a car, putting my wheelchair into the car, going shopping, vaccuming, and handling the everyday chores necessary to be indepedent—the things most people take for granted—were special accomplishments for me. I am proud of each one of my goals I have accomplished. I don't have a lot of hang-ups about being disabled. I think we're all human and we shouldn't need special laws to make people hire the handicapped."

HUNGER: THE CRISIS

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a moving and extensively researched series, "Hunger: The Crisis," which appeared in the Baltimore Sun between December 11 and 15, 1983. This series, which focuses on the existence of hunger both here in the United States and abroad, thoughtfully explores the political, economic, structural, and technological reasons for the malnutrition and starvation which continue to be a severe problem in our world.

"Hunger: The Crisis" series documents the situation in Maryland and nationally—the increased utilization of soup kitchens, the problems of those who go hungry even in the face of our Federal nutrition programs, and the hopelessness of those who for the first time in their lives cannot be self-sufficient because of the ravages of our present economic situation. Nationally, many families are reeling from the effects of the high unemployment we have seen under the Reagan administration. In 1980, the average unemployment rate was 7.1 percent. Since that time, it has snowballed to a high of 10.8 percent in November 1982 and is currently at the intolerable rate of 8.2 percent. Many areas of my own State of Maryland exceed the current rate. During November, the last month for which figures are available, Somerset County reported a 15.8-percent unemployment rate; Garrett and Worcester Counties exceeded 14 percent, and 3 other counties, Allegany, Washington, and Calvert, recorded rates over 10 percent.

Many Maryland workers, as well as others throughout our Nation, have now exhausted their unemployment benefits. More than two-thirds of our Nation's unemployed workers no longer receive benefits, and this situation will continue to worsen until unemployment rates in our hardest-hit areas drop significantly. As this series notes, many must also cope with the effects of drastic cuts in Federal nutrition benefits, which under the Reagan administration have amounted to more than $2 billion. In Maryland, child nutrition programs have been particularly hard hit. Between 1980 and 1982, the number of students receiving reduced-priced lunches dropped 42 percent, and those receiving reduced-priced breakfasts dropped 78 percent. Figures such as these are repeated throughout most child nutrition programs.

In Maryland, various community and religious groups serving the hungry have been forced to expand their programs to meet the serious needs of their communities. In Baltimore, the South Baltimore Emergency Relief Center (SOBER) reported a 100-percent increase in the number of people served daily since 1982. The St. James Outreach Center served 1,600 families a month in 1983, an increase of more than 95 percent since 1980. Community Ministry of Montgomery County, which meets emergency needs in a county with a median income of $33,711, assisted 250 people in 1979 and more than 1,000 in 1983. Churches and synagogues in the county responded to about 17,000 requests for emergency food in 1983. Other organizations throughout the State report similar statistics.

Figures such as these have been widely reported during the past three years. Despite this, President Reagan's Task Force on Food Assistance denies the seriousness of our hunger problem and then proposes a range of recommendations which would generally make this problem much worse. As the Maryland Food Committee states, "notably absent from the report is any acknowledgement of the relationship between the Reagan administration food policies and the growing number of hungry people." The task force fails to go to the heart of the problem—that we must continue to fund our nutrition programs adequately and to put our people back to work in order to alleviate the present tragic situation.

Mr. President, I ask that the recent series, "Hunger: The Crisis" which details the widespread hunger problem we now have, be printed in the RECORD.

The series follows:

HUNGER—THE CRISIS: "A GRAY AREA"

HUNGER IN AMERICA: AS EXPERTS DISAGREE, THE SOUP LINES SPREAD

(By Stephen E. Nordlinger)

[Charts and graphs mentioned through articles not reproducible in the RECORD.]

DES MOINES, IOWA.—In the drought-plagued corn and livestock country just south of here, Ron Tuttle, a 37-year-old farmer, winced slightly.

"My kids are getting free lunch at school," he said. "I'm not proud. There is a limit. I hope I don't have to go beyond that. I still have pride left."

In a nation of plenty, symbolized by Iowa's overflowing corn bins, the lines for free soup and crackers are growing longer.

Even this area, which is to grain what Saudi Arabia is to oil, more and more poor people are crowding soup kitchens and coming to churches and community halls for boxes or bags of free groceries.

Five years ago, the heart-rending quest for food to survive was concentrated in about 50 counties nationwide, mainly in the South. Today, thousands of soup kitchens and centers for the distribution of free groceries stretch across the country from the industrial North to the Farm Belt and fast-growing Southern cities.

Reports by mayors, governors and public-interest groups tell of the return of hunger on a significant scale to big cities and rural hamlets, with attendant concern about long-term health risks.

A few blocks from the White House, in Washington's Farragut Square, a middle-aged woman in a dark overcoat pleads from a bench, "Give me some money for food. I'm hungry. Please, please."

"Here we are with people going hungry in a country that has millions of tons of surplus food," said James E. Johnston, an agricultural official with the Rockefeller Foundation.

The long lines at the soup kitchens reflect a strong demand for assistance. Second Harvest, the center of the national network of free food distribution, supplies 60 of the country's 150 food banks, and the number is expected to rise. Food corporations and groceries are delivering three million pounds a week of food they cannot use—products damaged but still usable.

Experts are also raising questions about the size of the problem and its causes.

Is hunger returning to the United States? Is it growing worse even in the midst of the current strong economic recovery? Is there a current measure of the problem?

Yes, answers nutritionist Jean Mayer. Citing the rising demand for food givaways and hospital reports of undernourishment and rising infant mortality in some areas, he says, "Hunger is reappearing at the same time we are having farm surpluses coming out of our ears."

Others disagree.

"There is an awful lot of nonsense written about hunger in this country," said Thomas T. Poleman, a Cornell agriculture professor. "It doesn't cost a great deal to get adequate nutrition. Why are people hungry then? They may not be spending their money properly. But I doubt there is a huge hunger problem."

In a report last June on public and private food programs, the General Accounting Office, the investigative agency of Congress, explicitly distinguished between the growing numbers seeking free food and the actual need, which it could not determine.

There is not even an accepted definition of what constitutes hunger. Dr. Poleman's definition is: the insufficiency of nutrient intake so that normal body activity cannot be maintained without weight loss.

The Food Research and Action Center, a Washington based advocacy group, defines hunger as "the sensation caused by not having enough food." Depending on age and health, prolonged lack of sufficient food can cause physical and mental health problems and eventually endanger the chance of survival, the group says.

The National Center for Health Statistics says it is rare in this country for the cause of death to be attributed to nutritional deficiency, but doctors point out that malnourished people are more susceptible to other illnesses, such as pneumonia, that can be life-threatening.

One leading congressional authority on this issue said, "There is no solid information pertaining to hunger itself. There are many pieces to the puzzle, but we don't know the whole thing. We just don't know whether hunger is rising, falling or staying where it has been for years. It is a gray area."

A visit to Iowa, in the midst of plenty but with poverty of its own, offered only mixed clues to the size of the problem.

"Hunger is a very serious problem," said Sharon Brooks, who runs a free grocery pantry outside Des Moines. "The help the poor get really isn't adequate, and a lot are falling through the cracks anyway."

Alice MacDonald, who runs a similar food center in Chariton, in depressed southern Iowa, said, "We figure that half the people who came in are in need and half are taking advantage, and the [latter] percentage may be low."

One of the pieces of the hunger puzzle involves widespread anecdotal evidence, most of it related to the large demand for food at soup kitchens and outlets for free groceries. A survey of 181 food programs by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a nonprofit group that studies the impact of budget cuts on the poor, shows that in more than half of the programs examined the number of people served grew by more than 50 percent between February, 1982, and February, 1983.

The U.S. Conference of Mayors reported last December that a majority of 55 cities surveyed identified food as "the emergency service most in demand." In June, after an additional study in eight major cities, the mayors said that "hunger is probably the most prevalent and the most insidious" problem they face.

These reports provide an index of acute economic hardship in the United States, which has gone through three recessions in the last decade, but it is unclear to what extent those on soup kitchen lines are actually hungry.

A number are from the so-called "new poor," who may have lost their jobs but who have too many assets to qualify for government nutrition programs.

William Hoagland, an expert on food aid for the Senate Budget Committee, says the food outlets provide a safety valve for those who are facing other pressing financial obligations but who may not be in the kind of desperate straits associated with hunger.

Figures on unemployment and other government statistics reflecting a strong economic rebound suggest that hunger should be receding since, to a considerable extent, it is related to the nation's economic condition. There are about 10 million unemployed, two million fewer than at the recession's high point last December.

The number of people too discouraged to look for work and the number of long-term unemployed are also declining.

Nevertheless, in a sign of continuing hardship, only a third of the jobless are still getting unemployment benefits. That compares with 67 percent as the nation emerged from the 1973-1975 recession and 44 percent after the 1980 recession. The most recent long downturn has exhausted the benefits of millions of workers.

"When you include the discouraged workers, only 28 percent of the unemployed are getting benefits," said Robert Greenstein, director of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. "Eventually, the hunger problem should diminish, but it is not happening yet. It is extremely severe."

The nation's poverty rate is still another piece of the hunger puzzle. Last year, there were 34.4 million Americans, 15 percent of the population, living in poverty, compared to 14 percent in 1981. The 1982 figure was the highest since 1965. But is this an index of hunger? The way the poverty rate is determined is itself controversial.

Nancy Amidei, director of the Food Research and Action Center, says the national poverty rate "is a surrogate for hunger by showing the scale of the problem, the number of people at risk."

The poverty line was established in the mid-1960s, but a Census Bureau official says it is no longer a reliable guide to hunger because since the rate was formulated, public food aid programs have been created but only cash is counted in computing the poverty rate.

According to the Census Bureau, the poverty rate of 11.1 percent in 1979 would have been 9.4 percent if housing and food aid had been included and 6.4 percent if all public aid programs, including medical, had been counted.

The other side of the coin is that the annual poverty rate is based on tripling the government's economy food budget—based on the government's calculation of food costs for a low-income family—of the mid-1960s, adjusting for inflation. It does not reflect the lower relative amounts spent on food in recent years and other high costs, such as heating. A recalculation on this basis would raise the poverty rate.

There are no government figures that calculate hunger by taking into account all these ingredients of an accurate poverty rate.

The food stamp program, the nation's largest effort to feed the poor, is part of the puzzle involved in quantifying hunger. The number of food stamp recipients rises and falls with economic conditions. It fell from 17.1 million in 1975 in the wake of that recession to 16 million in 1978. It rose to 22.5 million last March, but since then it has declined to about 21 million as the economy has improved.

That might be viewed as an indication that hunger is waning, but those who maintain the soup kitchens attribute their long lines to the inadequacy of the food stamp program.

Food stamps provide an average of only 47 cents a meal, but that is supposed to be supplemented by the recipient's income. For a single person with no income, the government provides 83 cents a meal.

As a result of budget cuts, about 850,000 people have been removed from the food stamp rolls, and benefits have been reduced for others in the program, some to a point where they do not bother to collect them.

But Mr. Hoagland, of the Senate budget office, disputes assertions that recent cuts in the food stamp program have led to the soup-kitchen lines. Instead, he contends that the lines reflect a change in the 1977 law dropping the requirement that food stamp recipients pay for part of the cost of food stamps.

The change achieved its purpose of making stamps available to those who could not afford them: The rolls expanded by three million. However, Mr. Hoagland contends that this "watershed" change converted the program from food aid to an income supplement.

Under the old law, a family might get $200 in stamps by paying $150. After the change, the family got $50 in stamps free. That meant the family could use as it chose the $150 it once paid for foods stamps. According to Mr. Hoagland, pressing needs like housing or heating costs might take precedence over food expenditures if a soup kitchen or free groceries were available. These food sources are used to stretch out limited resources as result of inadequate budgeting, he says, but are not a reliable index of hunger.

A recent University of Michigan study that traced 5,000 food stamp families from 1968 showed that the program played a major role in reducing the decline in food purchases that would have occurred with drops in income. At the same time, the study found that ending the purchase requirement lowered the amounts set aside for food.

The demand for food giveaways remains an ambiguous clue to hunger, and the medical evidence of malnutrition is also not fully documented. There is no longer the clearly discernible evidence of hunger in America that was found by a team of doctors who went to the South in 1967. Their findings led to the profusion of federal food programs, which now total $18 billion a year.

"The children suffering from growth failure do not have kwashiorkor, the nutritional disease often associated with Third World countries," says J. Larry Brown, a public health officer in Boston. "Rather they suffer from what the World Health Organization terms 'silent undernutrition,' a condition less apparent to casual observation."

Even the fragmentary evidence that has been gathered often cannot be directly related to hunger.

At the Jackson-Hinds Comprehensive Health Center in Jackson, Miss., a quarter of the preschool children who are not enrolled in Head Start or day care programs providing food are showing evidence of iron deficiency anemia, compared with a normal rate of 5 percent among the clinic's first-time patients enrolled in those programs.

A study of 400 children at the peridatric walk-in clinic at Boston City Hospital showed that 56 of the children age 5 or below were in the lowest fifth percentile of growth. This age group, said Dr. Brown, experiences the most rapid brain growth—"a time when the brain is uniquely susceptible to irreversible damage from nutritional deprivation."

At Cook County Hospital in Chicago, there has been a 24 percent increase over the last two years in admissions for such malnutrition-related symptoms as abnormally low weight and height, wrinkled skin, diarrhea and dehydration.

Dr. Victor W. Sidel, president of the Public Health Association of New York, used interviews last April by medical students with 418 people at free-food outlets, welfare offices and health clinics to determine the extent of hunger.

He said the evidence they provided showed that their average caloric intake fell below the average recommended by the National Academy of Sciences.

One possible measure of "silent undernutrition" is the infant mortality rate, but it gives mixed results. Nationally, this rate has been declining steadily since the 1900s, falling to 12.6 deaths for each 1,000 live births in 1980. In economically hard-hit areas, however, it is far higher than the national average.

The national rate also exceeds the rates in major European countries. Infant mortality is nearly twice as high for blacks as for whites. Premature births and low birth weights are also twice as common for blacks and other minorities as for whites.

There are causes of infant mortality other than nutritional deficiencies, however, including the age of the mother and hospital procedures.

The cure for hunger and malnutrition, to the degree that one exists, is also a difficult issue, since the problem may not be poverty at all, but ignorance. Some doctors believe that people with proper knowledge of foods may be able to avoid malnutrition even on low-cost diets.

"Many eligible people just don't have the information they need about [food] programs," said Walter P. Falcon, director of Stanford University's Food Research Institute.

In the end, there may be a question about whether the nation can wait until the hunger riddle is solved to develop remedies. On this point, Dr. Brown, the Boston health official, is emphatic:

"A child's health is much like a construction site. You have materials and a work crew. But the crew will be there only for a fixed time. If the bricks are delivered after the crew is gone, they won't become part of the building. A child's brain cannot wait for economic upswings."

UNDERNUTRITION: THE STAGES

Mild

Occurs when weight falls 10 percent to 25 percent below that considered normal for a given age and height, according to Dr. Nevin S. Scrimshaw, director of the International Food and Nutrition Program at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Outward signs are apathy, increased frequency of infection and, in a child, failure to grow.

Moderate

Occurs when weight is 25 percent to 40 percent below normal, increased susceptibility to infection continues. Lack of nutrients and bouts of infection affect the immune system, leading to more illness and undernutrition. Biochemical evidence of damage to the immune system is detectable by testing.

Depending on severity of protein insufficiency, an acute condition called kwashiorkor can develop at this stage of undernutrition, says Dr. David Paige, of the Johns Hopkins School of Hygiene and Public Health.

Death can occur within two weeks of the appearance of symptoms of kwashiorkor. These include swelling from fluid that collects in the feet, ankles and abdomen; irritable personality; loss of appetite; and changes in skin and hair, including lightening of color and brownish spots that break into open sores and loss of hair.

Severe

Occurs when weight falls more than 40 percent below normal. In its severe forms, undernutrition results in kwashiorkor or a general wasting known as marasmus, or sometimes both, depending on diet.

In contrast to kwashiorkor, which results from protein insufficiency, marasmus is caused by insufficiency of the entire diet. The victim of marasmus feels very hungry, has no bloating, but loses so much fat and muscle tissue that the skin appears stretched over the bones.

HUNGRY MARYLANDERS TURN MORE AND MORE TO PRIVATE FOOD PROGRAMS

(By Eileen Canzian)

WESTOVER, MD.—The battered frame house off Turkey Branch road is a stunning symbol of Somerset county's poverty.

The floor boards sag, and the wallpaper is peeling. There is no indoor plumbing, an outhouse and a pump stand in the yard. Heat for the 11 people who live here is supplied by a single wood stove. It could be a scene from Appalachia 20 years ago—but something is different.

The people who live in the house say they don't want for food.

In the summer, there is money raised by doing field work for a local farmer. In the winter, there are food stamps. And when the food stamps run out at the end of the month, there is "the pantry"—the food program run by the church down the road, which distributes bags of free groceries to needy families.

In the last three years, an uncountable number of private emergency food programs has sprouted at churches and community centers throughout Maryland, joining older organizations that have expanded their programs to meet an explosion in the number of Marylanders seeking free food.

The programs seem to be everywhere—in reputedly wealthy Montgomery county, as well as the poverty-ridden Eastern Shore. They are in Dundalk and Frederick, in Cumberland and Elkton and Hagerstown. In Baltimore city, food pantries and soup kitchens now seem nearly as prevalent as neighborhood bars.

The product of homespun charity, such programs now represent a second, privately woven safety-net that supplements the government's food stamp program. These private providers have become a regular source of food to people who cannot make their monthly food stamps last for a month, to others who do not qualify for food stamps under new federal rules, and to others who—for a variety of reasons—choose not to receive food stamps.

What is not clear is whether the people who turn to these programs therefore are eating sufficiently—nor whether everyone who might need the programs is using them.

In short, experts say they just don't know whether there are people in Maryland who aren't getting enough to eat.

"Clearly in India and South America and many Third World countries, the nature and scope of the problem is far greater," said Dr. David Paige, a noted nutritionist at Johns Hopkins University and chairman of a state Hunger Task Force established by the legislature earlier this year.

But while there do not seem to be people in Maryland who are literally starving, no studies have been done to determine the extent to which there are people who are not getting enough to eat, or not enough of the right foods. Such "under-nutrition" can lead to anemia, increased susceptibility to disease, and in children, to poor physical and intellectual development.

"We have a general feeling that the situation is clearly not as bad as India, but not as good as we want it to be," Dr. Paige said.

That feeling is shared by many advocates for the poor, who fear there is indeed under-nutrition in Maryland and that the problem has gotten worse in the last few years.

They note that unemployment has risen sharply here in the past five years—from 5.6 percent in 1978 to 8.4 percent in 1982—and unemployment is an even bigger problem in some parts of the state. In Somerset county, unemployment was nearly 20 percent last year. The rate was more than 17 percent in Garrett county.

Advocates also point out that at a time when economic conditions were worsening, more than 20,000 Marylanders were cut from the federal food stamp program under stricter eligibility rules imposed by the Reagan administration during fiscal 1982. By last summer, the program was serving fewer than 308,000 Marylanders.

Given economic conditions and the food stamp cuts, most advocates believe it isn't surprising that growing numbers of people have turned to churches and other charities seeking food assistance—though others have questioned whether some people aren't requesting the food simply because it is available.

Similarly, most advocates see the growing lines at the private food programs as a sign of a problem—while others regard the growth of such programs as a sign that a problem is being addressed.

George Musgrove, director of the Baltimore city Department of Social Services, pointedly distinguished between the two views in comments at a recent hearing before members of President Reagan's task force on hunger.

Telling the task force of people he had seen waiting in line for a free meal from a Baltimore soup kitchen, Dr. Musgrove said, "I would say that those people are hungry. Under your definition, the fact that they got a plate of food to eat means they were not hungry."

Problem or solution, the giving and receiving of free food has become a social phenomenon.

There are now more than 25 food pantries distributing emergency groceries in Allegany, Garrett and Washington counties—about a third of which have opened in the last year.

"They're springing up. There seems to be another one opening every month," said Mae Baugher, a volunteer with the Cumberland branch of the Maryland Food Bank.

The Cumberland branch—itself just four months old—reflects an effort to help keep the pantries stocked by soliciting surplus food from local merchants, as well as transporting similar donations from the main food bank in Baltimore.

In Silver Spring, the First Baptist Church dedicated Montgomery county's first soup kitchen last week, and Saint Martin's Church in Gaithersburg is about to open a second.

Montgomery county also has its own food bank now, formed because the county's network of church-supported food pantries found they could not keep up with the growing numbers of people asking for help.

The Fish program in Rockville, for instance, distributed roughly 1,000 emergency grocery packages during 1980; the number grew to 1,500 in 1981 and to 1,900 last year.

Three years ago, there were half a dozen soup kitchens in Baltimore city. Now there are 24, half of which have opened in the last year. There are more than 100 emergency food pantries in the city—though so many have opened in the last three years that officials cannot keep track of them all.

It is difficult to know for certain just how many people are turning to these programs for help. One report prepared for the city health department last summer estimated that Baltimore soup kitchens were serving 1,900 to 2,600 meals every day. The Maryland Food Bank estimates that roughly 12,000 families turned to emergency food pantries in the city or Baltimore county during May—and officials believe the number is much higher now.

Throughout the city, such programs are reporting dramatic increases in the numbers of people seeking assistance. Our Daily Bread, a downtown soup kitchen run by Associated Catholic Charities, was serving fewer than 200 people a day when it opened in June, 1981. It now serves more than 400—and the number nears 600 at the end of the month. The food pantry at Saint James Episcopal Church in West Baltimore now provides emergency food to 1,600 people each month—more than 10 times the number of people it was serving three years ago.

There are similar stories on the Eastern Shore, where dozens of pantries have opened in the last three years; in Frederick, where the caseload at one pantry jumped from 40 families a month two years ago to more than 100 today; and in Cecil county, where requests for emergency food from the Help Center in Elkton have nearly doubled since August, 1982.

There is no single way to describe the people who make up the growing lines at these programs.

The soup kitchens—which are few in number outside Baltimore city—often see a different type of patron than do the pantries that distribute groceries. Though some kitchens say they are seeing growing numbers of women with children, most of their clients seem to be single men. Some are elderly, who may be stretching a Social Security check by eating one meal a day at the soup kitchens.

Other patrons have no income at all. This group includes recently released prisoners and other jobless men defined by the welfare system as "able-bodied single adults." Ineligible for public assistance, they survive by sleeping at church missions and eating at the soup kitchens.

Others in the cycle of missions and soup kitchens are believed to be former mental patients, who generally are eligible for government disability benefits but may have become too disoriented to keep up with the process involved in receiving them.

Food pantries, on the other hand, are much more likely to serve families. Many receive welfare and food stamp benefits, but turn to the pantries at the end of the month when those benefits have run out.

Others are newly unemployed, or grappling with the limited fixed income that comes with age.

Phyllis Fisher, a 32-year-old former steelworker at Sparrows Point, applied for food stamps when she was laid off last year, but was found ineligible because her car, a 1981 Oldsmobile, was worth too much.

She was getting $153 a week in unemployment benefits but found that little was left for food for herself and three children once she had paid the rent, utility bills and her car payment. For several months until finding a new job, she relied on the grocery program run by her union for its unemployed members.

Marie Collins, a 72-year-old widow who lives in Westover, says she doesn't know how she'd eat at the end of the month if it weren't for the pantry run by St. James United Methodist Church here.

Mrs. Collins is eligible for only $12 a month in food stamps because she receives a $294 Social Security check—much of which goes to heat and maintain the neat frame house that she and her husband bought nearly 50 years ago.

The emergency food pantry at St. Rita's Church in Dundalk also serves a number of elderly patrons—many of whom will not apply for food stamps, according to Mary Catherine Haines, who helps run the pantry.

"Some of them seem to feel it's a little bit different taking help from the church," Mrs. Haines said. Others, she said, seem to be afraid that they will have to give up their homes if they apply for food stamps, even though that is not the case.

Patricia Mannion, director of the Department of Social Services in Somerset county, believes there is no reason for anyone to be hungry here.

"Between food stamps and the pantries that the churches have set up, they should not be," Ms. Mannion said. "I think there may still be people out there who are choosing not to take advantage of the programs—who would rather be hungry and proud—but I frankly don't know how you force them" to accept help.

The Rev. Joseph Henry, pastor of Saint James Church here in Westover, sees things a little differently.

"At our church, we believe it's our job as Christians to go out and look for these folks, and to bring them the food if they need it, not to wait for people to come here," Mr. Henry said.

He knows that most pantries don't do that, and he worries that people in some parts of the county may not know about the pantries—or may not be able to travel to them. He also knows that many pantries limit the amount of food a family can receive or the number of times a year they can get it.

"If people would go out and walk in the community, I think they would find hungry people," he said.

FOR POOREST COUNTRIES, GOAL OF SELF-SUFFICIENCY BECOMES A FADING DREAM

(By Tom Horton)

AKROSO DISTRICT, GHANA.—It is nine years since a landmark international food conference pledged eradication of world hunger by 1985. Three years ago, the United Nations General Assembly said it could be done by century's end.

But all the world's goals can seem mocked by sights like 21-month-old Emanuel Kwame Okyere, who has just weighed in at 15 pounds, listless and wasted, at one of the nutrition clinics run across rural Africa by the U.S.-based Catholic Relief Services.

He should survive all right, says a clinic nurse—that is, if the rains are better for crops this year, if the rest of the family at home is not so hungry that they add Emanuel's 11 pounds of food supplements from Catholic Relief to the general cooking pot, and if he has not already had the irreversible physical or mental retardation malnutrition can cause in children under 5; and if he is not hit by malaria or any other of several common illnesses here that become fatal to children in his weakened condition.

Emanuel, according to relatively conservative estimates by the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) in Rome, is among an estimated 450 million people in the world's poorest countries who are trying to survive on such a thin edge.

In 1983, despite some notable success stories about food production in Asia, the prospects seem more daunting then ever for reversing, or even checking, the rapid growth in the number of these desperately hungry people, who amount to a 10th of the world's population, or twice the population of the United States.

"Ten years ago, there was much more optimism about the poorest countries feeding themselves adequately," said Christopher Delgado, an economist with the International Food Policy Research Institute, a think tank specializing in long-range hunger issues.

Ten years ago, for example, Ghana was a bright spot in Africa's hunger picture, a net exporter of food, blessed with plenty of fertile land, adequate rainfall, good irrigation potential and one of the continent's better governmental and educational systems.

Now, a top FAO official for Africa calls it "a country gone bonkers. . . . Some wonder if it is a viable country at all."

Ghana's economy has gone bankrupt because of governmental instability, corruption and mismanagement, and because of the burden of oil imports. Both its domestic and export agriculture, already deteriorating rapidly, has been hammered further this year by drought and brush fires.

Food production per person has fallen 26 percent in a decade, at a time when the country is increasingly less able to generate the foreign exchange it needs for imported food.

The ultimate tragedy of all this shows up graphically on the age-weight charts meticulously kept on the thousands of children that come monthly to Catholic Relief's clinics to get their supplemental food.

About half of them are growing below a standard for the third percentile for American children. (Ghana was developing its own age-weight standards, but widespread malnutrition was skewing the results so much health officials canceled the effort.)

Hannah Evans-Lutterodt, a dietitian who oversees the Catholic Relief clinics in Ghana, says the agency is planning to increase the monthly supplements from 11 pounds to 45 pounds "because we are not seeing the results we would like. Often the food goes into the family pot."

"We are reaching only 7.1 percent of the country's children" under the age of 5, she says. "No one systematically reaches the rest."

Across Africa, despite a decade of unprecedented international food and development aid (albeit aid that never came close to FAO's estimated needs for the continent), Ghana's gloomy, downward spiral has been more the norm than the exception.

Alone of all the world's economic regions, sub-Saharan Africa (which excludes South Africa) is producing less food per capita than it was a decade ago, and since per capita incomes are also falling, people are less able to make up the difference with imported food.

If present trends continue, by the start of the next century, the U.N. target for ending world hunger, the situation in Africa, with its rapidly growing population, will be "almost a nightmare," says a recent, gloomy assessment by the World Bank. The number of hungry there will rise from 72 million to at least 127 million, the FAO estimates.

Also, though the food-production picture has not been nearly as grim in Asia and Latin America, even a continuation of present progress there, given projected population growth, would still allow the number of hungry to increase worldwide from 450 to 685 million—the bulk of them in the populous Far East—by 2000, says FAO.

All this seems paradoxical at first when viewed against the world's immense capacity to produce food. All the world's undernourished, for example, could get adequate calories from an additional 37 million tons of grain a year—only 2.4 percent of the 1981 world grain harvest, or about $6.6 billion worth of food.

Throughout the 1970s, annual food production increases for the world as a whole comfortably outpaced population growth—that is, food available per capita actually increased each year.

FAO estimates that if total world food supplies were apportioned equally, there would be enough for 3,000 calories a person a day, probably more than enough for most of the world's people.

In reality though, the world's food goes to those who grow it or can afford to buy it. More than 90 percent of all food never crosses a national border, according to FAO.

The disparities in food allocation can be just as great within nations, within regions and even within the poorest of African villages: A chronic drought area of Tanzania visited by a Sun reporter recently showed striking variations in malnutrition rates among children from 11 closely grouped villages.

FAO officials in Rome say their experience has proved beyond a doubt that "hunger and poverty are related to the point that we can use one as a statistical proxy for the other."

In the broadest sense, this is why even in Asian countries like India that are considered the food success stories of the 1970s, rising from widespread starvation to become food exporters, there are still millions of hungry, too impoverished to afford food, who underlie the glowing overall statistics.

"The question is not 'can the world's farmers increase food,'" says Lester Brown, head of Worldwatch Institute in Washington, an environmental think tank. "They can; they will. The important question is how it relates to the ability of the people who need it most to pay for it."

Ghana provides a graphic example of how much of Africa's ability to pay for food is deteriorating. A marketbasket survey by Catholic Relief Services shows 12 basic food items costing 78 times as much as they did seven years ago, while the minimum wage is only 12.5 times as high.

During the same period, salaries of nurses and teachers increased to 5.5 times their former level. "Feeding three square meals a day to a typical family of six would cost six times the average income of a couple of adults, both working," said Nancy Keteku, of Catholic Relief.

Mr. Brown concludes that "without effective efforts to redistribute income, meaningful progress in the eradication of hunger is unlikely."

Similarly, Barbara Huddleston, an expert on international food aid, said, "You need more than surplus grain to feed the world's hungry. The world already has surplus grain. It's an outright transfer of purchasing power to places like Africa that must happen."

It is also crucial that the poor countries of the world—most notably in Africa—reverse what international food and development experts all agree is an "alarming" and growing dependence on food imports.

Before World War II, according to Mr. Brown's book "Building a Sustainable Society," every major region of the world, except Western Europe, was largely self-sufficient in the grains that make up the bulk of human food. Even Africa was a net exporter.

By 1980, almost every region of the world imported substantial amounts of its grain from just two countries, the United States and Canada.

That huge and still growing dependence is ominous enough even for the wealthier food importers, says Mr. Brown, because there are definite indications that even the North American breadbasket's capacity to increase agricultural production faster than population has drastically slowed since the 1970s.

In addition, the increased costs of energy (fertilizers and pesticides are largely petroleum-based) means increases in production will become much more expensive.

The outlook is for heavily increased competition for scarcer, more expensive food, a price competition from which the poorest countries are bound to be increasingly excluded, writes Terry N. Barr, an official of the World Agricultural Outlook Board of the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

The traditional foreign exchange crops for most of Africa, commodities like sugar and tea and cocoa and coffee, "face a deteriorating future market," according to the World Bank.

The only solution for such countries, Mr. Barr and other world food authorities agree, is to increase their capacity to grow, market and distribute their own food, both within their own borders and regionally.

This notion of self-sufficiency is hardly new, but achieving it for hundreds of millions of the world's poor—most notably in Africa—has proved much harder than anticipated.

African governments have often discriminated against local agriculture in favor of developing industrial projects and pursuing cheap food to keep swelling urban populations content, say agricultural aid agencies.

Agricultural undertakings often have put too much emphasis on generating badly needed foreign exchange (raising tea, coffee and cocoa, for example) rather than on growing food for local consumption.

In addition, there now appears to be much less optimism among international aid donors that the food problem can be solved by simply applying technology and research to African agriculture.

So basic are the continent's problems in stimulating agriculture that countries are unable even to afford or put into widespread use basic, existing technology like plows, draft animals and fertilizer.

Much of the problem can lie with government policies. For example, in Tanzania last year the government's National Milling Corporation, the only legal market for farmers, distributed only 900,000 tons of a 2.8 millionton harvest, "and there were areas in this country that could have used that grain desperately," said a relief official there.

In the gap left after the world's poorest countries grow what they can and import what they can afford lies international aid in the form of food.

The total of this, including strickly humanitarian emergency shipments to famine areas, is about 45 million tons a year, enough to make up the calories needed by the FAO's estimated 450 million desperately hungry if it could be distributed equally.

In fact, the apportionment of food aid is influenced by many forces, a major one being political and strategic alliances, and it tends to get distributed to urban dwellers rather than the scattered, rural subsistence-level people who make up the bulk of many of the poorest nations' populations.

No one feels that increased world food aid—though it seems likely that large boosts will be necessary for years to come—is more than a stopgap solution to world hunger.

Sometimes the very existence of food aid tends to underscore the staggering problems in addressing world hunger from outside sources:

In August, an estimated 100 Ethiopian children died from malnutrition in a refugee camp in the Sudan as tons of food-aid grain destined for them sat in storage in a nearby town.

Trucks could not reach the camp for most of a two-month rainy season. Even so, the grain could have been shipped before the rains, but aid officials simply did not know that most of the refugees were too newly arrived to have gotten a good crop planted, or that lack of rain had caused a disastrous harvest.

In Ethiopia, where famine is threatening an estimated two to three million people in the country's remote northern provinces, a U.N. team recently concluded that even though the Ethiopian government was distributing international grain shipments with commendable efficiency, only "an alarmingly small fraction are being reached."

Perhaps half of Ethiopia's people live more than 20 miles from any kind of road, and even transporting the grain from the nearest port to the famine areas—perhaps a day's drive in normal times—was taking up to three months because of internal military rebellions in the affected region.

"In our lifetime we have had no experience with a sustained decline in living standards over a large region," said Lester Brown, of Worldwatch, "but it's happening in Africa and it seems likely to continue.

"We don't know if that will lead to . . . unrest, social and political disintegration. It's uncharted waters . . . really more than just a hunger story."

A HOMELESS MAN FINDS "HOW TOUGH LIFE CAN BE"

Liver and onions, rice, green beans, three slices of white bread and coffee. Raymond Hovey quickly devoured it all. "Super," he said. "My best meal in months."

It was a free meal, his second that day, shared with a couple hundred others at the Open Door Diner and a "blessing" for a 39-year-old homeless man with two nickels and five pennies to his name.

His fourth marriage and an $8.50-an-hour job abandoned in New Hampshire, he hopped a Trailways bus for Baltimore in August, shortly lost his $800 bankroll in a mugging and wound up sleeping in church missions, working when possible as a day laborer and making the soup-kitchen circuit.

By mid-November, he had lost 20 pounds and gained some lessons about being "beat on the street" in Baltimore—about the short distance between the comfortable life of nightly home-cooked dinners and beers in front of the TV set to the "desperate and scared" experience of not eating for a few days and eating poorly otherwise.

The lessons are basic. There's little public aid available to a single man. There's not much work, even for an able-bodied eager man with a year of college and five years as a printer.

Keep yourself clean. Keep hoping. Keep the fear at bay. Look at the others—the winos, the embittered, the scrambled, the damaged—it could be worse.

Learn the ropes. There're places to sleep—the missions. There're places to eat—the two dozen or so soup kitchens.

The daily drill is this:

The missions give out "tea and Twinkies" and boot you out early. Go downtown and wait for the daily lunch at Our Daily Bread. Pick butts off the street. Sell your blood twice a week. Cop a paper and look for work if you can get there or have 20 cents for the call. Walk over to Dunbar High for weekday dinners at the Open Door Diner.

In this, he differs little from hundreds of others in Baltimore. His clothers are newer and cleaner than most, his eye clearer, his pride more intact. But he is new to this life, and these are all he has.

"I am learning," he says in his vastly understated manner, "how tough life can be."

It is certainly not what Mr. Hovey imagined: a job here, an apartment, the bachelor life. Still, he blames no one else. And he takes comfort in the belief he will not starve—as long as the soup kitchens run, as long as he can get there.

"There is food out there; there's a place for a man to go to eat," he says, affirming his knowledge of a new-found bottom line. "It's enough to survive."

There'll be fish to eat this coming night at the Open Door Diner. You can bank on it when Raymond Hovey says he'll be there.

THE HORN OF PLENTY OVERFLOWS INTO HUGE SURPLUS STOCKPILES

(By Gilbert A. Lewthwaite)

INDEPENDENCE, MO.—The final measure of just what a land of plenty this is lies deep beneath the ground here in the cavernous remains of abandoned limestone mines.

It is a 2.6 billion-pound federal stockpile of dairy food that just keeps growing. In this subterranean warehouse of Commercial Distribution Center Inc., there is cheese, butter, nonfat dry milk, stacked floor to ceiling, wall to wall, from cavern to cavern, covering acre after acre. It is part of the world's largest stock of surplus food.

It cost the federal government $58 million in fiscal 1982 just to store the stuff in privately owned caves like this one and surface warehouses around the country. The government owns no storage space of its own.

As of November, the government had on its hands 388 million pounds of butter, 912 million pounds of cheese, 1.3 billion pounds of nonfat dry milk. Its outlay on dairy support programs this year will be $2.5 billion, almost 10 times what it was a decade ago.

Even last year's massive federal giveaway of dairy products to the needy, both at home and abroad, has only slowed the awesome stockpile's rate of growth, not reduced it.

During the cheese giveaway, the government received requests for 60 million pounds a month from the states. As soon as it tried to meet this demand, however, it ran into protests from cheese manufacturers that the giveaway would have an impact on market prices and sales.

The program, which first involved more than 40 million pounds a month, was reduced to 25 million a month. It has currently edged back up to about 35 million a month.

Lee A. Waller, executive vice president of Commercial Distribution Center, Inc., disputes assertions that the food is going bad. In his underground office here at the entrance to the 160 acres of storage he oversees—not all of it leased by the federal government—he says, "We have not lost a single pound of product because of age."

This year the government will buy 16.8 billion pounds of milk, 13 percent of all milk production in this country, at a cost of $2.5 billion. Last year it bought 11 percent of production, in 1981, 10 percent.

IN TANZANIA, "NORMAL" IS SCRAPING BY, AND TIMES AREN'T EVEN THAT GOOD

MVUME MAKULU, TANZANIA.—Her weight is about that of a big, healthy American baby shortly after birth, but Martha Mzungu is 6 months old and clearly in trouble, says Joy Chitenge, director of the nutrition clinic run here by Catholic Relief Services.

"Her weight [9 pounds, 11 ounces] has actually fallen since we weighed her last month," said Ms. Chitenge.

"Her family, like most here, is large—six people—and quite likely they all use the monthly supplement [11 pounds of high-nutrition food] we give," she said.

Martha's mother tells clinic workers that she has tried to augment her breast-feeding with a porridge made from millet, "the only food we have."

They don't even have much of that, she says, and it is still half a year until the next harvest can be expected from their small farm.

Because of poor rains, the last crop was less than 25 percent of normal, and "normal means just enough to get by on," adds one relief worker.

There is grain available at the village store, but the family has no money to buy it. Like most villagers, they are trying to raise wine grapes, the government's major attempt to provide a cash crop in this hot, dry highland area of central Tanzania.

Villagers say they can't get commercial fertilizer, however (Tanzania's imports of fertilizer have not risen from low levels for the last seven years), and they get less manure than they used to from their livestock.

Not that there are fewer animals—there are more than ever, so many that they have overgrazed to the point that they must be pastured so far away that collecting their manure is almost impossible.

Cattle and goats are seldom butchered for meat for a variety of cultural reasons.

The grapes, other villagers say, have also encountered pest problems that seem to grow worse each year, but there are few pesticides available, either. Also, the grapes should have been pruned, but by the time an agricultural extension worker arrived, it was past time for doing it.

No rain, no fertilizer, no expertise, no money—the problems here all seem to run together after awhile. But they focus clearly when you look again at little Martha Mzungu.

And even that might not be as unsettling if this area weren't so typical of many around the world.

REGION THAT COULD FEED ITSELF PLAGUED BY "VAST UNDERNOURISHMENT"

While hunger in the Third World is frequently most dramatically illustrated in Africa, millions face the same fate in Latin America, ironically a region capable of producing more than enough food for its people.

As many as 105 million people, a third of the region's population, have "calorie intake below acceptable levels," according to estimates by the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization, which says 41 million people, 13 percent of the region's people, are victims of "severe undernutrition."

Particularly affected are children, pregnant women, nursing mothers and the elderly, according to the agency, which said more than 60 percent of Latin American children under the age of 5 are undernourished.

Brazil and Colombia are among the 12 countries worldwide that the agency says are "suffering from undernourishment on a vast scale."

Latin America as a whole produces 111 percent of the population's calorie requirements, but "the fact of the matter is that sugar destined for the external market accounts for much of the surplus," according to the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF).

In the interior of northeastern Brazil, drought has drained food supplies, and along the country's coast, which has some of the richest agricultural land, sugar cane—for which the United States pays a premium price—is grown on almost every available piece of land. Children with distended bellies, a sign of malnutrition, and rotten teeth from munching cane are a common sight.

In the Bolivian Andes, Indians chew the leaves of the coca bush, from which cocaine is derived, to stave off the cold and hunger pangs.

Food surpluses are declining steadily, UNICEF says, and there is a growing dependence on food imports.

As recently as October, the U.N. food agency said, there were abnormal food shortages or unfavorable crop conditions in Bolivia, Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Grenada, Haiti, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay and Peru.

UNICEF and other international organizations say that despite significant advances in economic development in Latin America, there has been little progress in the last decade in eliminating undernourishment.

The problem has been compounded by intense urbanization as peasants flee to the overcrowded cities.

FEEDING THE POOR HELPS FEED PROFITS OF AGRIBUSINESS

(By Stephen E. Nordlinger)

WASHINGTON.—Feeding large segments of the nation out of public funds is turning into big business for farm, food-processing and marketing interests—America's largest industry.

From food stamps to school lunches and Meals on Wheels, government spending on food programs has shot up rapidly from little more than a billion dollars 15 years ago, when evidence of hunger first shocked the nation into remedial action, to more than $18 billion this year, even after budget cuts.

The money will be spent for food aid, primarily to benefit at least 25 million people classified as poor or near poor, the chief victims of the long economic stagnation.

A dozen federal programs with beneficiaries as diverse as pregnant women, children at day-care centers and the disabled and elderly have become firmly established as the nation's chief source of food assistance.

These programs evolved from the government's first emergency food program. It began during the Depression and was aimed primarily at propping up farm income by distributing surplus commodities to the poor.

As medical reports of hunger came to the fore in the late 1960s, the government decided to change its policy by relying on the country's market-oriented food-distribution system to help the poor. That meant food stamps, which expanded nationwide in the 1970s as a more efficient form of food assistance than the old commodity handouts.

Just as with the surplus-distribution program of the 1930s, the current wide array of feeding programs, with food stamps as the centerpiece, has become good business for farmers and the food industry. These programs have also turned out to be good politics for urban lawmakers and advocates for the poor.

The level of spending for food assistance has been stirring a deep debate on Capitol Hill, however. The arguments have been intensified by pressure on the one hand from the mammoth budget deficits and on the other by reports of lengthening lines at soup kitchens and centers for free groceries as many Americans continue to feel the impact of the recession with 10 million still unemployed.

Both sides in this debate are holding hearings and issuing statements to document their theses.

"The reality of the 'hunger' problem has been distorted by media in response to complaints by 'hunger' critics who seldom offer constructive ideas," say Senator Robert J. Dole (R. Kan.), a chief architect and supporter of the food stamp program who wants local and state governments and the private sector to assume a greater role in feeding the poor.

Based on a Senate hearing on the nutritional status of low-income Americans, Mr. Dole concluded that "comprehensive, objective, up-to-date information" on the extent of hunger "is not available."

In contrast, Representative Leon Panetta (D. Calif.), chairman of the House nutrition subcommittee, after a series of hearings in Washington and around the country at which reports of lengthening soup kitchen lines were heard, said that "there is a serious problem of hunger in this country."

An anti-hunger coalition of churches, civil rights organizations, labor unions and public-interest groups has been lobbying to restore money to the program. These organizations managed to get congressional approval of a resolution stating that money for federal nutrition programs "should be protected from further budget cuts."

This stand, backed by a wide margin on Capitol Hill, was very much in keeping with the views of the nation's farm, food-processing and marketing interests, known collectively as agribusiness, which over the years have profited from the array of federal food programs. This industry has become a leading force in keeping the assistance by and large intact.

In a twist, however, these interests are often pressing for policies that tend to keep prices higher than they would be otherwise and that work in numerous other ways against the interest of the general public, hurting the poor the most.

The food stamp program, centerpiece of the federal food aid at a cost of $12 billion this year, is the model of a social program acceptable to the agriculture and food-distribution industries despite their conservative bent.

It is especially well regarded by the politically potent grocery industry, which has put some of its muscle behind sustaining the program despite recurrent criticism that it is overly expensive and fraught with fraud and abuse.

Numerous stores in the inner cities would be forced to close if it were not for food stamp trade. Many of them do more then 90 percent of their business in these subsidized purchases.

This year, the nation's grocers will reap about $5 billion in additional sales from the program, an executive of a nationwide chain estimated, which would be about 5 percent of total grocery retail sales.

Most experts, however, argue that the food stamp program, while granting a profit, operates more efficiently than commodity distributions, which would depend on which excess supplies were available at any moment and would entail large transportation and distribution costs.

Administrative costs, one gauge of efficiency, amount to 6 percent of total expenditures in the food stamp program, compared to the 9 percent that is for social programs.

While backing the federal feeding programs, agribusiness—to the detriment of consumers—has been shaping policies that have reduced the distribution of free commodities to the poor and kept lower-priced goods off the market. As food prices stay high or rise, an increasing number of the poor are less able to pay for the food they need. Moreover, industry promotes the sale of "junk" foods, which tend to be expensive in relation to nutritional value.

These are some of the policies and practices that run counter to the interests of the poor:

The Agriculture Department, in carrying out the dairy industry's price-support program, sharply curtailed the distribution last summer of surplus cheese and butter to the poor. The giveaways were cutting into store sales with the result that the government was being forced to buy dairy products to shore up the federally guaranteed price. Under pressure from Congress, the department has partially restored the distribution of free food.

At the time the government was finding calcium deficiencies, it yielded to pressure from the dairy industry for policies that effectively ended the sale of reconstituted milk, which is made from mixing powdered milk with butter and water to produce a drink that tastes like milk but would cost as much as 30 cents a gallon less because of savings in transportation costs. The Agriculture Department decreed that it could not be sold for less than whole milk, a move that protected dairy farmers' income.

At the behest of the citrus industry, the government has a wide range of marketing orders that restrict supplies of grapefruits, oranges and lemons to the market, raising prices. There are also import restrictions on beef and dairy products that keep domestic prices higher.

Quotas on imports add as much as 10 cents to the price of a pound of sugar. President Reagan backed off from limiting such quotas in 1981 to win the support of sugar-state House members for his tax cut.

The food industry successfully put pressure on Congress to block the Federal Trade Commission from curbing television ads for non-nutritious food during children's television programs.

Moreover, the Reagan administration is shying from enforcement of a ban on sales of junk foods in cafeterias during school lunch periods. Purchases of non-nutritious food have an especially severe impact on the limited budgets of the poor.

Cereal-makers recently tried but failed to persuade the Agriculture Department to allow cereals with higher sugar content in the federal programs that aid poor women, children and infants.

"The Reagan administration has been terrible on nutrition," says Michael Jacobson, executive director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest. "It has shown disdain for nutrition education."

In contrast, John W. Bode, an Agriculture Department nutrition official, says that "the administration is dedicated to good nutrition but is not taking a strident approach of the past administration. One of the biggest problems to good nutrition is faddism."

While the large food-assistance programs have raised profits of agribusinesses, the industry has also benefited from a crucial trade-off on Capitol Hill with urban interests. In exchange for supporting the feeding programs, the farm lobby won the backing of the urban bloc for the expensive price-support programs that help farmers directly.

Some authorities believe these price props have added to the cost of food.

"The institutional framework is geared to producing surpluses, not to distributing food at a reasonable price," says Rodney Leonard, of the Community Nutrition Institute. "The food programs are not related to need. There is no food policy."

Howard Hjort, assistant agriculture secretary for economics in the Carter administration, has another view. "In the broad scheme of things that includes all forms of government involvement from price supports to irrigation and pest control," he says, "the consumer is better off than he would have been without government involvement."

On average, Americans spend less of their disposable income on food than most other countries, but the poor spend more than the U.S. average.

Farmers, backed by some of the largest political action committees, have wielded enormous power. Their five largest PACs contributed $2.5 million in the 1980 campaigns, and the median contribution received by members of the House Agriculture Committee from all sources in the first six months of this non-election year was $27,922.

Many of the farm lobbyists have been working on farm politics for 10 to 20 years. At the Agriculture Department, vested interests are in key positions, including Secretary John R. Block, a prosperous hog farmer, and Richard E. Lyng, the deputy agriculture secretary and former president of the American Meat Institute.

"The decision-making process [in the government] is dominated by agriculture interests," says Lynn Daft, an agriculture adviser in the Carter administration. "There is not much of a voice by the consumers in these decisions."

Nevertheless, at a time of tight federal budgets and soaring costs in the price-support program, which reached $30 billion this year, the farm lobby is splitting up, which may weaken it. Various sectors—grain, dairy, cotton, livestock—are fighting for their interests.

Increasingly, lobbyists for the poor are having to go their own way.

"We are not depending on the farm lobby," says Robert Greenstein, director of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, an advocacy group for the poor. "Over the last four years, there have been separate food stamp bills."

By their nature, the poor on their own lack the scale of political power wielded by the farm lobby. A profile of food stamp recipients shows that almost half are below the age of 18, 16 percent are women heading households, and 9 percent are over 60. One out of every four food stamp households has at least one person who is elderly or disabled.

The long lines at the soup kitchens, however, are providing an argument groups backing the poor can use to press their cause. Over the last year, the U.S. Conference of Mayors; the 42,000-member Bread for the World, a national Christian citizens lobby; and the Greenstein Group have issued reports depicting the sharp increase in those seeking food at soup kitchens and centers for free groceries. Religious organizations have also joined this effort.

The food stamp program, because of its size and visibility, is the most vulnerable to budget cutbacks.

"Food stamps are something a lot of people find it easy to hate," says Nancy Amidei, director of the Food Research and Action Center. "When they see people with food stamps buying sugary doughnuts they want to know what's happening with their tax money. But the program doesn't deserve that kind of reputation."

Aside from the hunger arguments, food stamp advocates are citing a number of federal reports to support their claims that the program is effective.

One of them, issued by the Agriculture Department this year, said that those households receiving food stamps use "significantly larger quantities of each nutrient [vitamins, minerals] studied" than households eligible but not taking part in the program.

Although segments of the food industry have hampered improved nutrition and favored policies that raise food prices, some of the major American food-processing and distribution companies, along with other businesses, have responded to the rising requests for free food.

Millions of pounds of safe but unmarketable food are being supplied weekly by these companies, which have been encouraged to make donations by a little-known 1976 tax break they sought.

This concession allows a company donating food to a charity to deduct not only the loss of the unmarketable product but also half the difference between the production cost and market value.

This extra benefit has made a "dramatic difference" in stimulating donations, said John Milliken, a Washington lawyer who represents food companies. He added, however, that the additional tax break merely covers the higher cost of donating food rather than throwing it away.

The Treasury Department estimated when the tax break was passed that it would mean a loss to the Treasury of $19 million in 1977 and $24 million in 1981, but those amounts probably are larger now because of the steep rise in food donations.

By channeling this food to the soup kitchens and food pantries, these companies are cutting into the huge waste of food in the United States. The General Accounting Office estimated in 1977 that $6.2 billion of food was wasted in 1974, but a GAO official said that estimate was "conservative."

According to Lynn Parker, of the Food Research and Action Center, an estimated 20 percent to 25 percent of the food in the United States is wasted, the highest of any nation. The waste rate is 3 percent in Britain, the lowest.

For the poor, she said, federal programs figure waste of only 5 percent.

CASH, NO STRINGS ATTACHED, INSTEAD OF FOOD STAMPS

(By Hal Piper)

LONDON.—"You give them money and it's up to them how they live their lives after that."

That is the European approach to hunger, as expressed by Martin Smith, of Britain's Department of Health and Social Services.

Most of the welfare states of Western Europe do not view hunger and nutrition as being separate from the basic problem of poverty. Therefore, they typically give cash grants to poor or unemployed people. There are no restrictions—as in the American food stamp program—on how the money is spent.

Food stamps would be "below our dignity," chuckled a Swedish government spokesman.

News pictures of Detroiters in soup lines drew wide attention in West Germany last winter. Left-wing politicians said it proved the Reagan administration's failures, and some pro-American groups tried to organize CARE packages in reverse—as a gesture of appreciation, sponsors said, for America's postwar food assistance in West Germany.

In West Germany and other West European countries, however, hunger is not considered a domestic issue. Swedish, British and West German spokesmen said they did not know whether anyone had even studied hunger in their countries.

"We're not supposed to have that sort of thing here," a British social worker said.

"It would come up only in individual cases through neglect," Mr. Smith said, giving as examples elderly people unable to care for themselves or immigrant families unable to follow traditional diets who might need nutritional information or supplementary vitamins. These cases are handled through Britain's state-run National Health Service.

Private charities such as the Salvation Army and Caritas feed the hungry, and West Germany has its union-run "workers' welfare" agency to assist laid-off workers or those on part-time. There are no government programs focusing directly on hunger, however.

In Britain, even the school-lunch program is under review and may be cut back. Local education authorities have discretion to provide milk, lunch or other refreshments and to decide how much to charge—except that children of families on public assistance must receive their provisions free.

Mr. Smith said the National Education Department was conducting studies of nutrition in districts that provide subsidized lunches and those that do not to find out whether there are significant differences in the children's health. Again, the idea is that provision for poverty has been made in the cash income supplements and that subsidies for school meals amount to double coverage, Mr. Smith explained.

MARYLANDERS AGREE: WASHINGTON MUST HELP

(By Sandy Banisky)

The people who work for Maryland's charities and churches and state social agencies agree on this:

The best way to feed the hungry, the way to make sure that people really have enough to eat, has little to do with handing out 5-pound blocks of cheese or ladling up meals in soup kitchens.

The best way to feed the hungry is to give people jobs or provide adequate welfare checks.

And that, the advocates of the poor say, is largely the responsibility of the federal government. City, county and state governments, as well as churches and charities, do not have the resources to provide more than supplemental or emergency services.

"You're never going to solve hunger problems with food programs," said Kalman R. Hettleman, former head of Maryland's Department of Human Resources.

"Jobs must come first, for those able to work. Then, for those unable to work, you have to have adequate income-maintenance programs," said Mr. Hettleman who, in his four years as a member of Governor Hughes's cabinet, moved welfare increases totaling about 30 percent through the state legislature.

"You really need to provide people with more money in their pockets," said Cheryl Lynch, former Annapolis lobbyist for Associated Catholic Charities.

"So long as there are federal programs, even if they're underfunded, states will be wary of taking on added responsibility," said Jan Houbolt, head of the Maryland Food Committee.

Thus, local government budgets include no line items for food assistance programs. Instead, according to Quentin R. Lawson, who for 10 years oversaw human service programs for Mayor Schaefer, the local governments provide emergency supplies, "a physical facility—say an old school that is not being used—or a capital grant go get the facility ready."

"Their job is to push and to prod the private sector, but local governments generally cannot pick up the operating costs. And it's the operating costs that are so devastating," he said.

That leaves much to be done, local advocates say, and much debate on how best to do it. And no matter how much the activists do, they say, it seems never to be enough.

More than 50,000 Marylanders have been cut from the food stamp rolls because of tighter eligibility requirements since President Reagan took office. Then there are the "new poor"—people who worked all their lives and suddenly found themselves laid off and looking for help.

Ann Miller, head of Maryland Food Bank, which collects surplus food for distribution to food pantries, says her business is flourishing—"unfortunately."

Sister Josanna Abromaitis, director of Our Daily Bread, the West Franklin street soup kitchen, says her staff serves an average of 450 hot meals a day, and about 25 percent more by month's end when welfare checks have run out. By the end of the year, she expects that total to be 175,000 meals, and she does not expect the pace to slacken soon.

Local efforts to feed the hungry fall into two categories:

The long-range: Lobbying to increase welfare benefits and food stamps—or to prevent cuts in those programs; and other related efforts, such as calls to open federal warehouses and distribute surplus food to the poor.

The immediate: Emergency food supplies, such as soup kitchens, food banks and supplemental food services.

The advocates for the poor all have the same goals. They vary greatly, however, in style.

Ms. Lynch, in her job with Associated Catholic Charities, focused on Annapolis, where she worked to persuade legislators to help the needy.

The Maryland Food Committee—a private group founded by the religious community—monitors food programs, publicizes the available services and helps organize food pantries. It also lobbies to avoid cuts in programs.

Groups such as the All People's Congress or the Baltimore Welfare Rights Organization work in less traditional ways. In April, 1982, the All People's Congress organized a march to demand the opening of federal warehouses and the distribution of the food to the poor.

The group drew some criticism at that time from people who said that opening food warehouses was nothing more than a Band-Aid on the long-term problem of hunger.

"We never asserted it was a long-term solution, or even a short-term solution," said Sharon Ceci, an organizer with the All People's Congress. The group, she said, also lobbies against cuts in federal programs. "We feel we have to work on all fronts," she said.

Bob Cheeks, of the Baltimore Welfare Rights Organization, says the reason people are hungry is simple: Food costs too much.

To ease that problem, he suggests that poor people use some of their food stamp allotment to buy seeds, then plant on vacant lots around the city.

The city government, he asserts, could do more to encourage the organizing of food co-ops to cut the cost of food to poor people. Also, despite City Hall's claims to the contrary, Mr. Cheeks believes the Schaefer administration could find more funds for the hungry.

"If they have the money to put millions in the Aquarium, they have the money for poor people. It's not a question of money," Mr. Cheeks said. "It's a question of priorities."

Mr. Houbolt, head of the Maryland Food Committee, believes the state can do many things to help ease hunger—without spending much money.

For example, the governor could name a panel to coordinate the various food programs: food stamps, handled by the Department of Human Resources; Women, Infants and Children (WIC), administered by the health department, and various programs for the elderly, run by the Office on Aging.

The state also could set aside a small insurance fund, say $75,000, to cover any overspending in the WIC program, Mr. Houbolt said. State officials, fearing federal sanctions if they spend more than alloted them for WIC, have been careful not to leave a cushion of the federal funds in their account.

That, however, meant the state returned $1.4 million in WIC money to the federal government last year—money that should have gone to pregnant women, nursing mothers or children, instead of being held in a useless reserve, Mr. Houbolt said.

At Our Daily Bread, Sister Josanna says she hopes that advocacy groups are successful in expanding government programs for the poor and increasing welfare and food stamp allowances. That surely would cut down business at her soup kitchen.

Meanwhile, the volunteers at the soup kitchen have a different job to do, she says. They face the hundreds of people who line up on Franklin street every noon hour. "There are people who are hungry and have to be fed right now," she said.

Dairy Lobby: Even in Off Year, It Can't Lose for Winning

(By Vernon A. Guidry, Jr.)

WASHINGTON.—In U.S. agriculture, it may be that the only thing more productive than the American cow is the American dairy lobby in Washington.

Superbly organized, immensely well-financed and free-spending, the lobby has an unparalleled record of successes in the Congress. That makes the events of the last year all the more surprising, for 1983 was the year Congress, backed by a conservative White House, demonstrated to the dairy lobby that there are limits to what even it can do.

The history of the dairy industry on Capitol Hill offers a clear illustration of the political process that enables decent, law-abiding, productive citizens, if they are single-minded and effective enough, to soak the Treasury for billions and hold up the consumer at the grocery check-out counter.

The dairy story may have no arch-villians, but it has winners and losers. And even in an off year for the industry, it was the winner and the consumer was a loser.

The central fact of the dairy business in America is that the government is purchaser of last resort for everything the dairy farmer can't or doesn't bother to sell elsewhere. All of it, no limit—and the government doesn't buy at fire sale prices. Surplus dairy products are bought at a rate equivalent to $13.10 for each 100 pounds of milk. That's the federal support price, and it is generous. It is fixed not by market forces but by political forces in Congress.

Those political forces produced what might be called the dairy lobby's high-water mark in 1977, when Congress made changes in the dairy support price that removed the discretion of the secretary of agriculture to raise or lower it somewhat in response to market conditions. The legislation fixed the support price at 80 percent of parity, which is a price target for an agricultural commodity based on market conditions between 1910 and 1914, a particularly good time for dairy farmers.

The 1977 legislation also gave dairy farmers what were in effect cost-of-living increases based on inflation. They didn't even have to wait for the end of the year. The legislation specified that the program was to be adjusted for inflation every six months.

"They were too successful," says Joe Fields, of the American Farm Bureau Federation. "It was a sweetheart deal."

Other factors increased the problem or enhanced the bonanza, depending on the point of view. For years, feed costs stayed low, and so did beef prices, indicating to dairy farmers that they would be better off keeping marginal cows in milk production rather than selling them off for meat.

Then, the milk began to gush. Billions of pounds of powdered milk, butter and cheddar cheese began to pile up in government warehouses, and annual program costs skyrocketed into the billions.

In this federally cushioned environment, some smaller dairy cooperatives—groups organized to collect, process and sell the dairy farmer's milk—found ways to become more efficient. They fired their salesmen.

"Why pay three or four men $20,000 a year when you can just sell it to the government?" asks an Agriculture Department official.

Money flowed not only from the Treasury to dairymen but from the dairymen to Congress. According to Common Cause, a liberal public policy lobbying group, the "big three" cooperatives, Associated Milk Producers, Inc. (AMPI), Mid-American Dairymen and Dairymen, Inc., poured $2.8 million through political action committees into congressional campaigns from 1978 through 1982.

Nothing lasts forever, though. The Reagan administration entered the picture and proved unsympathetic, persuading Congress to do away with the twice-yearly review of the support price. "It was the first chink in their armor," says a consumer advocate who watches dairy issues.

More trouble was brewing. The administration won from Congress assessments on dairy farmers totaling $1 for every 100 pounds of milk. One of the things that was supposed to achieve was reduction in production. It did not. Dairy farmers simply increased production to keep up their cash flow, and they developed an abiding hatred for the "dairy tax."

Another thing the fee did not do was help consumers, something a reduction in the support price would have accomplished. The Milk Industry Foundation, which represents milk consumers, estimated that every reduction of $1 per 100 pounds in the support price would bring supermarket prices down 9 cents for a gallon of milk, 11 cents for a pound of butter and 12 cents for a pound of cheese.

"Speaking frankly and bluntly, the bottom line for the farmer is going to be about the same" with a reduction in assessments or support prices, says a USDA official. "With the assessment, the consumer doesn't benefit, because he's paying the higher price, but the government pays less."

The struggle over the dairy program, then, is one over how to apportion the costs of the program, as well as how to reduce the costs. By early this year, all segments were convinced something had to be done. The question was who would pay for it.

The National Milk Producers Federation and the major cooperatives, with one exception, backed a plan of strict production controls on dairy farmers but were adamantly opposed to other schemes requiring a reduction in the support price. The exception was the 8,000-member Dairymen, Inc., in the Southeast, which figured its membership would fare better with a $1.50 cut in the price support, which would also give the consumers a break.

There was talk of compromise, particularly on a plan being worked on in the Senate, but Pat Healy, head of the National Milk Producers Federation, told one interviewer he didn't have to compromise because he had the votes. That was a reference to the House Agriculture Committee, and by all accounts, it was no empty boast. Mr. Healy, whose group is the senior partner in the milk lobby, did have the votes—barely.

Then, an extraordinary thing happened that changed the course of the dairy issue in 1983. It was May 17 at a routine business session of the House agriculture panel, which was scheduled to adopt the bill backed by Mr. Healy and the majority of the industry. Charlie Rose, a committee member and Democrat from North Carolina, laid bare the political fault lines caused by dairy lobby pressures and the mountains of surplus products in government storage.

Mr. Rose, reportedly looking hard at Mr. Healy in the audience, fumed: "I think it is absolutely idiotic to split this committee * * * and make us choose, based on local politics, which bill we are going to support.

I'm going to vote with the local cooperatives that have been my friends."

Mr. Rose didn't want the vote to come at all, however. He wanted everyone on the same bill.

"Agriculture is not strong enough on the floor of the House to have regional fights, and that is what we are about to work into, friends and neighbors," he said.

One by one, other committee members echoed his misgivings and a vote was postponed in favor of a more informal meeting that same evening attended by Mr. Rose, other key congressmen and the chief players in the dairy industry.

The second meeting was "very frank," says one person present.

"I had 85 percent of the industry," recalls Mr. Healy. "Charlie and I yelled at each other over this. I said, 'Charlie, if you went to the floor with 280 votes in your pocket, you'd think you were a genius, wouldn't you?'—85 percent of the House—'and you yell at me because that's all I've got.' * * * but Charlie and I are friends; we've got no problems."

AMPI stuck to its guns, as did Mr. Healy's group. "They didn't think they had to go along with anything," says the disgruntled staff member of a pro-compromise congressman. Eventually, however, all came to back a Senate-written compromise.

Ironically, that compromise was worked out largely in the absence of the dairy lobby, which had its attention focused on the House. Nevertheless, it was one that took very good care of the dairy farmer.

The Senate bill, passed in October, was a radical change for the dairy program. For the first time, farmers would be paid for not producing milk. Under the bill's provisions, farmers can agree to forgo as much as 30 percent of their previous year's production and receive $10 for each 100 pounds of milk they don't produce.

The bill retains 50 cents of the hated $1-per-100-pounds "dairy tax" to help pay for the new program, and an initial 50-cent cut in the support price to be followed by two more 50-cent cuts if conditions warrant.

The length of time it had taken the dairy industry to get behind the bill, however, had allowed time for opposition to build. Consumer groups, pizza chains, ice cream makers, frozen baked goods concerns and cattlemen who don't want competition from culled milk cows all joined to back a straight cut in the support price. So did the American Farm Bureau Federation. The bill "is bad for the farmer and it's bad for the farmer's image," says Mr. Fields, of the bureau's Washington office.

The main opposition measure, introduced by Representative Barber B. Conable (R., N.Y.), would have given the secretary of agriculture authority to cut the support price by up to $1.50, which, somewhat surprisingly, picked up administration support late in the debate.

Thus, the House was faced with three alternatives: status quo, the compromise or some form of cut in the support price. Figures supplied by the Agriculture Department showed dramatically who would pay for each.

If the compromise is in effect in fiscal 1984 and 1985, according to the USDA figures, dairy farmers' income is likely to be $1.3 billion higher than expected under the current law, and the government's costs are expected to be $300 million lower.

For consumers, however, things are different. For fiscal 1984 and 1985, the compromise would cost them $1.8 billion more than would the current law, according to USDA, and $3.7 billion more than a straight cut of $1.50 in the support price.

Last month, the House defeated the Conable amendment, 250-174, despite the coalition fighting the dairy lobby and went on to adopt the Senate compromise by a vote of 325-91.

With some setbacks, the dairy industry got legislation it could live with. So did the events of 1983 signal a reduction in influence?

"I don't think so," says Mr. Healy. "We have been quite successful in the Congress for many, many years because we are persistent and we are consistent. We arrive at a position . . . and eventually we get it. . . . We march inexorably toward our desires."

Late last month President Reagan signed the dairy compromise into law, heeding the advice of his agriculture officials who said it was at least better than the existing law.

INTERACTION CAN BE RUTHLESS OR HUMANE

(By Henry Trewhitt)

How much does global politics affect food aid?

Politics, sometimes ruthless, sometimes humane, is the one constant in every national decision—by every nation—in the management of food.

"You can't escape it," a State Department official says. "Anything that relates to food is political. It has always been the case. The Reagan administration is more candid about it than most. It acknowledges that with resources limited, more of your aid goes to your friends. The same standard is applied by every government I know about."

What are some examples?

Only a stern no from Secretary of State George P. Shultz saved aid to Zimbabwe last September. President Robert Mugabe's government has voted against the United States in the United Nations, and the adminstration was furious, but Mr. Shultz ruled that Zimbabwe was still worth cultivating.

U.S. aid to Tanzania was slashed, the administration said, because of that country's failure to make needed economic reforms, but aid pours into Egypt, despite waste that is being reduced with agonizing slowness.

President Julius K. Nyerere of Tanzania, an independent-minded socialist, is not a U.S. strategic client. President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt is, and he is also a key figure in the alignment of forces that can determine whether there is war or peace in the Middle East.

France favors its former colonies in Africa. The Soviet Union, militarly powerful and economically unstable, makes certain its aid, little of it in food, goes to the politically sympathetic.

Do agricultural earnings have anything to do with feeding the world's hungry?

"Absolutely," says another State Department official. "How we stand in the world economy affects our relations with allies and the Third World. It has a direct bearing on how we treat the poor and how much we can give them."

He puts the option, as seen in Washington, starkly: "If we can't sell enough to pay the bills, we can't afford to give it to the poor."

How effective is the food weapon?

America's political decisions regarding food are not always successful. Former President Carter's order of January 4, 1980, to limit grain sales to the Soviet Union was a political decision, punishment for the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

President Reagan's decision to lift the partial embargo in April, 1981, fulfilling a campaign promise to American farmers, also was political.The sequence set off repercussions that are still developing.

The American farmer, says a World Bank official, became "politicized and internationalized as never before" in his eagerness to sell grain. Canada and Argentina stepped happily into the market vacated by the United States. Now the Soviets, distrustful of the Americans as suppliers, have limited U.S. supplies to a 20 percent share of their imports, down from 70 percent previously.

Do we ever give food aid purely for humanitarian reasons?

Yes. Ethiopia, where starvation is increasing, now receives about $9.2 million in U.S. relief aid through Catholic Relief Services, and the administration is asking $11.7 million for next year. To get it, the Communist government there agreed to monitoring that would guarantee distribution to the truly hungry. The decision to give the aid, one official says, "was the decision that we simply had to respond to humanitarian need."

How does food aid relate to military aid?

The real interest of the United States in the Horn of Africa is in Somalia, Sudan and Kenya, which border Ethiopia. While Ethiopia receives U.S. food, the other three receive food money as well as arms from the United States.

Nick Mottern, of Bread for The World, a church lobby for better food distribution, argues that "military aid to surrounding countries diverts Ethiopia's attention from development and relief." A U.S. official responds: "The Soviets and Cubans in Ethiopia might do well to convert some of their military support to more constructive aid."

Do our interests sometimes work against the hungry?

Some authorities worry that the developed democracies may ration knowledge—in technology and agricultural techniques, for example—to preserve markets among the poor.

M. Peter McPherson, the administrator of the Agency for International Development (AID), rejects the premise. Development in poor countries, he says, means even greater markets for both agricultural products and finished goods as wealthier people buy more.

"Besides," another AID official remarks, "the notion of food sufficiency is so remote as to not be a consideration. But should we achieve it, we can compete for the expanded markets as we need to. After all, we are not only the greatest grain exporter in the world, we are the residual, swing supplier, and what we do is felt everywhere."

How well do the international organizations work?

There is substantial cooperation among internationl organizations ranging from the World Bank to United Nations children's programs.

Nevertheless, ideological, economic, and political differences sometimes prevent dramatic progress. In 1978 and 1979, the U.N. Conference on Trade and Development tried to create an international wheat reserve program to provide "food security" for everyone. It failed.

Would an international food reserve work?

In a forthcoming book, Dale Hathaway, a former U.S negotiatior and now a consultant in Washington, tells why an attempt to create one failed:

"Different groups of countries had different objectives for the agreement. The five major wheat exporters wanted a shared stocking system that would stabilize prices within a wide band of movement. Developing countries wanted a system that would provide food aid and balance-of-payments assistance, and that would stabilize prices within a much lower and narrower range. And the centrally planned [communist] economies wanted guaranteed supplies and relatively fixed prices."

No one has had a better idea since. Besides Mr. Hathaway says, no such system would have worked. It would have foundered, he concludes, on the inflation of the late 1970s and "the currency instability that has occurred since 1980."

How much does the United States do for the world's poor?

That is reflected in the budget of the Agency for International Development. AID has asked for about $4.9 billion in the pending budget, about the same amount as it received for the fiscal year that just ended.

In addition it wants about $1.4 billion for the distribution of grain under the Food for Peace program, about the same amount as that for fiscal 1983. Food for Peace, inaugurated under former President Eisenhower in 1954 for the disposal of surplus grain, has taken on broader economic and political implications since then.

What does the United States usually ask in return for its aid?

The United States increasingly has emphasized internal economic reforms, directed at long-term development more than short-term relief, as an important condition for aid. By and large they are free-market measures. They are hard to swallow ideologically for some governments and dangerous for all dealing with volatile populations.

Fragile governments of poor countries are reluctant to raise farm prices to encourage food production at the expense of growing volatile urban populations. Farmers, says Mr. McPherson, "rarely riot. Urban populations do."

Do out demands produce tensions with other governments?

Officials of the World Bank, the State Department and AID frequently repeat, with variations an anecdote that attributes the Green Revolution in India to Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's fury at President Lyndon B. Johnson.

Mr. Johnson, they say, fixed unacceptable economic terms and demanded Mrs. Gandhi's support for the United States in Vietnam as conditions for receiving U.S. grain. In response, a World Bank official recalls, "she waited until she had a couple of good crop years and told [the United States] to stuff it."

How do the left-leaning Third World countries fare with the United States?

The notion of reshaping economies under U.S. tutelage, or the tutelage of the World Bank, for that matter, tends to cull out Communists and committed socialist governments quickly. But is it an ideological act when the United States then cuts back or eliminates aid? Mr. McPherson puts it differently.

"We tell them," he says, "that we really don't see the need for helping them when they discriminate, in effect, against their own poor by refusing to make necessary reforms.

Have U.S. programs produced successes?

AID's Mr. McPherson cites Pakistan and India as nations that have made hard economic decisions with impressive results. Still, the $225 million requested in aid for Pakistan, officials acknowledge, is based at least partly on that country's status as a major strategic client of the United States. India is not such a client, though it still receives $87 million in aid.

Diets of the hungry, Mr. McPherson says, are "modestly improving," child mortality is down, and the average age of populations is rising in Asia and Latin America. In Africa, however, "we are losing ground," he says.

Mr. Mottern, of Bread for The World, agrees that "we may be reducing absolute starvation," but adds that in "just about every place you have extremes of hunger you also have warfare," and war destroys the resources that could end the poverty that makes hunger inevitable.

And war is always a political decision on the part of someone.

China and India Take Different Paths to the Same Goal: Self-Sufficiency

(By John Woodruff)

Peking.—in 1967, while Americans were burning ghettos, draft cards and effigies of Lydon Johnson, Chairman Mao's Cultural Revolution reached white heat in China and the Third World's Green Revolution began to reach the wheatfields of northwestern India.

In Sichuan province, China's traditional granary, hundreds of desperate peasants were hitching rides on freight trains to the cities to beg and scavenge some relief from the hunger created by the chairman's agricultural policies. In contrast, India was already on the way to getting off the international grain dole.

China and India, respectively the world's most populous and second most populous countries, account between them for 44 percent of the 4.5 billion mouths the human race has to feed every day.

For thousands of years, the sheer pressure of people on their limited farmlands has made food the paramount question—paramount in every person's waking hours and paramount in politics at every level.

"Food, that's what you have to understand if you want to understand politics in Asia," one Western analyst said recently. "Food, food food. And if you want to understand food, you have to understand not only how it interacts with the land but also how food and politics are always affecting each other in ever-changing ways."

Both China's emperors and India's rajahs knew their political successes would depend in part on their successes in controlling water for irrigation. The importance of water for crops led one respected European scholar to build on it an entire theory of politics in these two countries, which he called "hydraulic societies."

When the two countries joined the wave of Third World lands that drove out foreign colonialists after World War II, they took diametrically opposite political courses, China as a one-party dictatorship with a state-run economy, India as a British-style democracy with a largely free-market economy.

Both governments, however, have repeatedly bent or sacrificed political theory in favor of the waterworks that are major sources of their political legitimacy.

Throughout the valleys of the Yellow and Yangtze rivers, heartlands of China's civilization, the proudest claim of local and provincial officials is the work done since 1949 in making these rivers serve rather than threaten farmers.

Throughout northwest India, where the country's Green Revolution has been concentrated, the method has been canals and tube wells first, miracle seeds second.

Today, the politics of both countries resound with the importance of food.

When Sichuan began to recover from the disasters of Chairman Mao's Cultural Revolution, Zhao Ziyang, the province's new party boss, benefited from a slogan of that recovery, "Yao Liang, Zhao Ziyang," which means, roughly, "If you want food, you want Zhao Ziyang." Today Mr. Zhao is premier of China and a member of the party's standing committee, the six men who rule the country.

In India, whenever the monsoons bring adequate rains two years in a row, elections tend to follow. The monsoons were good last year and excellent this year, and already talk has begun that Prime Minister Indira Gandhi will try to capitalize on the prosperity by calling an election in 1984.

Seventeen years after natural disasters in India and political disasters in China spread hunger, each country has reached a point of basically raising the grain its people eat.

Both still import a few million tons of wheat, but when India does it is usually to replace buffer stocks after a drought, and when China does it is a calculated decision that it is cheaper to bring foreign wheat to coastal cities by ship than to further strain China's creaking rail system by forcing it to carry wheat from the interior.

For all the similarities, however, the kinds of self-sufficiency the two countries have, and the stories of their achieving it, differ as radically as their political and economic systems.

China's first order of business after the Communists took power in 1949 was to get production back to normal while breaking the grip of landlords and moneylenders who had lived by the sweat of the peasant farmer.

For a few years, those jobs reinforced each other and grain harvests rose dramatically.

By the late 1950s, however, Chairman Mao had determined that China must have a "Great Leap Forward," including a jump directly to massive peasant communes that would carry China toward its Communist utopia by an act of national will.

His timing could not have been worse.

There followed three years of monstrous natural disaster; droughts followed by floods followed by more droughts.

Peasants flush with the victory of the Communist revolution rushed into the chairman's communes, but the combination of natural disaster and political miscalculation was devastating.

"Those were the days when people ate the bark off the trees, the leaves, worms, grass—the stories are too widespread not to be authentic," a Western expert on the period said recently in Peking. Some analysts believe millions of Chinese died.

Retrenchment began in the early 1960s, over Chairman Mao's objections, but by the late 1960s he was ready with a new vision, the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution.

The Cultural Revolution is widely regarded as having been aimed at urban intellectuals, but in the countryside it became heresy not to follow the chairman's instructions to "take grain as the key link" and to distribute the surpluses.

That meant planting more acres in grain, and the Chinese people's already-skimpy vegetable, fruit and meat supplies rapidly shrank as rice and wheat took up more of their land each year.

As factories and universities closed to free students and workers for factional battles, the flow of fertilizers, machinery and information to the countryside began to slow. Egalitarian distribution of farm surpluses, allotted without regard to effort, stripped peasants of their incentive to work, and grain was planted on land better suited to other crops.

Statistics of that period are regarded as unreliable by both Chinese and foreigners, but estimates are that grain production either declined or remained stagnant during five years of rapid population growth.

Traditional granaries like Sichuan struggled without hope to revive their agriculture.

Historically poor areas had it even worse.

In Tibet, hard-line Chinese cadres, desperate to show the higher yields Peking demanded, ordered peasants to plant wheat instead of the highland barley they had eaten for centuries. The cadres did not teach them to bake bread, however, and wheat flour does not lend itself to the tsampa paste Tibetans had always made of barley flour.

The product of this experiment was widespread hunger from which Tibet is still recovering.

In Xinjiany province, China's northwestern desert area, grain rations in 1979 were reported to be as low as 1,600 calories a day, barely three-fourths of what is normally recommended for adults.

Even in Shanghai, China's premier city and headquarters of the Cultural Revolution radicals, adults doing light to moderate work were reportedly getting about 1,715 calories a day as recently as 1980.

Recovery had to wait for Chairman Mao's death, however, and the return to power of Deng Xiaoping and others the chairman had banished.

It began in 1978 with a dramatic increase in the prices the state paid for farm products, and it continued through a series of reforms that all but erased from China's countryside the traces of Chairman Mao's influence.

Peasants are now allowed to sell surpluses on the free market once they meet government quotas, an obvious but un-Maoist incentive to overfill quotas. The communes are being stripped of their political powers and left as little more than community tool centers.

These and various other reforms have made agriculture the leader in China's recovery from the Cultural Revolution.

This year's grain harvest is widely expected to exceed last year's, which would mean two successive record-breaking years.

If that happens, China's annual grain output will have risen by a total of 30 percent in six years, even while vegetables, cotton and other cash crops have steadily expanded into lands the Cultural Revolution had turned over to grain.

Recovery from the Cultural Revolution has basically brought China's food-grain situation back from a political disaster to its normal condition, which is to say severe problems.

The country's rail system, still unable to handle the massive coal and ore shipments demanded by the Deng government's modernization ambitions, cannot ease the inequities between grain-rich provinces like Sichuan in the southwest and Anhui in northeast, where estimates are that peanuts still get less than 80 percent of the recommended number of calories.

In Peking, the government recently announced a survey showing that the capital's residents now receive "almost" the 2,300 calories a day recommended for them. In the countryside, though, estimates still run under 2,100 calories for the average and substantially lower in poor areas.

Relatively better food supply in cities, even though food is grown in the countryside, is a recurring theme of Third World agriculture, and most analysts attribute it to a simple fact of politics: People in cities are better able to organize and cause trouble if they are left hungry.

As a result, urban residents also become beneficiaries of China's increasingly disjointed price structure. While the price the government pays farmers for grain have risen during the reforms, the prices it charges consumers have not kept pace.

The net effect of this policy is that food, like housing and other major consumer sectors, has become a subsidized product that is estimated to cost the government several billion dollars a year.

India's progress to self-sufficiency has included neither a Great Leap Forward nor a Cultural Revolution, but it has not been without political twists and turns.

By far the greatest came with the two-year ascendancy of the Janata government, a coalition of squabbling minority parties that ousted Prime Minister Indira Gandhi in 1977 to end the emergency rule by which she had evaded a court ruling invalidating her election.

Suddenly, in 1977, a rush of leaders from India's middle-level rural castes, many of them still in raged dhotis and smelling of cow dung, moved into the posh bungalows of New Delhi's power-holders.

With them came a sudden rural orientation that rapidly increased subsidies for irrigation, fertilizer and other factors in farm production even while raising the prices paid to farmers.

"Food grain procurement," one American student of that period later wrote, "intended originally to provide food for ration shops for the poor, became a form of agricultural price support."

Indian farmers were quick to demonstrate that they could respond when an incentive was offered. For the first time in its modern history, India, barely a decade after the long, bitter years on international grain charity, became a major grain exporter. Grain production rose by 25 percent in two years.

Those were heady years, but the seeming success had an articifical quality. The national grain subsidy grew to more than $1.5 billion a year.

The Janata government fell, essentially of its own weight, in mid-1980, and Mrs. Gandhi was swept back to power the following January.

India has since de-emphasized grain exports, but some of the genies released by the Janata years have not been easy to put back in the bottle.

The Janata "food or work" program, a scheme of paying out food in return for work on rural construction, has been changed to a purchasing-power program and de-emphasized, but Mrs. Gandhi's forces have felt compelled to match and extend the growth of grain-ration shops.

Having raised the aspirations of both farmers and consumers, India has yet to build into its economy the purchasing power that would enable poor people to buy rice on their own.

As a result, the national food and farm subsidy, which looked like a shock wave at $1.5 billion in 1979, is now estimated by a toplevel government economic adviser at more than $2 billion and rising.

India's more open politics also leaves room for opposition control of state governments, which frequently creates strains in government food policy.

Under the Janata government, eastern India's poor, rice-growing states got unaccustomed emphasis on irrigation programs. Today, with Mrs. Gandhi's Congress Party back in power, those states complain that they are being kept poor by lack of irrigation money from the central government, and they claim that New Delhi is holding back because the opposition controls the governments in the states.

In other places, opposition governments play their own game, forcing the pace of school-lunch programs that inflate the governments overall food subsidy.

Even in Punjab state, where India's Green Revolution has been centered, some argue that prosperity has become a factor in the growing rebellion of the Sikh religious minority.

"The Sikhs have always had separatist tendencies," one Western analysts said, "so the question is: why violence now? One part of the answer is that they feel they are handling their economy better than anyone else in India and could make it on their own."

Three and a half decades of following radically divergent political and social systems have not made China and India easy places to find out whether communism or democracy will better guide a large, poor country to solutions to its most pressing political problem: how to feed its people.

In recent years, however, the grain situations of the two countries have taken on more and more common characteristics.

Both feed their people significantly less than is recommended by world standards, both import substantial amounts of wheat to solve problems related not to their grain production but to shortcomings in their other physical facilities, and both feed some or all of their city dwellers substantially more than their rural people.

India, which started out essentially with a market economy in grain supplemented by an emergency dole, has rapidly expanded its network of ration shops and its government purchases to supply the shops until state purchase and distribution is now a major feature in good years and bad.

China, which set out under Chairman Mao to make grain strictly a state monopoly, is now cautiously introducing a free-market element.

So, while the emphasis still differs greatly, each country is now making growing use of elements resembling the other's basic system.

China, which tried to make a virtue out of necessity under Chairman Mao by striving for grain self-sufficiency even down to the county and commune level, has established in recent years a regional grain system, which has been India's policy from the outset.

As the two countries' grain systems take on some similarities, however, their prospects diverge considerably, more for physical reasons than for political ones.

China has practically no arable space untilled. Terracing takes cultivation up the hillsides until the rocks will not yield another square foot. Irrigation is everywhere, leaving only fertilizers and new seed varieties to provide the potential for advancement.

India, by contrast, has vast areas that can be opened to irrigation and vaster areas where production can be doubled or tripled if the means and will can be found to control the floods of the Ganges plain.

The longer-range picture, then, may leave India much more room than China to expand its food production.

China, in recent years, has instituted a birth-control policy calling for one child per couple—a policy often enforced by draconian means—that has reduced the country's population growth rate to between 1.7 percent and 1.8 percent a year.

Mrs. Gandhi gave population control high priority in the 1970s, putting her late son and heir-apparent, Sanjay Gandhi, in charge of an effort known for its excesses, including the rounding up of men to be trucked off for sterilization.

Opposition to those excesses is believed to have contributed to her electoral defeat in 1977, and many local politicians have since been slow to resume the crusade. India's population growth rate now is well over 2-percent a year.

If China and India maintain their current growth rates, India will overtake China as the world's most populous country some time in the first quarter of the Twenty-first Century. Many economists regard that as a prescription for disaster in India, even though India's land may eventually support far more people than China's does.

"India and China are likely to have very roughly comparable economic growth rates for the foreseeable future," one Western economist said in New Delhi last month. "If one country contains its population growth this much better than the other, that country will in a few years have a great deal more surplus to reinvest and to spread about among consumers.

"You don't have to be an economist to guess what that will mean in a quarter or half a century when people in one country look up and wonder why they're being left behind."

INDONESIA UNLOCKS ITS FOOD PROBLEMS; KEY: DISTRIBUTION

(By Ellen L. James)

JAKARTA, INDONESIA.—In the dense, emerald rain forest of Irian Jaya, on Indonesia's most easterly island, a freak October drought caused the sweet-potato crop to shrivel and fail. In a small, Stone Age settlement there, 30 people starved.

Back in the capital of Jakarta, government officials were stunned to learn of the incident from a local newspaper account. To save the settlement's 4,000 other residents, they immediately ordered the airlift of 350,000 pounds of sweet potatoes waiting in a warehouse on the other side of the province.

Although oil-producing Indonesia has enough food for its burgeoning population, topography poses tremendous obstacles as the country grapples with distribution.

The nation is an archipelago of 992 populated islands stretched across 3,200 miles of equatorial ocean between the mainland of Southeast Asia and Australia. Some of the islands are so primitive that roads are nonexistent, and news can take months to trickle out. Across this difficult landscape is sprinkled the world's fifth-largest population, 154 million people.

Even so, incidents like that in Irian Jaya "are becoming extremely rare in contemporary Indonesia," said Alfred M. Lehn, the Indonesian desk officer at the U.S. State Department.

Especially remarkable, said Peter Timmer, a Harvard University agriculture specialist, is that during the last decade starvation has been obliterated on the main island of Java, where two-thirds of the population is concentrated.

To those who know food policy, Indonesia's progress in managing the distribution of its food supplies is nothing less than "a miracle." Dr. Timmer and other analysts credit this marvel to the Badan Urusan Logistik. Its name translates to "national logistics agency," but in newspaper headlines and on television it is known simply as "Bulog."

Bulog is a small but powerful governmental agency that maintains control of the rice market each year by buying, transporting and stocking rice worth as much as $525 million. When the prevailing price in Indonesia rises above the ceiling mandated by Bulog, the agency can pump thousands of tons into the open market until the price is brought back in line.

In Asia, the Indonesian government is widely viewed as infected with corruption, and Mr. Lehn said, "It would be extraordinary if corruption weren't involved in the Bulog system."

Nevertheless, while regional officials of Bulog have been caught in scandals, its top leaders—who manage a $200 million-a-year credit line from the country's central bank—have kept their reputations intact.

The mastermind behind Bulog is a 58-year-old retired army general, Bustanil Arifin, a charismatic confidant of President Suharto and a man characterized as having a "sixth sense" for the world's food markets: when Indonesia should buy, when it should hold and when it should sell.

Because he built the food agency from its beginning and because President Suharto felt it necessary to call him back to the agency in a crisis, the question often arises as to whether Bulog is General Arifin, or whether the well-oiled system could manage without him.

Bulog was born in 1967, shortly after General Suharto, commander of the army's strategic reserve, seized power through the crushing of an attempted communist coup d'etat that led to the downfall of the Sukarno government.

During that chaotic period, the price of rice—the country's staple food—rose by as much as 600 percent a year, helping ignite widespread student protests. It was a period General Suharto wanted never to be repeated.

The president's solution was a high-profile national agency, reporting directly to his office, with the prestige, money and mandate to do the job. Bulog's first charge was to stabilize rice prices—keeping them high enough to satisfy farmers (75 percent of the population), but not high enough to cause discontent among urban dwellers.

Bulog soon became the sole importer of rice for Indonesia, a major undertaking since the nation—which brings in one to three million tons a year—is one of the major importing countries. (The world consumes 410 million tons of rice a year, but only about 12 million of that is traded.) The agency also was given control of corn, soybeans, soybean meal, mung beans, sugar, wheat and wheat flour.

Most important, Bulog was charged with amassing an "iron" food stock for the nation, and it built a network of warehouses capable of holding three million tons of rice. The men who run Bulog have filled their warehouses with rice—in plump white burlap bags—and bought a Sperry Rand computer to monitor the stocks, all with the purpose of counteracting local shortages.

As an oil exporter and member of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, oil price gains in the late 1970s spurred remarkable economic growth in Indonesia. The nation's oil-export revenues rose from $1.1 billion in 1973 to $16.7 billion in 1981, and per-capita income (still low by world standards) increased by 5 percent.

Just as the oil-price bonanza helped bankroll a major spurt in Indonesia's agricultural development, permitting substantial fertilizer subsidies, the recent oil-price slide brought a sudden halt to the rapid growth. In the past year, Indonesian agriculture has been buffeted by a faltering economy and by the worst drought since 1972.

The dual adversities have compelled Bulog to play a more than usually aggressive role. To guard against shortages, Bulog imported 1.7 million tons of rice last year and bought 1.8 million tons more from the nation's farmers. At the same time, determined to keep the market price from increasing, it sold or gave away 3.3 million tons.

Bulog's moves are closely tracked by the Indonesian public. Last month's decision by the agency to raise the price it pays wholesalers for unprocessed rice made banner headlines in Jakarta's daily newspapers.

Ibrahim Hasan, a deputy Bulog chairman, said, "Food is a very sensitive, emotional thing for the people. One way to stabilize a country is to stabilize the stomach."

"If you take rice from these people, you'll have a revolution," added Raphael Totah, of Continental Grain, an octogenarian rice trader who is a close associate of General Arifin and is known on Wall Street as the "grandmaster of rice."

General Arifin was a quartermaster in the army logistics corps. Dr. Timmer, a consultant in Bulog's "kitchen cabinet" since 1970, said, "There's still an element of the logistics corps in Arifin. The way Bulog is run like a paramilitary organization, moving food to the troops."

Aides to General Arifin say he has the gift of "cold hands," a Chinese expression for someone who—like a good doctor capable of bringing a patient's fever down with his hands—improves whatever he touches.

Besides running Bulog, Mr. Suharto last year gave general Arifin a second post as minister of cooperatives, a priority in the president's development plan.)

"The whole country knows the name of Arifin," said the chief of the Bulog district office in Denpasar, on the island of Bali.

Just as General Arifin has managed his public image, he has studiously avoided making political enemies. "My philosophy is: 'If someone gives you poison, give him milk,'" he said.

General Arifin is considered a brilliant yet impulsive manager whose staff say he operates in an intuitive, highly personal style.

Dr. Timmer recalls going out with General Arifin on troubleshsooting missions arranged by the Bulog chief to learn why the price of rice was rising. "He never stood on protocol but would go through the rice markets, asking people why rice was high, and he'd usually find out what to do. His batting average was pretty high."

By taking personal control of Indonesia's substantial grain-importing program, General Arifin has developed a grasp of world grain markets said to be rivaled only by that of Mr. Totah, of Continental grain. The Bulog chief has also developed "enormous international contacts," said Mr. Lehn, of the State Department.

It is a usual part of General Arfin's daily routine to telephone the big grain-trading houses, to examine many pages of economic statistics and to study world food-production reports—all to decide when it is wise for Indonesia to buy shiploads of imported grain and when it is not.

Although Bulog has gradually increased its rice imports over the last three years, this is largely in response to heightened demand from people in rural areas who mainly produce other staples.

Because of what has come to be known as the Green Revolution, Indonesia underwent a "big takeoff" in rice production in the late 1970s after the introduction of a new variety developed at a research center in the Philippines, according to Mark Rosegrant, of the International Food Policy Research Group in Washington.

During this period, Dr. Rosegrant said, 40 percent of Indonesia's rice land was planted with the new strain and use of fertilizers (derived from petroleum) nearly tripled.

Though most Indonesians would like to eat rice three times a day, the country's fertile fields also grow thousands of acres of corn, cassava—a starchy white root—and a vegetable from the palm tree known as "sago palm." While such foods are deemed inferior, they provide the country a cushion against starvation in times of need.

"In Indonesia, dying [of hunger] is very difficult. Everything is so green," said Muslimin Nasution, an aide to General Arifin.

Atmaja Sukriya, Bulog's vice chairman, said, "Calorie-wise, nationwide we're self-sufficient. Now it's just a matter of distribution."

Mr. Sukriya is General Arifin's main aide at Bulog and the first person the chairman telephones in the morning from his black Volvo limousine, to get a daily report from Bulog's "early warning system."

The vice chairman arrives at Bulog headquarters—a futuristic steel-and-glass-Jakarta office tower—at 4:30 a.m. each weekday. After a jog around the grounds and a hot bath, he is presented an intricately drawn, multicolored "early warning" map of Indonesia, showing the flow of imports into the country, the status of stocks at all the nation's warehouses and how stock has been moved from warehouse to warehouse.

If he spots an area where stocks appear to be dwindling to minimum levels, he acts at once to get in touch—by short-wave radio or telephone—with the chief of the district Bulog office (known as a "Dulog"). Where he sees a surplus, he will arrange for a "move out" operation to a deficit area.

The local Dulogs also give large amounts of free rice (last year 1.4 million tons) to employees of the government, quasi-government agencies and the military, partly as a compensation to public employees for poor wages. Though they give out rice on an emergency basis to the general population, the distribution system's main channel is through the nation's commercial markets.

A Dulog's minimum "iron stock" is equal to two months' provision for local public employees. If a Dulog has more than that, some of its rice may be moved. For instance, the Bali Dulog, which now has a six-month stock totaling 12,000 tons, is a likely candidate for a move-out operation.

A majority of the rice Indonesia consumes is produced domestically, and the local Dulog chiefs often replenish their stocks through purchases from local farmers' cooperatives.

The co-ops truck the rice to the Dulog storehouses, where workers use stainless steel rods to draw samples from the bags. Each sample is carefully studied for quality—including water content and the number of broken kernels—before the warehouse will sign for the delivery.

Through what it calls "market operations," the Bulog system manipulates the rice supply in the open market to control the market price of milled rice.

If the prevailing market price exceeds the ceiling price set by Bulog, then Bulog floods the market with rice until the price comes down. If the prevailing price drops below Bulog's floor (a rare occurrence), Bulog will buy unusually large quantities of rice for its warehouses.

Since local market conditions vary, each Dulog has its own ceiling price. In Bali, for example, the ceiling price for a kilogram (2.2 pounds) of milled rice is 32 cents, and the floor (set nationally) is 24 cents. Because the current market price is 26 cents, the Dulog chief is neither buying nor selling to affect Bali's price.

Food analysts say one of the achievements of the Bulog system is its ability to hold price stability for rice through the manipulation of only about 10 percent of Indonesia's rice crop. (Fifty percent of the country's production is consumed by farm families themselves.)

"Bulog usually intervenes only when the private sector is trying to increase the price too much," said Mr. Sukriya. "We keep the market forces still alive."

Since the Indonesian government recently had to trim the massive fertilizer subsidies it gives farmers, Bulog has increased the price it pays for rough rice, known as "paddy."

The Bulog is passing on to farmers about $50 million in price subsidies this year, but this remains a relatively low subsidy level compared to many other nations.

Indonesia's private markets involve an intricate hierarchy of thousands of "local traders," the middlemen who sell to merchants what the farmers produce. Since Bulog has brought price stability to a once-volatile private market, the agency is generally popular.

Said one shopkeeper: "In a lean season, Bulog makes a positive impression."

Those who run the farmers' cooperatives say they like to sell their crops to Bulog because the agency buys on a "cash and carry" basis, while they may have to wait weeks for payment when they sell to local traders.

The Bulog system has several soft spots, however, that make it vulnerable to breakdown. One reality, as illustrated by the recent incident in Irian Jaya, is that poor communications may mean Bulog leaders fail to learn quickly about spot shortages.

In Indonesia's case, according to Mr. Lehn of the State Department, this problem is compounded by poor feedback by local government officials. "People are hesitant to report problems to the government," he said.

Bulog, which owns no trucks or ships of its own and has to rely on the rental market, can also face delays in moving stock to shortage areas simply because of the country's lack of cargo-carrying capacity. Most rice is moved among islands on sailing schooners, and is common for Bulog to be forced to wait as long as 10 days before such a vessel can be booked.

Analysts who have studied the Bulog system say its most troubling aspect is its heavy personal reliance on General Arifin as manager.

This became apparent in the fall of 1973. Shortly after General Arifin left his Bulog post to become Indonesia's consul in New York, the world plunged into a food crisis that brought a critical shortage of rice. The market price of rice rose suddenly and Bulog, under General Arifin's replacement, searched foreign markets without success for rice it could import to hold down the cost.

"When Arifin was gone, Bulog was a mess," remembered Rochsid Setyoko, economic counselor at the Indonesian Embassy in Washington.

President Suharto, worried that renewed food riots would break out, instructed General Arifin—against his will—to go back to his Bulog post.

Upon his return, General Arifin worked through Mr. Totah and other rice traders to find a volume of "parboiled" rice in Pakistan, India and Brazil. Though it was considered to be of substandard quality, it met the immediate need.

"At that time it was a very big crisis, and he made quick decisions," said Mr. Nasution, an Arifin assistant.

Since the last big crisis, food analysts say, Indonesia has come a long way in equipping itself for future problems. Indonesia was dependent on imports to feed itself in 1973, but it has been self-sufficient in food since about 1980.

At this point, the consensus among analysts is that Indonesia has one of the best food-management systems in the world—and certainly the best in Southeast Asia.

"They have three things going for them: training, expertise and personnel," Mr. Lehn said.

"They have the managerial capability to carry out the task, a strong political commitment and painful memories of the riots of the mid-1960s," said Dr. Timmer.

"There is no country in the world I have seen that has brought up production as much in the last six years, and Bulog has played a very important role," said D. Bap Reddy, the Indonesia representative of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization.

"I think Indonesia has the ability and the capacity to avert a national disaster in the food area—barring a freakish meteorological situation," said Mr. Lehn.

Still, Mr. Reddy cautioned, "Indonesia will have to stay vigilant."

Soviet Diet Heavy on Fat and Sugar, Light on Vitamins

(By Antero Pietila)

Moscow.—When the Bolsheviks took over this vast land in 1917, their rallying cry was "Peace, Land and Bread!"

Sixty-six years after Lenin's revolution, heavily subsidized, cheap bread is such a staple of the Soviet diet that this country's 272 million people consume and average of 298 pounds of bread apiece each year.

Bread and potatoes may assure that most people here get enough calories, but those starchy items also bear chief responsibility for the serious imbalance of Soviet diets.

"The figures are not bad, but it's quite necessary to increase meat production in order for people to use less carbohydrates," Khail Volgarev, director of the institute of nutrition of the U.S.S.R. Academy of Medical Sciences, said in an interview.

According to Dr. Volgarev, a recent study on eating habits in the Moscow region, the Ukraine and the Baltic republics disclosed that typical diets were heavy on fat and sugar, but seriously lacking of vitamin-rich vegetables and fruits.

Figures compiled by the U.S.S.R. State Planning Committee's Economic Research Institute show that an average Soviet citizen eats less than half the amount of vegetables and fruits prescribed in official nutrition norms.

While the availability of fruits has improved somewhat recently, no major improvement is in sight.

The capacity of Soviet agriculture to increase food production as fast as the population increases apparently has run into trouble in the last 10 years. According to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the growth rate of Soviet per capita food production, at 1.8 percent since 1950, fell to minus 0.9 percent over the last decade.

This country's main agricultural problem, however, is that, once harvested, about 20 percent of fruits and potatoes simply rot because of insufficient storage and transportation.

A drive in mid-October—after the harvest—from Helsinki to Moscow, through Vyborg, Leningrad and Novgorod, suggested that very little beyond bread, potatoes and cucumbers was available in stores along that main road.

Obtaining green vegetables in the dead of winter is problematic even in Moscow, which is usually better supplied than smaller towns.

Because all Soviets work and shopping is a time-consuming headache of standing in long lines, most people here eat their one basic daily meal at their places of work.

At the Kama River truck plant, 500 miles east of Moscow, the management boasts that 3,000 workers can be seated, served a three-course dinner and moved out, all in 15 or 20 minutes.

Why?

To save the rest of the lunch for volleyball, explained the manager.

HUNGER ABOARD, SURPLUSES AT HOME, AND THE U.S. FARMER IN THE MIDDLE

(By Ted Shelsby)

OGALLALA, NEB.—It disturbs Carl Brun that a big portion of the world's population goes to bed hungry each night.

"God never put people on this world to starve," he says softly.

A 68-year old wheat farmer who tills 5,000 acres near this tiny railroad town that once served as the final destination for countless cattle drives, Mr. Brun is tormented by the contrast between the abundance around him and the scarcity he knows lies on the other side of the earth.

He knows that he and the rest of the country's farmers—representatives of one of the few remaining American industries that still retain the envy of the rest of the world—have the production capacity to put more rice in the bowls of the hungry in India and more bread on the tables of the poor in Sudan.

If only they were free to produce it.

Instead of channeling more life-saving grain to Third World nations, however, Mr. Brun is caught up in a complex agricultural system that encourages, even rewards, farmers for producing less with the result that in some cases farmers end up feeding wheat to feedlot cattle and hogs—"because right now it's cheaper than corn"—rather than grind it into flour or cereal to feed hungry people.

Taking a break from the day's chore of branding new calves, Mr. Brun, a past president of the National Association of Wheat Growers who once served on an international committee in Geneva studying imbalances in the world's food supply, upends a five-gallon bucket for a seat and begins to explain the economics of a farm policy that often makes it more profitable for farms like his to produce less food rather than more.

He also tells why he discounts the fears of consumer advocates that the nation's farms may eventually end up under the control of a few giant corporations and touches on what he thought might have been a better U.S. food policy than the one it has now.

"You see that bin over there," pointing to an aluminum storage structure, "it's full of PIK [payment in kind] wheat. We went in and cut down about a quarter of wheat—that's about 160 acres we destroyed. In return, they [the Agriculture Department] gave us 95 percent of our normal production.

"And we're looking hard at the possibility of tearing up another 750 acres [about 41,000 bushels] next spring", he continues, to participate in yet another government program, a price-support plan that acts as an insurance policy guaranteeing wheat growers an established price for their crop in return for not harvesting a portion of it.

Wheat farmers are not the only ones affected by the government's incentives to grow less. American farmers took more than eight billion pounds of rice out of production this year alone. An additional 32 million acres normally planted in oats, corn, sorghum and barley was left fallow.

If you could put it all together, the normal production acreage left untilled this year would cover all of New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania and part of Maryland.

The price-support program Mr. Brun referred to works like this: The government sets a loan rate and target price. This year the loan rate for wheat was $3.65 a bushel and the target price was $4.30. A loan on the unharvested crop is obtained from the government's Commodity Credit Corporation. If the market price is below the loan rate, which it was much of the year, the farmer can turn his crops over to the CCC in full payment for the loan.

In addition to the $3.65 loan rate, the farmer receives an additional deficiency payment of 65 cents a bushel, the difference between the loan rate and target price for wheat, bringing the total government payment to $4.30.

To participate in the program this year, growers were required to set aside 20 percent of the land they normally sow. The majority of wheat growers liked the offer: Three out of every four participated in the program.

"Each farm is different," Mr. Brun said as he eased into a discussion of the government's subsidy program. "I think this farm, with the land being pretty much paid for—versus some young fellow just starting out who owes for the land and owes for equipment—can probably live on $3.50 [a bushel] wheat."

Casting a glance toward the horizon, he said, "The way it stands now, I'd say we will harvest every damn acre of it, but this could change. Before we tear it up we'll just have to take another look at things. There's a lot of trouble in the world. Should there be a major conflict it might be desirable to have some extra surplus."

The Brun farm, which incorporates the efforts and assets of Mr. Brun, his son Gary and Gary's son-in-law, is in the high plains region, where moisture is scarce. They plant only half their 5,000 acres each year. The other half lies idle to conserve moisture and will not have a crop ready for harvest until the following year.

As a result, Mr. Brun actually began preparing his 1984 crop last spring and is now preparing the seedbed for his 1985 crop.

This makes the decision he faces early next year even harder. Because he had to start his planting before the full details of the government's 1984 price-support program were disclosed, Mr. Brun sowed the full 2,500 acres.

Unless he plows up 30 percent (the program set-aside requirement rises from 20 percent this year to 30 percent for 1984), however, he will be ineligible for price supports.

"The sign-up period is next January or February. At that time we'll have to say leave it be or decide, OK, we're going to tear up the land.

"But, my God, we'll have $45 an acre into it by then," he said, counting up the costs of the seed, fertilizer, fuel for the tractor and other costs of planting. "This makes it awfully hard to say tear it up."

The decision will be a financial, not a moral one. It will be based on a calculation of whether the farm will post a larger profit from selling the full harvest on the open market or only 70 percent of the crop under the price-support program.

Mr. Brun says it would be helpful to wheat farmers if the government had a long-term agricultural policy. "We would like to know what the program is before we start planting. The way it stands now, it's like a poker game where the rules are changed after the cards are dealt."

Mr. Brun is not alone in planting his full acreage. Based on early indications, wheat farmers in overwhelming numbers are rejecting the government's reduction plan and planting fence row to fence row. According to preliminary predictions, next year's harvest could be a record three billion bushels.

The current price-support program was enacted by Congress in 1973. It followed a major grain sale to the Soviet Union and came at a time of high grain prices and consumer concerns about the prospect of paying a dollar for a loaf of bread.

In an effort to ease those concerns, the government encouraged farmers to greatly boost production. Supporting the price was the government's way of sharing with growers the risk of a possible price decline.

The program was hailed as a "historic turning point in the philosophy of farm programs in the United States," by Earl L. Butz, secretary of agriculture at the time.

After 40 years of having programs wedded to "cutbacks" and "containment," Mr. Butz said, the new plan was geared to "expanded output." President Richard M. Nixon was not nearly as enthusiastic about agriculture's new direction, however, threatening to veto the plan.

He didn't, though, and tractors all across the nation began tearing into the soil with new vigor. Wheat output grew from 1.5 billion bushels in 1972 to a record 2.8 billion by 1982. Corn and soybeans, the main feed for livestock and poultry, posted similar gains.

While this outpouring, coupled with several embargoes on grain sales abroad, abolished the fears of $1 bread, it created a new problem: A 142-million-ton grain surplus by 1982.

By 1978, farmers were being asked to shift their combines into a lower gear. The government ordered a 20 percent reduction in wheat acreage planted and encouraged a similar percentage set-aside in corn acreage.

Full production resumed in 1980, the year of a major Corn Belt drought, and 1981, but by 1982 farmers were again being asked to reduce plantings, this time by 15 percent.

As their planted acreage shrank, farmers' financial problems grew. Depressed grain prices, along with high interest rates on money borrowed, have resulted in more farm foreclosure sales in the last year than at any time since the Depression of the 1930s.

Their problems brought the plight of farming to the attention of Washington, and the Reagan administration is currently moving to end the 10-year-old price-support program.

"With the big surplus, world hunger and no profit in farming, it's perfectly clear the present system is not working," said Jeffrey Idleman, a USDA economist, in explaining the new thinking in Washington.

A better system, according to the Agriculture Department, is a market-oriented program in which the world market determines the price received by the farmer. With this in mind the Reagan administration is moving to abolish price supports.

Such a shift, will not be easy, however. This was evidenced by enactment of recent legislation that for the first time pays dairy farmers for not producing milk.

Nor will it be painless. Mr. Idleman conceded that shake-out—similar to those already encountered by the steel, trucking and airline industries—was likely in farming, after which only the stronger, most efficient producers would survive and prosper.

Such a shake-out may not be to the benefit of consumers. It could lead to the development of more "super" farms, a designation the Agriculture Department gives to large farming operations grossing $500,000 or more a year, and put food production under the control of fewer producers.

Although the super farms—some of which are controlled by large corporations primarily in other lines of business, such as petroleum and insurance—account for 1 percent of all farms, they accounted for 30 percent of cash receipts (sales at the farm level) and 60 percent of net farm income last year. This is up from 14 percent of sales and 16 percent of income in 1969, when they also made up 1 percent of the total number of farms.

In 1978, the year of the latest data on land ownership, these large farms owned, rented or leased 84.5 million acres of land, 8.2 percent of all U.S. farmland.

This trend has caused concern among some agriculture observers, who fear that such large farms could manipulate the market to contrive shortages and boost prices.

Farms controlled by corporate board rooms don't seem to bother Mr. Brun. "Gates Rubber Company tried that," he says. "They bought a bunch of land in Eastern Colorado. They hired the smartest technicians they could to run that farm. They put down wells and developed the land. They had seed specialists, soil specialists, fertilizer specialists. They had the best brains they could get.

"And the farmers around there were beside themselves. They were really upset. But it didn't last very long. What killed them was Saturdays, Sundays, 8 o'clock to 5 o'clock. A corporation farm is going to have a hell of a time if you hire labor and work like you do in an office.

"The thing that killed them was they didn't get planted in time. They had the best equipment, but there was nobody out there that would run that damn thing 24 hours a day. In this country, corporate farming is not going to make it unless there is some kind of tax write-off."

Mr. Brun is more concerned about hunger in the world than about the threat of being taken over by a conglomerate. "We knew the people who needed the food didn't have the money to buy it," he said of his participation in federal legislation in late 1950s that established a two-tier pricing structure in which farmers received a higher price for grain consumed in the United States than for that shipped abroad.

"It was a good program, but in world economics you could say that's not fair competition," Mr. Brun said.

The single price system resumed with the adoption of price supports in 1973.

FOOD IS EXPENSIVE, BUT SO ARE HEALTH COSTS OF MALNUTRITION

(By Michael K. Burns)

CHICAGO.—The child was admitted to Cook County Hospital unconscious, his tiny limbs shaking, his face twitching—classic symptoms of grand mal seizure.

As his mother talked with the emergency room doctor, attendants drew blood for tests and inserted a needle into the vein of his arm to begin the intravenous solutions, first a sugar liquid, then a solution of salt.

Within a few minutes, the child's salt and sugar balance in the brain was restored and he was resting comfortably, the danger past. The physician had determined the cause: infant water intoxication from being fed water instead of milk or formula.

The scenario is becoming more common as an increasing number of non-nursing mothers are trying to get by with water when they run out of money, according to Kathryn Vedder, a staff pediatrician. Normally, one or two cases might enter the Chicago hospital in a year; in the last year there have been 15 of these cases.

It is an example of false economy among low-income families and in national feeding programs, she said.

"It costs $600 a day to treat a child in the hospital. It only costs $500 to feed a baby in the entire first year—that's the sad thing," Dr. Vedder said. "These are not cases of neglect or abuse—many of these mothers were desperate and they were hungry themselves.

While Washington debates the value of $18 billion in food and nutrition programs, scientists are striving to quantify the health costs of hunger and malnutrition in America.

Hard economic analysis is scarce and fragmentary. Nutrition's role in health is generally recognized, but the measured health results of specific feeding programs remain elusive and subject to interpretation.

"You can't show cause and effect relationships when you can't separate causes from effects," says Dr. Mahlon A. Burnette III, former executive officer of the National Nutrition Consortium. "And when you talk about spending money, people fall apart on whether there are significant health ramifications. Then it's three steps removed from science."

"In federal programs you cannot do causal associations, but the federal government can take some credit for large numbers of the programs that they have put into effect . . . to combat the problems of nutritional deficit among people. I think the results are very encouraging," said Dr. Milton Kotelchuck, of Harvard University.

"We should be hearing admissions of failure," responds Dr. George G. Graham, professor of pediatrics and nutrition at the Johns Hopkins University. "What I cannot accept are unsubstantiated claims of nutritional gains attributed to these programs—even less of improved school performance and social adjustment."

Surveys show that poorer people have worse nutrition than those with higher incomes, and people with better nutrition have better health and seem to perform better.

Nevertheless, the conclusion that improving the nutrition of lower-income groups will automatically improve their health and productivity is a matter of dispute. Other factors—unheated housing, inadequate hygiene, social and psychological conditions, even genetics—also play critical roles in health of the poor.

Society may not be able to cut the costs of institutional care for the poor simply by spending more money to provide them better diets.

The puzzle is complicated by the fact that the food stamp program, which aids 22 million low-income Americans, was the political product of agricultural interests and poverty interests, not a scientifically designed nutritional supplement effort. After more than 15 years as a nationwide institution, the program is viewed by conservatives and liberals alike as an income-redistribution scheme as much as an anti-hunger effort.

"Our knowledge, unfortunately, of the impact of health effects [of hunger] is less than the knowledge of its existence," Harvard's Dr. J. Larry Brown told a Senate nutrition panel. Dr. Brown sees "early clinical warning signs of damage to health" in the significant numbers low-income children with growth failure or malnutrition who enter Boston City Hospital. He concedes, however, that "it's troublesome data."

Most of the economic projections of costs and benefits from nutrition programs have focused on the 10-year-old Women Infants and Children (WIC) food-supplement program, which serves about 2.5 million low-income people who have health risks.

A major goal of WIC is raising the nutritional status of pregnant women to reduce the incidence of low birth-weight babies, who are more likely to die in infancy or to have birth defects and mental retardation.

A Harvard study in Massachusetts calculated savings of $3 in hospitalization costs for every $1 spent to provide food packages to mothers and infants. In Missouri, researchers comparing medical expenses of participating and non-participating mothers found a saving of $1.42 for each dollar spent on WIC.

On Montana Indian reservations, where malnutrition was a problem, other studies reported that infant mortality rates were cut in half where WIC programs operated.

Nutritionist Jean Mayer, president of Tufts University, projects millions of dollars of savings in lifetime care costs for each retarded or learning disabled child that would have been born to a malnourished mother.

"These programs are more than paying their own way," he concludes.

Senator Robert J. Dole (R. Kan.), chairman of the Senate nutrition subcommittee, believes that well-targeted programs can produce dividends.

"Nutrition assistance to mothers and children can substantially reduce the incidence of low birth-weight and infant mortality. . . . It is perhaps one of the most worthwhile investments [we] can make," he said.

Federal surveys cite the elimination of nutritional-deficiency diseases in pockets of rural poverty in the mid-1960s, but surveys do not establish that more food, or even better nutrition, was responsible, since better medical care was available.

Three decades of school lunch programs are credited with improving classroom attention of low-income pupils (although not necessarily improving scholastic achievement). Children who eat school lunches, free or subsidized, get more essential nutrients than those who bring a lunch-box, a University of North Carolina nutrition team reported recently. There was no attempt to link results with health improvements, however.

For the more easily monitored WIC programs, at least a half-dozen studies have claimed reductions in the rates of low-weight births and improved health of infants born to mothers receiving food and medical counseling under the program.

"Even if there was no specific dollar value attached to benefits," said Dr. Eileen T. Kennedy, director of the Harvard WIC study, "the question is: What is it worth to improve the quality of life of a child?"

Dr. Graham, a member of the President's Task Force on Food Assistance that is studying federal programs, is skeptical of such questions.

Nutritional achievements of feeding programs remain to be proved, he argues, although there may be other benefits. For example, food stamps may supplement income of the poor, school lunch programs may free mothers from preparing their children's lunches and WIC mothers and babies may receive valuable medical attention that is part of the program.

There are chronically malnourished children, Dr. Graham said, but "this is seldom a food problem; it is a complex social problem and shotgun food-distribution programs are not going to solve it."

Dr. Graham also disputed claims that the incidence of low-weight birth was reduced by WIC. Two-thirds of low-weight births are trully premature births, especially among blacks of all economic levels, he said.

Dr. David Rush, of Columbia University's medical faculty, criticizes WIC studies that link all measures of well-being with higher birth-weight and says there are serious defects in the methodology.

"Unless accompanied by reduced [infant] mortality, it is not at all certain that small changes in birth-weight confer other health benefits," he wrote in the American Journal of Public Health. Subtle malnutrition defects—the only ones that could be expected—are difficult to identify with such a program, he added.

Other nutritionists see value in the social benefits of food programs for the needy, even if they cannot claim precise health results.

Dr. C. E. Butterworth, Jr., head of the nutrition department at the University of Alabama, testified in Washington recently that nutritional benefits of food stamps and WIC remain to be established, but he concluded that "these programs have contributed enormously to the health and welfare of the population of our state."

"Nutritional cost-benefits of food stamps? That's a good question, and I don't think anybody has the answer," said Dr. Walter P. Falcon, chairman of Stanford University's Food Research Institute.

"There is a higher incidence of illness, there are more work and school days lost, and there is more time spent in the hospital among these same [nutritional] high-risk, low-income groups than among the general population," said Dr. Burnette. But the linkage between health of the poor and undernutrition is still to be precisely defined, he added.

Researchers are puzzled by national surveys that report more nutritional deficiencies among lower income groups while finding that low-income people spend about the same amount per person that middle-income families do on at-home food.

The difference, suggests a pharmaceutical industry publication, may be that higher-income groups take more multi-vitamin pills.

The incidence of iron-deficiency anemia among low-income children has not changed significantly in more than a decade, despite attempts to improve their diets, according to the Center for Disease Control.

But nutritionists are divided on the efficacy of solving the problem by dispensing bottles of multi-vitamin or iron with food stamps; even efforts to increase iron fortification of cereals provokes violent controversies.

Food stamps, which provide an average benefit of 47 cents a meal per person, are not meeting current needs, especially since benefits have been cut just as the numbers of poor and unemployed have risen sharply, she said.

Food stamps—a uniquely American system—are generally considered the most efficient means of distributing food to the nation's needy. The program uses existing food markets for distribution, combined federal-local administrative costs are a modest 9 percent, and recipients retain the dignity of choosing what foods to buy, said Dr. Benjamin Senauer of the University of Minnesota's agriculture school.

"Study after study shows that food stamps have a greater impact on food expenditures than would cash grants," said Dr. Senauer.

"But there is not strong evidence that food stamps have a direct impact on the nutritional status" of recipients, Dr. Senauer said.

"Certainly there are parts of the hunger problem that cannot be measured by biomedical indices or by national nutritional status surveys," said Dr. Johanna T. Dwyer, nutritionist with Tufts New England Medical Center. "I don't think people in this country should have to worry about getting enough to eat."

Food Plan for Needy Doesn't Always Work Out the Way It's Supposed To

WASHINGTON.—Food stamps may be costing almost $13 billion this year, but that figure is a world apart from the kind of aid reaching a family at the bottom of the economic ladder.

A family of four without any cash coming in is getting $253 a month, about 70 cents a meal per person, for food. Children make up a large proportion of those families. The average food stamp payment comes to 47 cents a meal.

Even with that small amount, the government says, low-income families should be able to get an adequate diet, especially since families with income are supposed to supplement their food stamps with cash.

Betty Peterkin, of the Agriculture Department's Human Nutrition Information Service, said that if the government's thrifty food plan is followed, families will obtain "the necessary nutrition requirements."

The thrifty food plan, which is at the heart of the food stamp program, comprises a marketbasket of nutritious foods in 31 groupings. Its composition basically reflects congressional appropriations for the program, which have been cut in recent years.

There seems to be a large gap between theory and practice, however, which may account for some of the lines at soup kitchens.

"The biggest problem is getting nutrition information to the families," said Dr. Mardelle Amstutz, state coordinator of nutrition education at the University of Maryland. "It is very frustrating."

Dr. Amstutz supervises a staff of 54 nutrition experts in Maryland who at times go door to door in low-income neighborhoods to try to educate families about nutrition.

L. Mick Allman, assistant director of the food stamp division in Maryland, said his staff screens food stamp applicants for eligibility but added, "We're not in the business of supplying nutrition information. We don't have the staff or the knowledge. If there is a request, we do provide (nutrition) brochures."

Federal studies show that food stamp recipients have a more nutritious diet than similar low-income families not applying for food stamps. The studies also show that food stamp recipients, dollar for dollar, buy more nutritious food than people with higher incomes.

Dr. Amstutz noted, however, that "there is not a lot of slack" in the food budgets of low-income people, so any uneconomic purchases or food waste at home can have a greater impact on their nutrition.

A federal study indicated that of households with no income and depending entirely on food stamps, only 9 percent achieve a diet that meets the recommended levels for the 11 important vitamins and minerals, and that only three out of 10 achieve 80 percent of those nutrients. By comparison, seven out of 10 of all households nationwide get at least 80 percent of the recommended levels, and half of the families have a diet meeting the full recommended levels of vitamins and minerals.

Families or individuals with no income receive the maximum food stamp allotment. Those households with cash income get proportionately less, based on an assumption that 30 percent of the income should be spent on food as a supplement to the food stamp allotment. The lowest food stamp allotment to families with income is $10 a month.

There is no requirement that stamp recipients buy nutritious food, but there is some built-in incentive if stamps are to last the full month.

A recently updated federal study shows that families overall are spending $13 a week more for food than is provided by the food stamp allotment, or about 24 percent more than the thrifty food plan calls for.

"The thrifty food plan is based on a national average price of food, but food costs more in some areas," said Lynn Parker, of the Food Research and Action Center, an advocacy group for the poor. "It is also based on a hypothetical family of four and takes no account of pregnant women or people who do hard labor or teenagers who need more food."

Jean Mayer, a nutritionist who is president of Tufts University, called the government plan "very inadequate."

Helping the Hungry From a Station Wagon

Brother Tom Rochacewicz's station wagon has about had it. More than 70,000 miles of hauling loaves of bread, bananas and anything else he can scrounge to help the hungry have taken their toll.

After struggling to get the wagon in gear, Brother Tom looks up and says, "You have to have faith." He pulls away from the bakery loading dock and adds, "But a new van would be nice."

From St. Michael's Roman Catholic Church, at South Wolfe and Lombard Streets, Brother Tom has been operating the St. Michael's Food Outreach Program for 4½ years. Since February, he has given away more than 9,000 bags of food.

Much of his time is spent collecting benefactors. One recent day, H & S bakery filled his wagon with a variety of breads and a French bakery in Harborplace chipped in more than 25 pounds of dated croissants. There are ups and downs, though. A half ton of beef kidneys mistakenly shipped to the East Coast provided a recent up, but a banana importer's move to Wilmington, Del., was a down that estimated a source of 40 cases of bananas a week.

Brother Tom says he is of the ministry of the here and now. And while the aged station wagon gets more rickety by the day, Brother Tom's adrenaline seems to pump harder to compensate. But a new van would be nice.

FARM SCIENCE BATTLES AGAINST HUNGER, CRITICS

(By Albert Sehistedt, Jr.)

WASHINGTON.—In the next 60 seconds, the world's population will increase by 164 persons. Thirty-three of them will be fed by the United States, thanks in large part to America's advances in agricultural research during this century.

To meet the demands of hungry people abroad and a well-fed populace at home, the nation's agricultural scientists are using genetic engitious, devising biological controls to fight insects that destroy $30 billion worth of crops annually and seeking effective methods of preserving the quality of the soil and the purity of the waterways.

The researchers are even changing the shape of pigs to reduce their fat content, while devising birth control methods for boll weevils by blocking egg formation in the female.

"It's never been a more exciting time," said Thomas J. Army, deputy chief of the Agricultural Research Service at Beltsville.

True, perhaps, but critics claim that agricultural science is beset by serious problems, including "sluggish" research practices, too few topnotch people in the laboratory and a low priority in the national consciousness when compared with such glamorous pursuits as nuclear physics and manned space flight.

Agricultural scientists, however, point to a broad range of current projects that would indicate the nation's laboratories are staying current.

Some examples:

By moving genes from one kind of plant to another, government researchers and scientist at the University of Wisconsin have taken the first step toward increasing the nutritive value of crops and making them more resistant to disease-duction of a major protein in a particular bean seed to a sunflower cell. They call the result "sunbeam." Scientists hope it will be the first step in making more crops capable of "fixing" nitrogen from the air, one of the most important chemical processes in nature.

At the Beltsville Agricultural Research Center, Gideon W. Schaeffer grew pollen in a test tube to capture "an extra increment of dwarfness" in a California-bred rice plant.

The "dwarfness" shortens the stalks of the plants, so that they will not blow over in the wind and rot—not a major breakthrough for the Baltimore housewife, perhaps, but a hopeful development for millions in other parts of the world who subsist primarily on rice.

Government researchers in Arizona have developed an infrared "gun" that records the temperature of crop foliage during dry spells.

The gun takes advantage of the scientific principle that dry plants radiate more heat. The infrared test should, therefore, make it easier for farmers in arid areas to hoard critical supplies of irrigation water until the plants really need the water.

Other scientists are trying to apply recombinant DNA technology to produce "super seeds" for barley, rice and wheat to ensure more uniform growth in the fields. Still others are investigating ways to make livestock feed more nourishing while improving the animals' metabolism.

Are these kinds of research efforts, however encouraging, good enough to meet the demands of a constantly growing world population that is expected to climb from the current four billion to six billion by 2000?

In this regard, the concern of informed critics is directed not only at some of the more complex scientific hurdles facing agricultural research but also at an attitudinal problem among the citizenry at large that can be summed up in six words: Too few people give a damn.

"Inadequate public understanding of the importance of agriculture to the strength and vitality of this country and the well-being of its citizens leads public officials generally to undervalue agricultural research," said last year's Winrock Report, a study sponsored by the Rockefeller Foundation and the White House.

As a result, agricultural research has a relatively low priority at the national level; federal appropriations for agricultural research are well below the level consistent with its payoff and value to society, and distribution of funds is largely on the basis of geopolitics, rather than need or expected return," the report said.

A congressional study a year earlier took the same tack.

"United States Department of Agriculture [USDA] research expenditures are proportionally the smallest of any major federal research agency," said the congressional Office of Technology Assessment (OTA).

The Office of Management and Budget (OMB) placed agriculture's 1982 share of the federal expenditures for research and development at 2 percent of the total. Defense and military research got 53 percent, energy related activities got 14 percent and the Department of Health and Human Services 16 percent.

The list of complaints is not confined to money, organizational structure or national attitudes.

Other critics complain of an aging corps of agricultural researchers, allegedly skeptical of modern methods of inquiry; fragmented approaches to acquiring new scientific knowledge, and a lack of coherent agricultural research policy directed by strong national leadership.

Add to all that an apparent disdain among some scientists for agricultural research generally. Many in the scientific community, in keeping with the thinking of the country as a whole, would appear to bestow second-class status on scientists in agriculture compared, say, to those in biochemistry or nuclear physics.

In this regard, the Winrock study pointed to the "relatively small numbers of agricultural research scientists in the National Academy of Sciences," the nation's premier organization of researchers, chosen by election.

This attitude may be one reason too few students are entering agricultural schools at the nation's major universities.

There is today "a human capital shortage," in the words of Donald A. Hegwood, dean of the College of Agriculture at the University of Maryland, College Park.

Arguing that "colleges of agriculture will have to market themselves to students," Dr. Hegwood, in a recent interview, said that against a need of 59,000 agricultural science graduates yearly, the nation's colleges are graduating only 51,000.

Terry B. Kinney, Jr., head of the USDA's Agricultural Research Service (ARS) in Washington, agrees. He said, "If I got $100 million tomorrow to go into a major genetic-engineering program, I couldn't get enough scientists." (The current budget for the Agricultural Research Service is approximately $450 million.)

Is the state of agricultural research really so bad?

Leaders within the agricultural establishment, including Dr. Kinney, take a generally optimistic view—predictably, perhaps. They point out that while innovative research has its place in agricultural science, many of the cures for current problems lie along the traditional avenues of study that their colleagues have pursued for decades.

To begin with, agricultural research—unlike nuclear physics or biochemistry—is not strictly a laboratory science but must be conducted in the light of nature's imponderables.

"Soil, water and air," said Dr. Army, the deputy chief of USDA's Agricultural Research Service (ARS), "are the three essentials," and research in these areas must be maintained.

"We're still losing tons of top soil per acre every year from wind and water," said Dr. Kinney, "and they ain't making any more."

The erosion of the shallow (18 to 24 inches) layer of topsoil that supports plant and animal life around the globe has already removed about half of it from U.S. farmlands, according to government data. A third of the ground water used for irrigation in the West is being pumped from aquifers faster than the aquifers can be recharged.

Developing better ways to preserve topsoil, forestalling erosion and protecting the water and the air are also the province of agricultural research, ARS officials asserted, and their importance must not be minimized.

Research in these areas has contributed to increasing the nation's agricultural productivity 240 percent in the past 50 years and has made it possible for Americans to spend a smaller part of their income on food—about 16 percent—than people in any other country.

USDA officials say research in other lackluster subjects, such as storage and transportation, is important.

Dr. Army recalled seeing a field of sorghum choked by weeds in the Sudan because a herbicide had not arrived in time.

That sort of transportation problem may seem curious or outrageous to the average American, but it is not an uncommon difficulty in many Third World countries.

Despite concern about some aspects of research, the Winrock study, named for the Winrock International Conference Center in Morrilton, Ark., found cause for optimism: "Annual rates of return on research expenditures in agriculture range from 35 to 50 percent, well above the returns to other public investments and a clear indication that we are seriously underinvesting in this national resource."

Dr. Kinney also was generally optimistic that ways can be found to feed the world "as far down the road as we can see," but cautioned, "Sooner or later there has got to be a restriction on the population of the world."

His concern can be summed up in a Malthusian corollary: The ability of humankind to reproduce itself is theoretically unlimited; the Earth's ability to produce food seems disturbingly finite.

Today, though, "there's sufficient food to feed everyone in the world," he said.

Why, then, are people starving?

"Distribution," was his one-word summation. Many developing countries have nothing like Western nations' road, rail and air networks, or their warehouses.

"If we could ship and store food at overseas depots, we could minimize the food problem right quickly," he said.

Dr. Kinney and Dr. Army also agreed more research is needed into a related, but separate, science: human nutrition.

"Hell," said Dr. Army with a chuckle, "we know more about animal nutrition than we do about human nutrition."

"The stickler in this whole thing, looking to the future," summarized Dr. Kinney, "is the fact that it takes time to do research. It takes time to make the mistakes that have to be made."

Marek's disease is a case in point.

Research on the poultry virus began in 1939. The virus was finally isloated in 1967, and the vaccine was licensed for national use in 1971.

Elapsed time: 32 years.

By 1974, though, the vaccine's annual benefit was $180 million, according to the USDA. The total research cost was $31 million, a cost-benefit ratio any bureaucrat would be happy to report to congressional appropriations committees.

One promising road to solutions is genetic engineering—manipulating the genes of plants and animals to make them healthier, more resistant to disease and more tolerant of drought.

USDA announced such a breakthrough in 1981, describing a new vaccine against foot-and-mouth disease that scientists hope will increase the world's meat supply substantially and prevent billions of dollars in livestock losses.

The disease, widespread in Africa and Latin America, is found in cattle, swine and other animals and is very contagious. There is no cure, and animals infected by it have traditionally been destroyed.

Agriculture researchers have also reported encouraging studies of genetic materials in corn and sorghum that may play a key role in making the crops sturdier and more disease-resistant.

"But it will be 10, 15, 25 years before we see any significant payoff from genetic engineering in production agriculture," Dr. Kinney said.

On this count, the agricultural research establishment has come under fire from another source, George A. Keyworth II, science adviser to President Reagan and director of the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy.

"My impression is that there are two basic reasons for the relatively sluggish application of the 'new' biology to plant science," Dr. Keyworth said October 4.

"One is that many people involved in agricultural research don't have the training and experience in molecular biology, or are preoccupied—and comfortable with—traditional approaches.

"The other reason is the rudimentary state of plant molecular biology—a legacy of the biologists' highly developed intuition for devoting their lives to model organisms that are relatively easy to work with, but not necessarily good to eat or wear."

Dr. Kinney and his associates have been examining their own house and have made changes they think will improve their science and their administering of it.

The plan outlines steps to cut back research in some traditional areas, such as the development of plant varieties, while putting more emphasis on nutrition, genetic engineering, conservation of resources and basic research.

Basic research, which in all the branches of science is a quest for fundamental answers locked in nature, takes time and demands a steady flow of cash.

It also demands a special kind of person, an insightful but patient scientist who is willing to encounter baffling problems and frustrating disappointments before hitting upon an answer, perhaps accidentally, that will unravel the riddle at hand.

Albert Einstein, the most renowned basic researcher of this century, put it best, perhaps, when he said, "You ask me how I work: I grope."

It is that kind of painstaking—and costly—effort that the citizens of the world will ask of agricultural research, which has been called "the mother of sciences," if six billion people are going to have enough to eat in 2000.

THE TRADE-OFF: WHAT SCIENCE GAINS, NATURE CAN TAKE AWAY

(By Albert Sehlstedt, Jr.)

Agricultural science has reached a level of sophistication at which researchers know a good deal about how to improve the quality of many crops—but sometimes at a price.

For example, a scientist may try to enhance the nutrition in an ear of corn, but at the expense of the leaves, which absorb sunlight in the world's most important chemical reaction, photosynthesis.

In other words, these kinds of crop improvements involve trade-offs, or what might be called a "shell game" in which one part of the plant is improved but another is harmed, making the whole plant vulnerable to disease or the ravages of weather.

There is little value in a potentially delicious ear of corn growing on a weakened stalk that will blow over in a rainstorm and rot on the ground.

The solution to this sort of dilemma would seem to lie in basic research, in trying to undertand as much as possible about the total life cycle of plants needed for human survival.

Dr. Steven J. Britz, a plant physiologist at the Beltsville Agricultural Research Center, reduced the problem to a simple sentence: "We don't understand as much as we would like to about how plants work."

Photosynthesis might be improved, Dr. Britz suggested, but "there is a practical limit to which plants can convert light energy into food."

"Plants use less than half the total energy in sunlight," noted Dr. James A. Bunce, a colleague at Beltsville's Light and Plant Growth Laboratory.

One way to improve photosynthesis is to increase the size of the leaf.

Among the unknowns in this line of research are, again, the potential trade-offs.

"When we start doing all this, sometimes things may backfire, such as producing a plant with smaller leaves," said Dr. Britze.

The researcher then finds himself back at square one.

INDIA HAS CONQUERED MASS STARVATION, BUT NOT ALL ITS NUTRITIONAL PROBLEMS

(By John Woodruff)

NEW DELHI.—M. Das Mukherjee lives in the third tent in a row that houses a few dozen farm workers just off the road about two hours out of the national capital in the state of Haryana.

The sun burns into his tent, and the dust rising from freshy plowed furrows filters through its muslin sides until it is impossible to say whether the cloth looks more bleached or dirty.

Amid the mixed fragrances of the farm and of group housing that has neither water nor sanitation, Mr. Mukherjee lives on a daily ration of a few handfuls of boiled rice, a few slices of bread and a boiled vegetable. He wears a cotton undershirt with three small holes in the left side.

The undershirt, a dhoti worn like trousers, some blankets, a toothbrush, a metal cup, a metal pot for water and a string bed he bought recently are the possessions in his half of the tent.

Mr. Mukherjee is quick to declare himself one of the beneficiaries of India's share in the Green Revolution.

"It's much better that I came here," he says. "I can earn over a hundred rupees ($9.50) in a month, and usually I can send more than half of that back to my family in Bengal."

One hundred rupees is far more than most of India's hundreds of millions of landless farmworkers can hope to earn in a month. Millions live from dust storm to monsoon without seeing that much cash in a year.

Nevertheless, starvation is waning. It is now more than a decade since India had to go begging for tens of millions of tons of grain a year in aid or on concessional terms just to feed its people during a drought.

The new grain-sufficient India has passed the tests of two droughts in the last 10 years that were as severe as any in the mid-1960s and has been able both times to pay market prices for the relatively small quantities of wheat that had to be imported to rebuild buffer stocks.

A variety of factors, including government policies aimed at providing food and purchasing power, and advanced agricultural education, have contributed to the newly won self-sufficiency. And the success of the Green Revolution in the wheat fields of Haryana, Punjab and western Uttar Pradesh, the three northern Indian states where it has been concentrated, has produced jobs that have drawn landless farmworkers from all over the country.

The progress has not been uniform, however. Mr. Mukherjee's move here, along with hundreds of thousands of other farmworkers from West Bengal, Bihar and Orissa in eastern India, reflects both the successes and the failures of the new farming methods that have revolutionized major segments of Indian agriculture in the last 15 years.

On the one hand, the Green Revolution has begun to free Indians from the tyranny of unreliable weather. On the other, it has not spread much beyond the borders of the three states.

Also, except for the few hundred thousand who have found jobs, its benefit to the country's hundreds of millions of landless rural workers has not extended much beyond insulating them against mass starvation the next time the monsoon fails to blow enough rain across India's fields.

Why the Green Revolution has come to northern India and not to most of the rest of the country is a topic of continuing debate here, but mainly the answer is water—too little and too much.

In northern India, the success of the new-technology wheat relied on heavy chemical fertilization and massive irrigation, requiring hundreds of thousands of tube well. Dr. K.G. Tejwani, who for 25 years directed India's soil conservation and irrigation efforts, estimates that only 40 percent of the country's farmland can be irrigated. About five-eighths of that 40 percent—or one-fourth of India's arable land—had been irrigated.

In southern India, the problem was almost the reverse. The miracle rice hybrids, growing on dwarf stalks, require carefully limited flood levels. Some control of the rivers in southern India has been achieved, but there is no such control across most of the vast Ganges plain, where annual flooding during the growing season forces farmers to stay with traditional rice varieties that can endure high waters but have low yields by today's standards.

"Wherever we have provided the physical environment, the farmers have adopted the new strains and succeeded with them," said an Indian planning commission adviser.

That physical environment has included not only control over the waters but also construction of a fertilizer supply and distribution system, a farmer-training plan similar to American extension programs and a system of agricultural universities patterned on the American land-grant colleges. The latter have been made all the more successful by an educational level among farmers that is already higher than that usually encountered in developing countries.

"Organizing human activity has been a major part of the job," the planning commission adviser says, "and it has to extend beyond just producing the gain. In many ways, how you deliver the grain is more crucial than how much you produce."

The key, many Indian and foreign officials believe, has been making it possible for very low-level officials to make on-the-spot decisions that can head off local food problems. "A district officer today can call in and report a shortage and the grain will begin to move the next day," the adviser said.

As important as logistics, he said, has been organizing a means to see that the poorest Indians have the means to buy the grain they need.

"Drought studies show over and over again that what dries up even worse than food production in a drought is purchasing power," the planning adviser said. "We try to deal with this through our food-for-work program."

Under that program, hundreds of millions of landless and jobless Indians a year earn their food as a result of being steered into massive public works projects, directed by the individual states and subsidized by the central government in New Delhi.

"That is the hard part—getting the grain to the people after you have it in hand," the adviser said. "Organizing that is not to be thought of as a job of a few weeks to be done in response to some emergency. You have to be ready with a permanent system, and it takes not years but decades to build that system, and when it is built there are hundreds of thousands of people and always work to do to maintain it and always new ways to improve it."

After more than three decades of independence and 15 years of the Green Revolution, where does India stand today?

No one starves to death here anymore, one Western development expert says, but the population is growing just as fast as the grain harvests and it is literally true that last year India harvested just exactly as much grain per person as it did in a good year 15 years ago.

The difference is that irrigation and the Green Revolution have leveled off the dips in production that come when the rain fails, and that the government has learned how to get available grain into the people's bellies.

Despite the impressive successes, then, reality remains grim.

Hundreds of millions of Indians go through every day with fewer calories than world nutrition experts recommend. Estimates of those living below the official "poverty line"—estimated in caloric intake, not in cash income—range from an Indian government figure of about 200 million to a U.S. Department of Agriculture calculation that just over half the country's 740 million people eat less than they need to be productive workers.

While the country has struggled to maintain even this marginal level of basic food grains, the other two elements of the national diet have fallen upon hard times.

India once exported cooking oils and the nuts and seeds from which they are made, but since 1975 it has become the world's largest importer of these basic commodities.

In addition, production of pulses—beans, lentils, chick-peas and other protein sources that are fundamental in a largely vegetarian society—has stagnated, necessitating imports that have become a major drain on the country's foreign-exchange earnings.

"What we have saved on imports by raising more grain, we have lost by ever-increasing imports of oils and pulses," an Indian agricultural expert said.

"In part, the problem is that grain has become so attractive to raise with the high-yield varieties that farmers won't raise these others."

Experts agree that the land can produce enough for all, even in India and even at current rates of population growth, but many wonder how India will get beyond constantly feeding hundreds of millions at or below the margin of subsistence.

"The problem is not rooted in underproduction or in overpopulation," one Western development expert says, "The root of the problem is that hundreds of millions of Indians simply do not have the means to buy any more than subsistence rations.

"But if more people had more income to buy more food, you can bet the farmers would be producing it. They would have the incentive to put in the investments and raise more no matter if the government helped or not."

In this view, a major problem is the government's commitment to an industrial policy modeled largely after Stalin's program of putting heavy priority on heavy industries, which create fewer jobs than consumer and farm-support industries do.

"My guess is that they're going to slush along like this, right at the margin, never starving anyone but with enervating undernutrition, until they run out of new land to irrigate, somewhere near the end of this century. After that, its anybody's guess what's next," the development expert said.

High Yields Were Turning Point for Starving Millions in Asia

(By Gilbert A. Lewthwaite)

WASHINGTON.—Daynatha Jha remembers the time, 20 years ago when he commanded little respect in his native India. He was an agricultural scientist in a land committed to developing heavy industry.

That all began to change in 1963, the day those sacks arrived at the Indian Agricultural Research Institute in New Delhi. They came from Mexico, and they contained the first seeds of a new high-yield wheat to be transferred to Asia.

Mr. Jha and his colleagues planted a sample and watched the plants grow.

"It was mind-boggling," he says now. "It was almost a traumatic shock to see the kind of yield levels that were obtained."

He was witnessing the beginning of the Green Revolution in Asia.

It would soon spread from India to other nations in Asia, and new strains of high-yield rice paralleled the increased production of wheat. The Green Revolution, started in Mexico, had a considerable impact in Central America, and Africa benefited little, but for Asia's hungry millions, it proved to be a real godsend.

Within five years of the arrival of those sacks in New Delhi, wheat production by India's 70 million farmers had doubled to 23.4 million tons.

Today, India, once the archetypal "beggar's bowl" nation, for years dependant on massive grain imports from the United States to feed its starving millions, is basically self-sufficient in food. One of the main reasons is the Green Revolution.

It is a revolution credited by some with having a more dramatic impact on the lives of more people than any other upheaval, past or present.

It is a revolution that, according to Robert Evenson, professor of economics at Yale and a student of the Green Revolution for 15 years, produces a staggering annual return on investment of 50 to 100 percent.

"That is far higher than virtually any other investment that one knows about," says Dr. Evenson, noting that public sector investment normally produces annual returns of around 10 percent, while private investments might produce pre-tax returns of about 20 percent yearly.

Today, more than one-third of rice paddies and half of all wheat fields in the 3.2 billion hectares of cropland in the Third World are planted with high-yield seed varieties. (A hectare is a metric unit equal to 2.47 acres.)

Production in these areas is frequently double or triple the traditional harvest. The Green Revolution, which includes use of irrigation and fertilization, has accounted for the major portion of the increase.

One agricultural survey of eight Asian countries shows that of the 117 million-ton increase in rice production—worth $19.3 billion—between 1965 and 1980, 89.8 million tons was a result of the Green Revolution.

Yet, "for all its achievements, the Green Revolution has not yet occurred in many parts of the world. . . . When the results are added up, they leave no room for complacency, particularly when they are set alongside the rise in population," says the World Bank's "World Development Report 1982."

It notes that while world agricultural output rose at just under 3 percent yearly in the 1960s and 1970s, it barely kept ahead of population growth. In Africa, per capita agricultural output actually declined by 1.4 percent yearly during the 1970s, partly because of lack of suitable Green Revolution technology.

Unlike much of Asia, great portions of Africa rely on natural rainfall that is notoriously variable. Although the region has vast irrigation potential, realizing it will be expensive. Irrigation cannot be expected to play much of a role in Africa in the next 20 years, reports by the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) of the United Nations and the World Bank conclude.

"It should not be seen as a disappointment that the Green Revolution didn't do more for Africa," said David Walsh, an official with the U.S. Agency for International Development in Washington.

"It was designed from the start to work in a few countries that could supply the water, the pesticides and fertilizers required by those high yielding varieties—and Africa doesn't have any of that capability."

D. F. Bommer, a top agricultural technology official with the FAO in Rome agrees, saying, "There are numerous revolutions required for Africa before it will have the ability to benefit from many new technologies—stability for example."

In Asia, the so-called revolution provided for the first time a major way of boosting food production without an increase in cultivated land. That remains one of its major attractions in the many overcrowded areas of the world.

"By the end of this century, there will be almost no areas in the world where you can get any increase in output without intensification of production," says Vernon Ruttan, of the University of Minnesota.

The basic secret of success for the high-yield plants is their size.

They are shorter and sturdier than traditional plants. The advantages: when fertilized, they do not grow so tall that they break or fall over, cutting out light from each other and trapping in disease and insect-attracting humidity; the short stems also produce fewer leaves, leaving more energy for the growth of the food product.

Dwarf varieties of grains, initially bred in Japan last century, were used in the 1950s and 1960s to develop the modern semi-dwarf strains of wheat and rice. Most of the breeding work was done at the International Maize and Wheat Improvement center run by Nobel Peace Prize winner Norman Borlaug in Mexico, and at the International Rice Research Institute in the Philippines, both backed by the Ford and Rockefeller foundations. Today an increasing amount of research is done in national research centers.

To be successful the new plants must usually be adapted to local ecological and climatic conditions. They must also satisfy established consumer tastes.

The first high-yield Mexican wheat to arrive in India, for example, was ecologically suitable but had red seeds. Indian farmers were used to amber seeds. The grain size was also smaller than that of traditional Indian crops. This led to initial consumer resistance. But within two years, Indian agriculturists had adapted the Mexican plants to local preferences.

Not all developing nations have the technical capacity for pursuing such plant development. If the Green Revolution is to keep spreading, more local facilities will have to be created.

Explains Robert W. Herdt, scientific adviser to the Consultative Group on International Agricultural Research:

"Agricultural production is not like automobile production. It is not like printing a newspaper. Agricultural production takes place in a tremendous variety of different types of soil, water, temperature, pests and environmental conditions.

"The simple answer as to why the other 70 percent [of cropland in the Third World] is not planted to these [high-yield] varieties is that for that 70 percent there have not been better varieties [of plants] developed than they are using."

To overcome this limitation, new strains of high-yield plants are now being developed: rice that can grow in drought-prone areas or floodwater; wheat tolerant of salt and aluminate toxicity; fast-growing rice to make up to four crops a year possible; corn for the tropics, which would enable parts of Africa to benefit; new strains of vegetables to reverse the comparative neglect of these sources of protein.

It takes about 10 years to process from crossing plants to producing enough seed for large-scale cultivation, but it is clear that the painstaking adaptation of high-yield strains to peculiar local conditions, as well as other successes of bio-technology, is the future challenge of the Green Revolution.

In Mexico, where the new wheat strains were first bred, agricultural production increased between 4 percent and 7 percent annually during the 1950s and 1960s. This was when the new seeds were being planted in irrigated areas.

In the 1970s, however, growth slowed to 2 percent or 3 percent yearly as irrigation became more expensive and the bulk of Mexican farming continued on rain-dependent lands. New plant varieties were developed for these conditions, and in 1980 Mexico's agricultural growth rate had climbed to 5.5 percent. In 1981 it was 8 percent, most of it from new-technology, rain-dependent cultivation.

Walter P. Falcon, director of the Food Research Institute at Stanford University, who has studied the Green Revolution since its introduction, says, "I don't think we will see quite the rapid, widespread, spectacular successes that we saw in the cases of rice and wheat. Maybe they were too easy. Maybe the world thought we could do that on all crops, for all ecological regions.

"Clearly, the marginal rainfall zones are going to be tougher, and clearly, most other crops are going to be tougher."

Most scientists agree that the Green Revolution's impact on food production will be less dramatic in the future than in the past.

Pierre Antoine, a program officer in the International Agricultural Development Service, says, "I think right now the emphasis is shifting to farming systems and overall programs. I think that breeding, as such, has had its time. It's time to concentrate on other things."

Mr. Jha, who left India to become a research fellow at the International Food Policy Research Institute here, says: "The wheat story is almost over. Now what's happening in wheat is its movement away from traditional wheat-growing areas. We don't expect to obtain significant growth in wheat now."

Critics of the Green Revolution charge that it has helped large farmers more than small, widening the gap between the rich and the poor and increasing social tensions.

The basis of the charge is that to be used most successfully, the high-yield grains need to be fertilized and irrigated. These are two costly operations, which frequently involve obtaining credit, which is easier for large operators than for small farmers.

In a 1979 report on the social consequences of the Green Revolution, U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim said:

"It appears that some farmers, usually large-scale ones, have rapidly profited from the Green Revolution, while others, particularly small farmers and tenants, having fewer resource endowments, have lagged behind.

"The result has been that the Green Revolution has not made any considerable impact on alleviating the disadvantaged position of small cultivators who form the bulk of the farming population in developing countries."

Most proponents of the Green Revolution admit that the large operators were able to take first advantage of the new techniques. But, they argue, once the small farmers saw what was happening, they quickly—and successfully—jumped on the hay wagon.

Dana G. Dalrymple, international agricultural research economist with the Agency for International Development, says of the critics: "They were extremely vocal at the time, but nowadays you don't hear much from them . . . Of course, there were some things that obviously could be criticized. They just took the first returns without waiting for the full set of returns, which, I think, would have given them a more balanced picture of what was going on. There was a certain amount of shooting from the hip, although well-intentioned."

James E. Johnston, deputy director for agricultural sciences at the Rockefeller Foundation, which has contributed $200 million to international agricultural research, says: "The evidence is conclusive that the large farmers adapted more quickly. The small farmers were slower in adapting, but did adapt. Now the small farmers are getting higher yields [than the large]. It's just a matter of management."

Charles Sykes, assistant executive director for legislative affairs of CARE, who served in Pakistan and India in the mid-1960s and early 1970s, says: "In the short run, there were certainly negative sides, but in the longer run, the production of larger amounts of food tended to stabilize prices, so it had overall medium-term and long-term benefits."

There is general agreement that the program favored areas with controlled water supplies, giving rise to regional disparties. The current research on new high-yielding varieties for drought- and flood-prone areas, focuses on this problem.

One nightmare scenario suggests that by limiting the types of grain grown regionally, producers, risk leaving their crops open to a single devastating epidemic.

"It is something that breeders are very alert to, and something that breeders and geneticists are keeping an eye on. As far as I know, there have been no real disasters," says Christopher Chapman, genetics resource officer for the International Board for Plant Genetic Resources.

The board is working with governments to establish crop collections so that old strains do not disappear but are kept for future possible use in breeding. To date plant gene banks have been established in 38 countries to hold base collections of 34 crops or groups of crops. One of them is the small grains collection held in Beltsville, Md.

For all its shortcomings, and the slower pace at which it is now likely to proceed, the Green Revolution has been successful enough to save hundreds of millions in the world from hunger and to give scientists time to look for new ways to keep food production ahead of demand.

Says Harry Walters, a World Bank economist:

"It's very hard realistically to come out and say it should not have happened, that it has not done a tremendous amount of good for the world, that it was not a big eye-opener. It was all of those.

"Given the circumstances and the timing, it was probably the only thing people could have done to get enough food."

THE END OF THE LINE FOR SOUP KITCHENS ISN'T YET IN SIGHT

(By Stephen E. Nordlinger)

WASHINGTON.—Poverty in America and one of its symptoms, the long lines at soup kitchens, are unlikely to recede significantly for years to come.

The economy is on an upswing now, but there is a host of economic, cultural and political reasons that militate against improving the lot of the 42 million Americans who live below or near the poverty line.

A family of four was classified as poor last year if it had cash income of less than $9,862. The poverty rate, which has increased for the last four years, was 15 percent of the population, the highest level since 1965. The climb resulted primarily from an economic slide since 1979.

"People may not want to recognize it, but we have a growing underclass whose resources are really being stretched out," Cincinnati Mayor Thomas B. Brush recently told a congressional panel investigating hunger in the United States. "Many of them are over 40, they are not highly skilled and they will need help on and off for a long time."

The unemployment rate, swollen by those unable to adjust to the swift economic transformation to high technology, is going to stay high by historical standards well into the 1980s, according to most economists. It is expected to remain above 6 percent as late as 1988, twice the level considered unacceptable a decade ago.

That means millions of people out of work for long stretches and the frequent exhaustion of unemployment benefits, two of the chief causes for the growing soup-kitchen lines of the last two years.

The grim prospects for relieving poverty also reflect the large numbers of people who are members of households headed by women. These women and their children are the ones often seen seeking free meals at soup kitchens or bags of groceries at outlets for free food.

About a seventh of American families are headed by women. Approximately half of the families below the poverty line are in this group, the size of which has doubled since 1959. The economic recovery will have to be sustained for years before there will be a significant reduction in poverty among these households.

"Today women who maintain their own families are an ever-increasing proportion of the poverty ranks," said a recent report by the U.S. Civil Rights Commission. "In general, women have been restricted to low-paying jobs in occupations with limited potential for advancement."

There are other roots of poverty and the closely related problem of undernutrition. Ben E. Laden, chief economist for T. Rowe Price Associates, pointed to the "failure of the education system" to improve the lot of the low-income groups, particularly the failure of vocational schools to prepare youths for highly skilled jobs.

Other experts referred to the scarcity of food stores in many decaying city neighborhoods and sparsely populated rural areas, and poor public transit systems that limit poor people's access to stores and government offices that process applications for social aid.

A study by the U.S. Agriculture Department this year found that households in less densely populated areas near cities were 10 percent less likely than other households to take part in the food stamp program.

The study also indicated that the inadequacy of day-care centers also impedes raising people out of poverty and raising their nutrition levels. Heads of households who are working are 22 percent to 30 percent less likely that others to take part in the food stamp program.

Part of this gap could also be traced to recent budget cuts in the food stamp program that hurt the working poor. A. Lawrence Chickering, executive director of the Institute for Contemporary Studies, said that to protect the lowest income groups, the budget cuts fell heavily on the working poor.

Despite federal civil rights laws, a racial imbalance in hiring remains a major obstacle to reducing poverty. The unemployment rate among blacks is about 18 percent, more than twice the 8 percent rate for whites.

As a measure of the scale of the future problem, Rudolph G. Penner, director of the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, said it would take a shift of $43 billion a year of cash income from the affluent to the poor to erase poverty in this country. That is the total amount by which poor people fell below the poverty line last year.

Federal programs, from welfare to food aid and medical assistance, fill that gap to some extent. About 40 percent of the poor people eligible for these programs do not apply, however.

"In the case of malnutrition," said Dr. George Graham, professor of human nutrition and pediatrics at the Johns Hopkins University, "its causes in this country are very complex, but they're not that mysterious—social disruption of families, drugs, alcohol, jail, very young teenage mothers—when you talk about children."

"When you talk about the elderly, there is illness, isolation, fear to go out and buy and the boredom of preparing their own food," he said.

John Weicher, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, noted that even in the economically strong year of 1978 the poverty rate was 11.4 percent. It has been rising steadily since then, and Mr. Weicher said he doubted it would soon return to the 1978 level.

According to Peter Gottschalk, an economist at the Institute for Research on Poverty, the poverty rate for all Americans will decline to 14.6 percent this year from 15 percent in 1982 and stay there through 1984.

Since poverty is directly related to inadequate nutrition, Jack Ramsey, executive director of the Phoenix-based Second Harvest, which distributes food to food banks nationwide, said he expected demand at soup kitchens and outlets for free groceries to rise "well through" the 1980s.

There are ideological as well as political reasons that limit spending on social programs that could relieve poverty. President Reagan is leading the way toward redirecting budget priorities away from social programs that benefit the poor and toward military spending.

With some restraint, Congress is accepting this change. According to the Congressional Budget Office, 40 percent of the cutbacks in benefit programs over the last two years affected households with annual incomes below $10,000. The cutbacks totaled 28 percent in child nutrition programs and 13 percent in welfare and food stamps and 60 percent in employment and training programs.

In assessing the prospects for reducing hunger, a number of authorities are focusing on the nutrition issue itself. Is the diet of the poor improving or getting worse?

Well documented, objective evidence of the status of poor people's diets is not available. President Reagan's task force on hunger, which he announced last August, is attempting to respond to this question.

There are a few clues. The Agriculture Department's most recent national food consumption survey, conducted in 1977 and 1978, showed that of 4,365 low-income households, less than half, 42 percent, were eating the recommended amounts of 11 important vitamins and minerals.

That survey came during relatively strong economic growth with unemployment rapidly declining after the recession of 1973-1975. Now, an Agriculture Department official said, "the [recent] recession and budget cuts must have had an impact" on worsening the diets of the poor.

Another government analysis of low-income diets shows a varying pattern across the country:

The poor are eating the least nutritious diets in the rural West, where the participation in food stamps is also lowest.

Low-income households in the urban North Central states on average had diets with higher nutrient levels than those in any other region, but in the rural parts of that region the diets were among the least adequate.

The average spend on food among low-income groups differed widely across the country. It ranged from 34.8 percent of income among the rural Westerners to 40.5 percent among the poor in the urban Northeast, where food tends to be more expensive.

There appears to be a basic variation among economic groups themselves.

"We've got a very large class division in the quality of nutrition in this country," said Michael Pertschuk, a member of the Federal Trade Commission. "The upper classes have vastly improved their diets, but it is a problem in the middle class and it is impossible for the lower classes to use the little money they have for a decent diet."

Recognizing this problem and the obstacles faced by the poor in obtaining information on nutrition, the Agriculture Department is trying to encourage improved diets.

As one means of doing so, it has proposed a revision in its thrifty food plan, which is used as a basis for food stamps, to include larger amounts of vegetables, fruit, meat, cereal, grain products, beans, peas and legumes. To keep within the federal budget limits, the plan includes smaller quantities of fats, sugar, eggs, milk, bakery products and potatoes. It is the first revision of the plan since 1976.

"Higher income groups, because they are better educated, have been the leaders in cultural changes concerning purchases including improved diets," said Michael Jacobson, executive director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, "but my gut feeling is that this will over time percolate down to the lower-income groups. Eating a nutritious diet is going to be considered OK. Burger King now has a vegetarian salad bar."

The path to improved nutrition may not be all smooth, however. The 1984 Olympic Games have named, M&M's the "official snack food" of the 1984 games and Coca-Cola the "official soft drink."

TO GET HELP

If you need food assistance, you can get information about the emergency food program nearest your home by calling the Information and Referral Service of the Health and Welfare Council. The number is 685-0525 for Baltimore area residents, and the toll-free number for residents of other parts of Maryland is 1-800-492-0618.

TO GIVE HELP

If you would like to help an emergency food porgram, you can get information by calling or writing the Maryland Food Committee, 105 West Monument Street, Baltimore, Md., 21201. The phone number is 837-5667 in Baltimore.

CITY'S HUNGRY DEPEND ON "PEOPLE WHO CARE"

(by Jane A. Smith)

Anyone walking by 17 West Franklin street around noontime will see a long line of down-and-out people, mostly men, waiting to be fed a free meal.

Similar lines form in other parts of the city, depending on the schedule of the 21 soup kitchens. Some of them are open only one or two days a week, not because the demand is lacking, but because the resources aren't there.

The people who run the kitchens and emergency food pantries say they make no pretense of meeting the needs of the hungry, but whatever can be done is worth the effort.

"They are necessary Band-Aids on ever-growing wounds," said Jan Houbolt, executive director of the Maryland Food Committee, a statewide anti-hunger group funded primarily by the religious community.

"However, if you literally don't have any money to your name and no food in the kitchen it is very effective in the short run."

At Our Daily Bread, on Franklin street, an average of 450 people are served hot meals every day. At the end of the month, when welfare checks and food stamps have run out, the number of people climbs close to 600.

Sister Josanna Abromaitis, who runs Our Daily Bread, doesn't see much hope for feeding many more people. "We're tapping as many people as we can," she said recently, referring to the members of the 47 groups and churches who prepare and serve a meal once a month. Many of the volunteers pay for the food out of their own pockets.

"We've seen a tremendous public response . . . but there is still a need for more places like this," she said.

Every soup kitchen and emergency food center "is being wiped out. They don't have the resources to meet the demand. This past year has gotten so bad. I don't think people are starving to death necessarily, but some are in very sad straits," Sister Josanna said.

She attributed some of the increase in clients to "a lot more deinstitutionalized people."

"It's not uncommon to see two to three new faces a day. They are very disturbed people. And there seems to be a lot more transients."

Beatrice Gaddy, who started the Patterson Park Emergency Food Center in her North Collington avenue house two years ago and began serving hot meals Monday through Friday last month, also gets by day to day on the generosity of people who can afford to give away food or money—a grocer who donated canned goods, a man who offered six free turkeys or an anonymous donor who gave $2,000 to help launch the project.

Her food center has served up chicken wings, canned soup or potatoes to people "from Chase, Maryland, Bel Air, all over. . . .You'd be shocked to see the food in here that lasts only two hours," she said.

She opened the food center, she said, because the government was making it harder and harder for people to qualify for food stamps.

The United States is the world's richest country and "people are walking the streets eating out of garbage cans," she said.

Mrs. Gaddy has no idea how long the goodwill of vounteer contributors can last. "Every day we wait to see what we get . . . I have such a positive attitude. It all boils down to people who really care."

About 40 percent of the food she doles out comes from the Maryland Food Bank, which last year gathered 5.5 million pounds of damaged or dated food which was edible but would have been thrown away. That food was distributed to about 425 places statewide—churches, soup kitchens, halfway houses, housing projects, shelters for battered women, emergency food pantries—for a service charge of 9 cents a pound.

Not all the food that could be saved is being saved, said Ann Miller, who runs the food bank. "Americans throw out over 60 million tons of edible food a year, 20 percent of the food supply, and we're rescuing a very small piece of that."

The food bank gets edible but unsalable food from the supermarkets every week, and workers visit the farmers' market on Pratt street every Sunday to retrieve what the farmers don't want to take home.

Because the food bank is part of Second Harvest, a national group devoted to reducing food waste, it sometimes gets shipments from other states. For example, the Maryland Food Bank shared in a huge load of potatoes from Providence, R.I., that had been rejected from a potato chip factory because they were the wrong size.

Ms. Miller said the volunteer community doesn't now and never will be able to take care of all the people who need food.

"As the economy improves, I am sure there will be people who have jobs, but there are a lot of people who cannot be reemployed if they are not retrained. Who knows how long it will take and who will do it? Where will the money come from?"

"And there are plenty of women and children who need help who will keep on needing help. That's true for a large number of old people as well. I'm afraid there never will be a time when people don't need food from somewhere."

The food bank is trying to encourage churches and other groups in Baltimore to contribute. In one neighborhood last month, six churches joined to begin a Monday through Friday evening soup kitchen at Steuart Hill Elementary School, Gilmore and Lombard streets.

The night it opened, 75 persons showed up to eat fish sticks and a grilled-cheese or peanut butter sandwich.

Sister Josanna is convinced that without soup kitchens, some people would be very hungry. Elderly people, she said, show up most often at the end of the month when their Social Security money has run out and some apologize for coming.

Mr. Houbolt blames the need for soup kitchens on the federal government. "The food policies are absurd," he says. "The government spends $16 billion on food programs and $22 billion paying farmers not to produce food. What is the logic?

"A lot of countries cope with unemployment without having to resort to dismal soup kitchens. Japan and West Germany, two of the most successful economies in the capitalist world, appropriate a significant percentage of resources to guaranteeing people a good standard of living. It doesn't destroy the economy. In fact, it complements an overall healthy society."

People running the food programs do not expect radical solutions, but some of them say they believe a Democratic president would ease the load.

EASING HUNGER: THE WORLD MUST MAKE ITS CHOICES

(By Tom Horton)

There are choices to be made.

If present trends in world hunger continue for 20 years, some problems will be solved and the number of severely undernourished people will grow from 450 million to 685 million.

In the same period, according to an "optimistic but feasible" scenario, the 450 million figure can be cut in half, Third World food production can be doubled, and the bill will be about $2 trillion.

That is the view of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization in a study that examines the prospects for combating world hunger through 2000.

The solutions, at least until then, FAO says, involve "nothing new . . . more of what we already know." The magnitude and difficulty of the problem are such, however, that making significant headway will require "almost a revolution."

The 117 developing countries, if they redirected their investments to make agriculture their top priority, could by themselves generate more than 80 percent of the massive investment FAO says is needed—it works out to more than $100 billion a year.

The world's affluent countries would need to kick in an average of $18 billion a year, which would require such aid to increase more than twice as fast as called for by current U.N. goals and would be more than triple the $5 billion a year the rich countries now spend on Third World agricultural development.

About a third of the increased food production envisioned in the FAO scenario would result from farming more land, expanding irrigation and planting more than one crop a year. Much of the remaining two-thirds would come from higher yields, gained largely through tripling pesticide use and quintupling commercial fertilizer applications.

This vastly expanded use of petroleum-based chemicals, along with more use of machinery, would make Third World agriculture five times as dependent on energy in 2000, FAO estimates. That is a daunting prospect in many of the poorest countries in view of the already crushing burden of oil imports.

"The oil burden is simply the toughest nut many of these countries have to crack," said a Western development expert in east Africa, because "unlike developed countries, their need is not to cut back on energy use—they need to use many times more if their economies are to get going."

Tanzania illustrates the dilemma. In order to pay for a tanker of Arab oil to keep its near-bankrupt economy lurching along, the government recently let slide repayment of $2.5 million in interest on a U.S. development-aid loan. In doing so, it violated a congressional edict, and the United States has had to cut off all new development aid to Tanzania.

Solutions to these difficulties—the needs for more investment and more help for food production—are relatively straightforward, "a matter of political will," FAO says.

"If you are talking just about the technical problems, you can turn agricultural production around radically in most places in a relatively short time, says five years," said an expert with the U.S. Agency for International Development.

The problem of hunger, however, is imbedded in a far broader context, the experts agree, perhaps no continent illustrates this better than Africa, which alone among the world's economic regions has actually slipped in its ability to feed itself during a decade of unparalleled attention to solving the hunger problem.

"The truth is that governments in Africa have been ripping off agriculture," said Christopher Delgado, of the Institute for Food Policy Research in Washington, a think tank that deals with long-range hunger issues.

"You have a number of recently independent nations, with most of their people still in rural, subsistence agriculture, who have put the bulk of their investments into trying to promote rapid growth of a modern, non-agriculture sector . . . subsidizing urban populations, increasing their imports while their own production is declining.

"I don't see that most African governments yet realize the route to sustained economic development is through a productive agriculture," Mr. Delgado said. "In the struggle going on for limited resources, agriculture is losing, and it needs top priority."

Graham Donaldson, a World Bank economist, said, "We see two sets of determinants why Africa has been going backward.

"They have screwed up the frame within which the rural economy works, setting unreal ceiling prices on food in an attempt to keep it cheap, destroying any price incentive for farmers.

"And they have neglected the markets, the distribution networks, the farm credit systems, standard weights and measures, the trained manpower . . . all the things you must have to employ better food production technology."

Beyond these constraints to seriously reducing hunger, the experts say, are social problems. For example, FAO calls the huge percentage of poor people who do not own land "the most important priority for social change in most developing countries" if hunger is to be attacked.

A recent six-nation study by the U.N. International Labor Organization estimated that equal distribution of land among all rural families would raise food output from 10 percent to 80 percent, depending on the country.

FAO estimates that redistributing 5 percent of the farmland in India could reduce rural poverty by 30 percent. An important corollary to land reform, this study noted, was providing equal access to water. "Most irrigation projects have tended to favor big farmers," FAO said.

Such redistribution of the basic resources of food production has made scant progress in many of the areas that need it most, notably Latin America and parts of Asia, yet FAO says there are enough success stories like China, South Korea, Hungary and Japan to show how it can be done.

A second major priority, especially in populous, land-scarce Asia, is creating jobs outside agriculture, according to the FAO study, which notes: "Food production is as much a function of purchasers' ability to pay farmers as it is technology."

Up to 2000, the FAO scenario envisions no need for "startlingly new technological breakthroughs" to feed the world's hungry. Beyond that, however, population growth begins to push more ominously against some hard limits like land and water.

Theoretically, the world could produce enough food for any conceivable level of population.

The United Nations, in a study prepared for a conference last month in Rome, estimates that if all the potentially cultivatable land in the world's 117 developing countries was farmed at a level of production equal to the best U.S. agriculture, even the poor world could feed 25 percent more people than it would have to even at the highest population projections extending through the end of the Twenty-first Century.

Aside from the unlikely prospects for ultra-modernizing all agriculture, however, such aggregate numbers are so misleading as to be almost meaningless, the study acknowledges.

For example, even if such maximum levels of agricultural production were attained in the poor world, it would still not be evenly distributed among the 117 nations. There would still be 19 countries that could not feed even their turn-of-the-century populations, let alone the numbers who would be living there in a century. An additional 18 countries could just feed their populations in 2000 at maximum production.

Therefore, although the total food production in the developing world would make it seem self-sufficient, actually linking the people with the food "would presuppose massive movements of food and probably also population on a scale that seems barely feasible," the U.N. study concludes.

World population is now about 4.7 billion, three-quarters of it in the developing nations. By 2050, it will be 90 percent of the way toward what 90 percent of the way toward what the United Nations projects will be a peak of more than 10 billion, and 85 percent of all these people will be in the 117 developing nations.

These staggering additions to population (speculative, since they are only projections of current trends) will mean "there can be no respite for another 75-100 years from the need to continue increasing world [food] output year by year," FAO says.

The problem is more severe than that, the agency adds, since to be effective in combating hunger, the need of that increased output will have to occur in the resource-poor developing countries, where most of the population will be.

This sort of future, combined with a growing pessimism about repeating big, relatively quick leaps in food supplies like the Green Revolution of the 1960s, leads an increasing number of international development authorities to reexamine population—the "demand side" of the hunger equation.

Lester Brown, of the Worldwatch Institute, a Washington think tank on the global environment, is a leading exponent of the need to control demand for food as well as promoting supply.

He argues that it is imperative for the world to hold its population at about 6.5 billion rather than simply accept its eventual peaking at about 10 billion, "if widespread misery is to be avoided."

It would not be an easy undertaking, he concedes, but he cites examples of huge and populous countries like China, which have shown it is possible to reverse high population growth rates radically in a decade or less.

"Only in the last few weeks have I begun to see the same kind of thinking being stated by major aid donors like the World Bank," he said. "In most of the poorest countries there's been little progress."

Mr. Brown is also skeptical of those who put all their faith in technological leaps to increase yields, or who look at the huge acreages of unused land in places like Africa and Latin America and assume they can be used to erase any conceivable food deficits.

Also, the extent and implications of environmental problems such as soil erosion are only beginning to be widely appreciated, Mr. Brown and most agricultural experts feel.

Even in the world breadbasket of North America, there are serious concerns that producing grain at the present level of intensity is causing loss of irreplaceable topsoil at a rate that will seriously reduce fertility and yields in the next few decades.

Long-term studies in the United States cited by Mr. Brown show that eroded soils have yields 30 percent less than and four times as variable (depending on moisture) as less marginal soils.

In most of the world, the land that is now not farmed is generally the more marginal land. Bringing it into production will help, but not as much as some people think, writes Terry Barr, of the USDA's World Outlook Agricultural Board.

"It seems clear that with use of more marginal land, higher-yielding plant varieties [heavily dependent on] limited water resources, the world is forming an increasingly susceptible production base, one that will afford excellent production with good weather, but sharply lower with bad weather," he said.

"This increased volatility will generate increased problems. . . ."

In some of the developing countries, soil erosion has already worsened to an alarming extent, and it is being exacerbated by continuing deforestation as poor people cut trees for fuel far faster than they are being replanted.

FAO estimates that current rates of deforestation—which show almost no signs of being reversed on a significant scale—will leave three billion people without "enough fuel to cook their food properly" by the end of this century.

Even as the FAO's scenario for halving world hunger sounds an urgent plea for nearly tripling foreign development aid to the poor countries, aid donors are reassessing their policies of the last decade in light of widespread failures to make a dent in hunger in places like Africa.

"Basically, many of the donors here are standing back and saying, 'we goofed,'" said a Western government official in Tanzania, which has shown declining per capita food production and income despite receiving more per capita development aid than any other African nation.

There is increasing pressure on the Tanzanians and other lagging governments in Africa from foreign aid donors like the World Bank and AID to concentrate on development policies that favor agriculture.

"The Tanzanians are aware of what they need to do, and they are talking about it, but it's too soon to tell if they are going to be able, politically, to reform their agriculture," said one knowledgeable official here.

Food aid to the developing world also seems likely to remain vital to solving hunger for the foreseeable future. It is currently in what one FAO study calls a state of "quasi-stagnation," however.

The United States, in just the last few months, has begun to use its enormous surplus of dairy products, in addition to the traditional grain surpluses, as food aid, but so far it is scarcely more than a dent in the 2.6 billion pounds of milk, cheese and butter in government surplus stores.

This year, about 200,000 pounds of dairy products have been distributed as food aid. The government would like to triple that in 1984, according to Jose Rodriquez, of AID's Food for Peace program.

As with most food aid, Mr. Rodriquez said, it is not as simple as just shipping it.

Except for aid during crises, recipient nations have to pay for and provide distribution of the food from their ports, and in many cases their capacity to handle larger amounts of such aid cannot be rapidly increased.

There has been considerable progress in giving advance warning to the food-rich nations on where their aid will be needed next to help ward off famine, FAO says.

From Rome, the U.N. agency runs a global early warning system that monitors everything from drought to locust hordes to natural disasters. For example, by August of this year, FAO's monitoring had assured it that by sometime this winter, the Sahelian states of northern Africa will have a crop failure to rival that of the famine in 1974 that killed hundreds of thousands—perhaps millions—of people and was an impetus to start the early warning system.

"It doesn't mean people won't die, but we will have a six-month headstart over 1974 in handling it," said an FAO planner in Rome.

A factor often ignored in dealing with world hunger is that it is not only population growth that drives demand for more food. The urge for more varied and higher quality diets as people gain even a little more wealth can be a powerful factor, FAO experts say.

"For example, a big unanswered question for Africa is that countries, by subsidizing food imports for their growing urban populations have created a rapidly rising demand for wheat," says D. F. Bommer, an agricultural technology official with FAO.

"This is a problem in attaining food self-sufficiency, as wheat can't be grown in most of Africa. Also, maize is replacing millet in some local diets there, and millet is more drought-resistant."

Many of the critical decisions in a stepped-up assault on reducing world hunger by 2000 "must be taken within the next few years," given the lag time in implementing new agricultural and economic developments, the FAO said in its study Agriculture: Toward 2000.

That study was published nearly three years ago, and none of the dozens of people interviewed for this article felt that progress since then has been nearly fast enough to meet the goal of halving the number of hungry by century's end.

African Village's Daily Life Haunted by Specter of Famine

(By Tom Horton)

Sasagila, Tanzania.—When health workers from the nearby Anglican missionary hospital asked the 315 families in this remote village what was foremost on their minds, 63 percent said famine.

The survey came only a month after the annual June harvest, but slightly more than half the families had less than three bushels of millet apiece to last them for the next 11 months. Now many of the men have scattered to other regions desperate for work to buy additional food.

Nearly a fifth of the children here under 5 years old—the age at which proper nutrition is most critical to prevent permanent health damange—are "severely malnourished" (a child of 2, weighing about 20 pounds, was typical of these); and more than half of those under 5 are not gettting enough to sustain proper growth.

Of the young children in Sasagila and in eight nearby villages in the survey, about one in 30 are dying of disease (compared to one in 1,000 in industrialized countries). Often the disease is termed "directly attributable to malnutrition"—that is, the children starved to death.

For all this, perhaps the most unsettling thing about Sasagila is that its situation is not extreme. Rather, it is all too typical of the complex, contradictory, frustrating and seemingly intractable situation in which the great majority of Africa's 72 million malnourished people find themselves.

Tanzania, climatically, is nothing like northern Africa's Sahelian desert zones, or like eroded, deforested Ethiopia—places where harsh enivironmental conditions dictate chronic hunger and, sometimes, the famine with its heart-rending starvation that is the stuff of relief agencies' fund-raising pictures.

Indeed, for most of its history Tanzania was a food exporter. It has the widely acknowledged potential to be one of this hungry continent's breadbaskets. And to devleop that capacity it has for more than a decade received the highest per capita foreign aid of any nation in Africa.

All of this has made so little progress toward filling bellies in places like Sasagila, however, that major aid donors are asking painful questions of themselves and governments all across Africa as to what went wrong.

Even though Sasagila and surrounding villages are in Tanzania's most drought-prone area, the farmers all say that most years the rains would support larger crops.

It would take minimal modern technology, like animal-drawn plows, fertilizer and pesticides, but Tanzania and other African nations have directed much of their development aid into creating industries and subsidizing relatively small but politically more powerful urban populations while neglecting to build a solid agricultural base.

Equally disastrous here, international development experts say, have been artificially low grain prices set by the government-controlled National Milling Company.

Farmers, even in the best grain-growing areas, have little incentive to produce at more than subsistence levels, and if they do, they sell much of the crop illegally on the blackmarket to surrounding countries.

Overriding even that is the fact that Tanzania, which must pay staggering portions of its income for imported oil, is virtually bankrupt.

Last month crops lay in the fields in some regions because the National Milling Company did not have gunny sacks to bag it. Where there were enough gunny sacks, there were truck shortages. If trucks were available, there were shortages of tires and spare parts.

For two months recently, women in Sasagila spent all their time waiting to get water from the trickle that ran from the town well. Its pump motor was broken and could not be fixed because there were no parts in the country.

At that, the town was luckier than many of its neighbors, whose people walk most of the day to and from the nearest water holes.

"As you can see, it is a little difficult to talk about these people doing development projects when they have to spend all their time just getting water," said Joy Chitenge, a relief worker familiar with the villages here.

The hunger problem here is more complex than mere physical shortages. For example, Sasagila's 315 families own more than 4,600 cattle and goats, according to the church survey.

That is not an uncommon number, and even though the survey shows ownership is uneven—60 percent to 80 percent of families have no cattle; some own as many as 1,000—it is still a large potential source of protein in an area that badly needs it.

But rural Tanzanians, for variety of cultural reasons, seldom butcher cattle, despite recent attempts to persuade them to reduce herd sizes. (In one village near Sasagila, cattle herds have overgrazed, and now have to be pastured so far away the village can no longer use their manure for vital fertilizer.)

"Cattle are an existential object to those people, their reservoir of wealth, their guarantee of security in an area where you can never depend on crops from year to year," said Dr. M.K.S. Matomora, a Tanzanian community health doctor who works in the nine villages surveyed.

"It is not so easy or mechanical as going to someone's house and saying, 'Look, you have 30, 40 cattle and two malnourished kids; sell a couple.' And of course many people couldn't afford the meat if it were available."

The government has attempted to promote grape-raising as a way of giving the region's villages a source of income, but here, too, prices have been low and essential elements—from fertilizer to the simplest technical advice—have been lacking.

"I think you have to have general economic development of Tanzania before you can improve the microclimate," Dr. Matomora says. "You can't just pick a village here and there out of an ocean of despairing villages and expect it to prosper."

Meanwhile, Sasagila presses on. Fields are already being cleared and hoed by hand from morning to late evening in preparation for planting after the rains begin in December or January Everyone hopes this will be a good year. And if not?

"Well, as always, there are a lot of kids here in Sasagila that can't be said, really, to be starving to death, but they aren't getting enough to maintain health either," said Rajabu Alli, the rural medical aid person here.

"And if measles comes along, or another poor harvest . . . then some just die. They are always on that margin. There's never room for error."●

A TRIBUTE TO SENATOR CHURCH

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, on January 15, 1984, at All Souls Church in New York City, the Reverend Dr. F. Forrester Church preached a remarkable sermon whose text was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 23 by our distinguished colleague from New York (Senator MOYNIHAN.). One could not help but be struck by the eloquence of Reverend Church's words, which were in large measure a tribute to his father, our former colleague from Idaho, Senator Frank Church. Reverend Church's moving sermon was also an admirable reflection of Senator Church: of his devotion to his family; of his distinguished service to the Nation in this body over the course of 24 years; of his high principles, his profound sense of public responsibility; of his intelligence, his wisdom, and his courage.

One week later, on January 22, there appeared in the Washington Post a column by the widely-respected political columnist, David Broder, under the title, "Frank Church's Challenge." Mr. Broder, like Reverend Church, took note of Senator Church's serious illness. Like Reverend Church, but from the very different perspective of the seasoned political observer, Mr. Broder paid his own tribute to Senator Church. I ask that Mr. Broder's column, which reminds us movingly again of Senator Church's extraordinary wisdom and courage, of his unstinting service to our Nation, be reprinted in its entirety.

The material follows:

FRANK CHURCH'S CHALLENGE

"The stupidity of it!" former senator Frank Church of Idaho exclaimed.

We were sitting in his Washington law office a few weeks ago, and when we had finished with the topic I had come to discuss, the conversation swung to foreign policy. The former chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee began speaking with such passion that I had trouble keeping up with my notes.

I pulled out those notes the other day when I read that Church was in a New York hospital after exploratory surgery for a serious, perhaps life-threatening, illness.

Over the years, I had watched Church in some dramatic moments: during the civil rights debates in the 1950s, when he played a key role; in a Democratic convention keynote speech; an Idaho reelection campaign; and in his try for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1976. But sitting in his law office, interviewing Church for the first time since he lost his Senate seat in 1980, what I remembered was a dinner he organized for a group of reporters in a Capitol Hill restaurant about 1964.

American forces were in Vietnam, but the issue was certainly not at the top of the nation's consciousness. In fact, the reason for the dinner seminar, as I recall, was that Church had been unable to interest Sen. J. W. Fulbright, then chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, in holding public hearings on Vietnam.

Church's guest at the dinner was Hans J. Morgenthau of the Unviersity of Chicago, an authority on foreign policy. The two men tried their best to make a largely skeptical group of reporters reexamine the prevailing assumptions about Vietnam. The struggle taking place there, they asserted, was not aggression by proxy from China or Moscow but an indigenous revolution, led by a man—Ho Chi Minh—who appeared to be the only authentic Vietnamese leader on the scene.

The French had tried and failed to halt that revolution by military intervention. If Americans were so steadfastly ignorant of the anti-colonial forces at work in that part of the world that we went down the path the French had followed, Church and Morgenthau said, then we would pay a terrible price.

I went home thoroughly unconvinced that night, but had many occasions in the next dozen years to recollect the warning.

There was the same passion in Church's voice as we talked in his law office as there had been that night, almost 20 years ago. He knew he was ill and indicated in the conversation that it might be serious. But more than the gravity that fact imparted to his words, it was the recollection of the earlier occasion that gave them weight.

"Remember," Church said, "how many years we pursued stupid policies in Asia, based on ignorance and an irrelevant ideological view of the world. The stupidity of it! All those years of trying to 'contain' China, a pygmy nation beset by problems of its own. And then we finally woke up one day and recognized the reality, through the eyes of two very unlikely witnesses, Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger.

"Yet we seem unable to learn from the failure of our Vietnam policy, or the equally evident failure of our hard-line policy toward Castro in Cuba. It is this idea that the communist threat is everywhere that had made our government its captive and its victim.

"Somehow, some day, this country has got to learn to live with revolution in the Third World. It's endemic. It's relatively easy to suppress revolution in Grenada, so we congratulate ourselves. It's more difficult to suppress it in Nicaragua or Central America, so we fret about that. But it will be impossible when it comes to Brazil or Argentina.

"This country has become so conservative—so fearful—that we have come to see revolution anywhere in the world as a threat to the United States. It's nonsense. And yet that policy we have followed has cost us so many lives, so much treasure, such setbacks to our vital interests, as a great power ought not to endure.

"Until we learn to live with revolution, we will continue to blunder, and it will work to the Soviets' advantage. It will put them on the winning side, while we put ourselves on the side of rotten, corrupt regimes that end up losing.

"And each time one of those regimes is overthrown, it feeds the paranoia in this country about the spread of communism. It furthers the premise of the national security state, which means more militarism, more censorship, more spending, more deficits—and more casualties.

"The thing that is so discouraging is that no one seems to challenge the premise of our policy. What does it matter to us, really, the nature of the government in Lebanon? And yet we've reached the point in Lebanon where our troops are hostage and we can't even define their mission."

There was more—but I think those lines suggest the challenge Frank Church was raising. Considering the source—and the circumstances of his life—it is a challenge worth pondering.●

THE WORLD'S MONETARY AND TRADE (NON)SYSTEMS

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in my view, Mr. Willard C. Butcher, chairman, the Chase Manhattan Bank, made some most useful comments in the continuing national debate over trade and international monetary affairs in a speech delivered during the American Enterprise Institute's public policy week on December 8, 1983. I ask that those remarks be printed in the RECORD so that my colleagues may have the opportunity to analyze the significant points he makes.

The remarks follow:

(Willard C. Butcher)

Thank you, President Ford. We all knew that you were a "Distinguished Fellow" long before the American Enterprise Institute made it official. I know that I speak for Americans throughout the nation when I express sincere gratitude that you have remained active in public affairs, serving the Republic in such forums as this, cultivating public awareness of the key issues facing us as a nation.

In a similar vein, I hope that I might add something useful to the national debate over trade and international monetary affairs. I am frankly convinced that our present policies in both areas have gotten us into serious trouble. And if the underlying issues are not addressed, the situation will continue to deteriorate.

I trust the AEI won't expunge my name from its mailing list, if anything I say here today fails to meet the test of orthodoxy. But I am persuaded that these basic, systemic problems are too urgent and too complex to be left for eventual working out through ideological purity. As one Michigan legislator (not Gerald Ford) once announced to his colleagues, "The time comes when you have to lay principle aside and do what's right."

I believe, for example, in the principle of free trade—provided, of course, that our trading partners believe in it, too—strongly enough to practice it.

I believe in the principle of free flowing international investment—provided it does not distort exchange rates, thus eroding U.S. exports and the fundamental strength of our economy.

Even long-standing principles need reappraisal—when they don't work. The principles, for example, that are supposed to govern the world's money flows need immediate attention, because they no longer do what they were intended to do—facilitate world trade. A continuing U.S. recovery depends on a broad global recovery built on a balanced expansion of world trade. And that is impossible with an international monetary system that isn't functioning properly.

On August 15, 1971, President Nixon in effect, ended the Bretton Woods exchange rate system by severing the U.S. dollar's ties to gold. It was expected that currency values would adjust to levels that reflect the underlying strength or weakness of each country's trade balance. But it isn't working that way.

If currency values were really responding to trade patterns, the dollar would be weak and the yen strong, because Japan enjoys a massive surplus in its bilateral trade account with the U.S. The Commerce Department estimates that our worldwide merchandise trade deficit—which set new record highs in the second and third quarters—will be up around $60 billion this year. Of that total, more than a third will be with Japan—alone.

In the face of continuing trade deficits with Japan, the dollar should have been falling in value against the yen. Instead, it's risen by 30 percent since 1979.

This overvaluation of the dollar has made vital segments of American industry uncompetitive, by making our goods too expensive to buy abroad and foreign-made goods so cheap they undersell comparable American-made products here at home. And anyone who thinks the U.S. trade deficit is offset by favorable balances in our service and investment accounts, should be aware that the U.S. has just recorded its largest quarterly overall current account deficit in history—nearly $10 billion! And there's no turnaround in sight.

The reason that currency values no longer reflect changing trade patterns is that the system has been overwhelmed by capital and short-term money flows that are unrelated to trade. Currency values are now a function of these flows. And they are massive.

Take the volume of foreign exchange transactions, including spots, swaps, forward and futures contracts turned over by large U.S. banks and brokers. The Federal Reserve Bank of New York reports that for the single month of April, this year, the dollar value came to about $560 billion. That works out to something like $27 billion each trading day or roughly $6.7 trillion a year. At the same time, U.S. merchandise trade volumes—imports and exports—were running about $37 billion a month or well under half a trillion a year. In other words foreign exchange contracts are overpowering trade transactions by more than 15-to-1. In New York there are $180 billion of international dollar transfers a day. Clearly not all of these involve a foreign exchange contract but they all could. They reflect a free choice not to convert into another currency. So whether the ratio is 15-to-1 or 25-to-1 the facts strongly indicate that money transactions are overwhelming trade transactions.

Under these circumstances, it's hardly surprising that the monetary system is unresponsive to changing trade patterns.

Whether that flood of foreign money is driven here by perceived political and economic uncertainties elsewhere in the world, or is enticed here by our generally higher interest rates, it ends up in dollar-denominated assets, driving up the dollar's exchange value, and making it harder for American producers to sell their goods and services.

U.S. manufacturers are told to fight back by cutting waste, slimming down, getting more efficient. That's always good advice. And they're doing it But the benefits are automatically wiped out by the dollar's upward float.

For an American manufacturer, trying to compete against the incoming tide of capital that's lifting the dollar is like jumping into the deck pool on the QE-2 and swimming east, while the ship is steaming west. No matter how good a shape he's in, or how hard he strokes toward Southampton, he is still going to end up in New York!

Clearly, it is time to consider how to reform the world monetary system so that it will go back to doing what it's supposed to do—facilitate trade.

What options have been proposed? The first is to do nothing—that is, just continue enjoying low-cost imports while our basic industries continue to erode. That may work for a small economy like Switzerland with only one major industry—but does America really need 234 million bankers?

Some say we should go back to the gold standard with fixed exchange rates. But the global economy has grown too large and dynamic. There simply isn't enough gold in the world to serve as the basis for today's world economy. The economy would simply sail away, dragging its gold anchor behind it. And, if we tried to counter this fact by periodically repricing gold by fiat, that would undermine the very discipline that the gold standard is supposed to impose.

Others proposed all-out protectionism—slamming the door on imports until we get our trade deficit back into balance and restricting the inflow of foreign capital to deflate the dollar's exchange value. But reciprocal actions by our trading partners would very likely abort recovery and nudge the world toward an isolationist dead-end.

But with nearly 20 percent of our goods and services sold abroad, over 12 million Americans working on some aspect of foreign business, 40 percent of our farm produce exported, and nearly one third of all U.S. corporate profits coming from international trade and investment, just picking up our marbles and going home is no remedy for what ails us.

Direct government intervention has been proposed to stabilize exchange rates, but last summer when several governments purchased $3 billion worth of other currencies to slow the dollar's rise, the effects washed out in a couple of weeks. Given the $27 billion of foreign exchange transactions every day, one has to raise the question: "How large a fund would be required to stabilize rates?"

Dual exchange rates have also been tried in Great Britain, Belgium, France, Italy and Latin America—with one set of managed exchange rates for current account transactions, while capital transactions float free and find their own rates. There are in reality two different dollars today—one for the value of goods and one as a financial haven. Either we will have to bring the two values closer together, or learn to live with formal dual rates, as such.

Those are the main options and, frankly, I have serious doubts that any of them will be able to restore fundamental equilibrium to our economy, so long as we continue to think of our trade deficit as the entire problem—and to imagine that some sort of manipulation of the international system is going to fix it.

I would argue that the nation's basic ills derive from two deficits—not one. The trade deficit and the budget deficit. And neither one is going to be corrected, if we depend totally on some marginal adjustments in monetary policies to do the job.

Indeed, I believe our economy is far too complex for any one "ism" to be successful—whether it be supply side economics or monetarism. We ask too much of monetary policy and the central bankers of the world. Their efforts for monetary discipline have to be supplemented by increased effort for fiscal discipline.

The first place to look—it bears repeating—is U.S. fiscal policy. We have got to get government spending under control again. Over the past three years, Washington has been spending about 12 percent more each year, while nominal GNP has been growing about 8 percent. We can't continue to spend the nation's wherewithal 50 percent faster than we produce it. And the way to reduce $200 billion deficits that are keeping up U.S. interest rates, inflating the exchange value of the dollar, and making U.S. goods uncompetitive, is not another taxing spree.

If we look back at the Kennedy administration, we see that the government took in 19 percent of GNP in taxes and spent about 19 percent. We are still taking in 19 percent in taxes—even after the so-called Reagan tax cuts. Unfortunately we are now spending 25 percent of GNP. And therein lies the problem. The culprit is spending not taxes. While it may be necessary to make some tax compromises along the way, the solution must lie primarily with reducing the level of government spending.

Another vital policy initiative for the U.S. is to help our Latin American neighbors get back on their own feet, so they can reopen and expand their markets for U.S. exports. I am not a disinterested party, I grant you. But it is not only bankers—it is all Americans—who have a major investment in those economies. As recently as 1981, Mexico absorbed almost $18 billion of U.S. exports. Brazil took $4 billion. Argentina, $2 billion. Latin America, overall, consumed more than $40 billion of products made by U.S. workers. But from first quarter 1982 to first quarter 1983, about 40 percent of that buying stopped.

That translates to a lot of lost jobs for U.S. workers and is a big chunk of our trade problem. This is why the IMF funding bill was important and why this nation's continued attention to the economies of this hemisphere should be a major priority for us.

The biggest chunk of our trade deficit, is with Japan. That's a special matter that needs special attention. Clearly, several steps must be taken. There is a need for restraint on the part of the Japanese on their exports here. There's a need to pursue monetary policies in Japan that would make the exit of money from Japan to the United States less attractive. There's a need to open the Japanese market. And there's a need for Japan to liberalize investment rules and ease capital controls.

The final area in which I believe we should be more supportive of our export manufacturing sector is in the Eximbank.

Just consider for a moment the total value of all exports for which the Eximbank and it's four major foreign counterparts provided key credits, guarantees or insurance assistance last year. While Eximbank—representing the largest economy in the world—was providing less than $11 billion worth, Hermes in Germany provided $16.5 billion; Coface in France gave over $27 billion; ECGD in the U.K., nearly $33 billion; and EXIMBANK of Japan, $47 billion!

Looked at as a share of each country's total exports, only 5 percent of ours got assistance, while more than a third of Japan's exports benefited.

I submit that it isn't fair—and it isn't right—to ask American companies to compete at such a glaring disadvantage—to say nothing of the tariff and non-tariff barriers they must confront, even after the overvalued dollar and inequitable subsidies have been surmounted. I'm for free trade, but that clearly must mean fair trade. We in the United States have to work for fairer trade on the part of all of our trading partners. We have to pursue economic policies here at home that will minimize distortions to the value of the dollar. We have to provide assistance to our exporters. And we have to be concerned about the health of potential buyers of American goods—the developing nations.

The policy mix I've outlined does not pass anyone's test of orthodoxy. But I believe it is a pragmatic approach for strengthening our economy and nation.●

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, on May 11, 1983, I introduced legislation (S. 1256) to reauthorize a separate program of funding for public school desegregation. I did so in response to the devastating loss of Federal desegregation funding incurred by local school districts 1 year after implementation of President Reagan's chapter 2 education block grant. School districts receiving funds under the Emergency School Aid Act, a categorical program of desegregation assistance that was folded into the education block grant in the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981, suffered an 83-percent funding reduction between fiscal year 1981 and fiscal year 1982.

The loss of Federal desegregation assistance is a national disgrace. The Emergency School Aid Act was not a frill; it was not an option; it was legislation that helped the Nation overcome a constitutional crisis when the Federal Government mandated an end to segregation in our public schools.

The legislation I introduced has the bipartisan support of 21 Senate cosponsors. A similar measure has already passed the House by an overwhelming margin. Nevertheless, the Reagan administration remains vehemently opposed to any restoration of funding for school desegregation, voluntary or otherwise.

At this time, I would like to share with my colleagues a newspaper article and two editorials that focus on the issue of the Federal Government's role in school desegregation.

Two recent New York Times editorials contrast the Reagan administration's rhetoric on voluntary desegregation and magnet school programs with its record of strident opposition to Federal support for these efforts. In addition, an article written by Virginia Robinson for Education Times provides an overview of congressional action to restore the Federal Government's commitment to school desegregation. Her article also documents the findings of a report commissioned by the U.S. Education Department's Office of Planning, Budget, and Evaluation on magnet schools and desegregations. Not surprisingly, the conclusions of the study, which found that magnet schools can have a significant impact on both educational achievement and the success of systemwide desegregation plans, have not been widely distributed by the Department.

During the coming months the Senate will focus its attention on a variety of concerns. It is my hope that my colleagues will find the time to address the issues of educational equity and excellence, which is a matter of great importance to millions of parents and children across the country. The need for Federal involvement in public school desegregation continues; it cannot be ignored; it will not dissipate. It is, indeed, our constitutional responsibility to afford equal educational opportunities to all of our Nation's schoolchildren.

Mr. President, I ask that the full text of the Education Times article and the New York Times editorials be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

[From Education Times, Jan. 30, 1984]

HOUSE, SENATE BILLS WOULD GIVE NEW FEDERAL DESEGREGATION AID

A bill to create a new Emergency School Aid Act, which its Senate sponsors will try to add as an amendment to the first education bill that comes up in this session of Congress, is close in spirit to a bill (H.R. 2207) passed by the House of Representatives with strong bipartisan support last June (Education Times, June 13).

Like the House bill, the new legislation being introduced by Sens. Daniel Moynihan, D-N.Y., Thomas Eagleton, D-Mo., and Senate education leader Robert Stafford, Vt., would reauthorize the old Emergency School Aid Act and make it a free-standing categorical grant program.

Also like the House bill, the Senate proposal would remove desegregation aid from the Chapter 2 block grant into which Congress folded it in 1981.

Although they keep the ESAA name, the two bills differ considerably from the old ESAA, which gave school districts federal aid for desegregation for 10 years, from 1972 to 1982.

In a change from the old Emergency School Aid Act, the new proposals would allow local school districts to apply for grants directly to the U.S. Department of Education, and there would be no allocations of funds by states on the basis of minority population, as was true under the old law. The bills indicate that grants are to be well distributed geographically.

In deciding who gets grants, both bills say voluntary plans are to get the same preference as court-ordered desegregation, but priority will go to the most recently adopted plans and to school districts that most need the money.

The new legislation also eliminates many special types of grants, including television programming, which were allowed under the old law.

Both bills come up with pretty much the same spending authorization—approximately $100 million a year.

The House bill carefully specifies that whatever funds are appropriated for desegregation under the new law will not be subtracted from the block grant, which would continue to get at least 95 percent of what it got the previous year.

The Senate bill as proposed has no such guarantee, though it relates ESAA funding to the block grant, saying the authorized appropriation for the new program would be "an amount not to exceed 22 percent" of what Chapter 2 got in the preceding year. For fiscal 1984, the sponsors point out, that would be roughly $100 million (22 percent of the $450.6 million Chapter 2 1984 state allocation).

Both bills say school districts are eligible for grants if they are planning or carrying out desegregation plans, court-ordered or voluntary, including "metropolitan" or interdistrict plans.

Both bills put magnet schools high on the list of activities school districts could carry out with their ESAA funds and say districts also could spend their money for compensatory education, staff training, community relations, and "innovative activities in which minority and nonminority children participate together."

Both bills specify that none of the federal funds can be used for busing.

Under both the House and Senate bills, school districts wouldn't be eligible for ESAA funds if they discriminate in hiring, promoting or assigning employees, or if they assign students to classes in such a way as to separate minority group children.

MAGNETS FOR DESEGREGATION?

To bolster the case for renewing ESAA, Sen. Moynihan's office urges attention to a federally funded report on magnet schools and desegregation which has been given low-key distribution by the U.S. Education Department's Office of Planning, Budget and Evaluation since its release last November.

The report, prepared by Abt Associates, Inc., under subcontract to James Lowry Associates, examined 15 unidentified school districts which have magnet schools.

The report concluded that magnet schools themselves are usually integrated, but conceded that magnet schools aid desgregation systemwide most when they are part of a general program which includes pairing, rezoning, two-way busing and mandatory pupil assignment—the usual techniques of school desegregation—and strong staff commitment to both magnets and desgregation. The report also said magnets help reduce white flight.

The report found magnet schools less expensive than is commonly believed, saying the extra per puple cost in the startup year is usually not more than $200, a figure which dorps sharply in following years to something like $59 per pupil.

The report also took on the charge of "elitism" often levelled at magnet schools, saying most magnets don't have highly selective admissions policies but rely on high student motivation and the "themes" around which the schools are built to boost academic achievement.

What Moynihan likes best about the report, and what probably accounts for its so-far limited distribution by the Education Department, is its positive view of the Emergency School Aid Act, which it credits with "helping districts plan and implement [magnet] programs and bear necessary startup and early operational costs."

"ESAA funds," the report said, "typically allowed magnet schools a great deal of flexibility in programming that helped make the schools unique, e.g. part-time professionals, equipment, special activities, curriculum development."

The report noted that federal funds for magnets and other desegregation activities dropped from a high of $398.5 million from ESAA in 1979 to $25.2 million spent on comparable activities under the Chapter 2 block grant in fiscal 1982 (the 1982-83 school year). These funding reductions "shivered the timbers" of magnet schools, and while many survived, very few new ones are being created, the report said.

If federal policy were aimed at developing magnet schools that are "well designed, located and managed to provide high-quality integrated education," the minimum cost (assuming 300 school districts are realistically willing and able to employ magnets, with an average enrollment of 35,000 and 15 percent of students enrolled in magnets, a total of 1.6 million students at extra cost of $200 per year) would be $320 million a year, the report calculated, possibly dropping off to $80 million or $100 million as magnet costs stabilized after the first year of operation.

At the state level, the report cautioned against the effect on magnet schools of the increasing tendency of state boards to regulate curriculum and testing.

"Magnets require permission to be different," the report pointed out.

The report also identified some local policy issues, including the need to involve communities in planning magnet schools and, most specifically, the need for strong administrative commitment to the magnet idea.

An executive summary of the report, Survey of Magnet Schools: Analyzing a Model for Quality Integrated Education, is available from the U.S. Department of Education, Office of Planning, Budget and Evaluation, 400 Maryland Ave. SW, Washington DC 20202, or by telephone ask for Rhonda Lewis at (202) 245-9401.

HOLLOW TALK ABOUT DESEGREGATION

In criticizing court-ordered busing for school desegregation, the Reagan Administration has often had kind words for an alternative: voluntary desegregation plans. But that kindness does not extend beyond words to the money that is often crucial to making voluntary plans work.

Desegregation fails for lack of funds as often as for lack of will. Congress recognized as much in 1972 when it enacted the Emergency School Aid Act to help finance desegregation. That helped ease the transition to integrated schools by financing interracial community programs and special training for teachers and counselors. The act also supported "magnet schools" whose special curriculums attract students of all races.

In 1981 the law become a casualty of the Administration's concern for federalism and budget-cutting. The School Aid Act's money was compressed into an education block grant with more than 20 other programs, all of them funded at 85 percent of the previous level. That was a heavy blow for desegregation plans. Especially in urban areas, they were scaled back as school districts competed for fewer subsidies. And without the promise of Federal financial support, districts seeking to avoid court-ordered plans have been discouraged from taking voluntary action.

Aware of the problem, Congress has tried to reestablish a separate, relatively inexpensive fund for both voluntary and court-ordered desegregation. A bill authorizing $100 million for that purpose passed the House in June. Similar legislation, sponsored by Senators Moynihan and Eagleton, failed to reach the Senate floor before adjournment but will be pending next year.

The Reagan Administration, after averring support for voluntary desegregation, now opposes even these modest Congressional proposals. It contends that the block grant needs more time to prove its effectiveness.

Time isn't the problem. Folding funds for controversial programs into any reduced block grant is a sure way to make those programs vulnerable. Until the Administration is willing to earmark the desegregation money, its arguments for voluntary plans ring hollow.

[From the New York Times, Feb. 1, 1984]

A "BLUEPRINT" ALL RIGHT—FOR SEGREGATION

President Reagan's Department of Justice so abhors mandatory busing that it does everything possible to avoid it in school desegregation cases, even to the point of tolerating continued segregation.

Now, in Bakersfield, Calif., the department's civil rights chief, William Bradford Reynolds, says he has the perfect "blueprint" for desegregation without relying on mandatory busing which does not work anywhere in a very meaningful way." It's certainly a blueprint: for evasion and for continuing the Administration's lax approach to school desegregation.

The Bakersfield school district has confounded Federal anti-discrimination investigators for nearly 15 years. Situated about 100 miles north of Los Angeles, the district serves 18,500 students, half of whom are Hispanic and black.

As far back as 1969, Federal education officials found that Bakersfield's school system was violating the law that prohibits racial discrimination in federally financed programs. An administrative law judge concluded that the district had created a dual school system "by intentionally segregating black and Hispanic students from white students."

Even in 1982, four of the district's 32 elementary and junior high schools were still racially imbalanced, with minority enrollments of at least 92 percent. The Department of Education concluded that the district refused to "dismantle fully its intentionally segregated elementary school system because the remedy . . . will necessarily have to include the transportation of some students."

It then referred the case to the Justice Department for "judicial enforcement." The Justice Department's response was merely to encourage Bakersfield to create special programs in the four schools—in areas like science, computers and performing arts—to make them "magnets" for more white students.

Under a consent decree negotiated by the department last week, the school district has three years to bring those four schools within 20 percent of the racial ratio of the district populations. But if even then the school district fails to make such progress it will not, in Mr. Reynolds's view, necessarily be violating the order.

Although the district already buses more than 3,000 students, its school officials and the Justice Department have studiously avoided any additional busing to insure the success of the desegregation plan. Mr. Reynolds continues to believe that "school systems can be desegregated by voluntary means that eliminate racial isolation and improve education programs."

But these are costly programs, and the Reagan Administration has consistently refused financial support for even voluntary desegregation efforts. Mr. Reynold's Bakersfield "blueprint" contained no Federal funds.

By looking only to voluntary measures, many large urban school districts are simply unable to dismantle the racial isolation that in many places has been perpetuated by deliberate acts of school officials. When Mr. Reynolds insists in such circumstances that "mandatory busing is unacceptable," what it means is that the Administration thinks segregation is acceptable.●

MAN OF THE YEAR

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it would seem to me that our Ambassador to Morocco, the Honorable Joseph Verner Reed, has expressed a view which is common among us that the U.S. marine is, and should be the Man of the Year. I am pleased to share his comments with my colleagues and ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

The comments follow:

EMBASSY OF THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Rabat, Morocco, January 1, 1984.

From: The Ambassador.

MAN OF THE YEAR

At this time of year it is customary for various groups and publications to choose their "Man of the Year." As I look back on 1983, a year stained in blood, especially in this troubled region of the world, I know that there can only be one choice for "Man of the Year," that is: The United States Marine.

Tireless in the all-but-impossible peacekeeping task in the ongoing fury of Lebanon, a staunch symbol of the American commitment to freedom and democracy, the Marine showed the world the strength of our values and hopes.

The Marine demonstrated to an anxious free world that the fighting arm of the U.S. is still a force to be reckoned with in deadly seriousness. In so doing he sent a warning to the tyrants and terrorists who would threaten the peace and safety of others.

Meanwhile, back home, the Marine's countrymen had at long last good reason to feel pride in their fighting forces overseas. Americans rallied to support the Marine as he fought to preserve the peace. All Americans could feel more secure at home because they knew our Marines were overseas keeping our beloved country safe.

Though not officially at war, our Marines in Lebanon now endure what all young men sent to distant wars which they did not start, and may never end, must endure—days of boredom, days of peril; nights of abject despair and loneliness, nights of shared danger.

Yet through all the danger and misery, America's Marine can proudly describe himself as "one of the few, the proud."

Marines, the Americans of the Year, all your countrymen salute you.●

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a unanimous-consent request in respect to a committee meeting today that for a variety of reasons was not put prior to the meeting, and I do not ordinarily do that, but it bears the approval notation of the minority leader and he delivered it long before this, so it is my fault, not his.

I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Relations shall have been deemed to have been authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today at 2:30 p.m. to hold a hearing on the nomination of William Wilson to be Ambassador.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER INDEFINITELY POSTPONING CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN MEASURES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am also advised that there are three items on the calendar that have been dealt with on companion measures. They are Senate appropriations measures that are eligible to be indefinitely postponed. They are Calendar Orders 306, 334, and 410.

Could I inquire of the minority leader if he would object to the request that they be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President there will be no objection from this side.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that those three items be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR FRIDAY

ORDER FOR THE RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, we have requests from three Senators for special orders on tomorrow. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, Senators MURKOWSKI, BENTSEN, and BUMPERS be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes each and in that order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BAIL REFORM—FORFEITURE—DRUG CZAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is anticipated that after the execution of the special orders there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business. After that, it is the hope of the leadership on this side that we can turn to three measures, bail reform, forfeiture, and the drug czar bill, which are Calendar Orders 229, 350, and 359, respectively.

I anticipate the Senate will be in until midafternoon, perhaps a little later. Rollcall votes are expected during the day tomorrow. There is a notation on our calendar for requests for rollcall vote on one of those bills. There may be others.

Before I state the program for tomorrow, does the minority leader have anything further he wishes to address to the Senate?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. President, if the distinguished majority leader wishes to proceed with the bail legislation, forfeiture legislation, and the drug czar legislation tomorrow, those matters have been cleared for laying down on this side.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, rather than get an order now for those three items, since I do not know what order they will come in, let me do this: I ask unanimous consent, if the minority leader is agreeable, that it be in order tomorrow at any time during the day to proceed to the consideration of Calendar Orders 229, 350, or 359 after first consulting with the minority leader as to the sequence of those measures.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, it is my understanding from the numbering of the measures that they will deal with bail, forfeiture, and the drug czar, but not necessarily in that order.

Mr. BAKER. The Senator is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on tomorrow the Senate will convene at 10 a.m.

After the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, three Senators will be recognized on special orders of not to exceed 15 minutes. It is anticipated that there will be a period provided for the transaction of routine morning business either immediately after the execution of the special orders or at some time during the course of the day.

The Senate tomorrow will turn to the consideration of three items, the bail reform bill, the forfeiture bill, and the drug czar bill, orders 229, 350, and 359. The sequence has not yet been ascertained. It will be announced after consulting with the distinguished manager of the bill tomorrow and with the minority leader.

It is anticipated that at least one rollcall vote will occur, perhaps more. It is hoped that we can finish all three measures and it is hoped as well that the Senate can complete its business by midafternoon.

There will be no session on Saturday.

It is anticipated that on Monday the Senate will continue to consider the so-called ancillary bills to the crime package which will include such things as death penalty, exclusionary rule, and habeas corpus.

I also anticipate that these measures may be controversial and it may be even controversial in the matter of trying to reach them, but we will attempt to do that and I intend to persevere.

Also, may I add the career criminal bill.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no further business to address the Senate. I inquire of the minority leader if he has anything further.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have nothing. I believe I did get consent that I would be permitted to offer for appropriate referral the concurrent resolution to which I alluded, together with a statement in support of it.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there is certainly no objection to that. I believe the minority leader clearly intended that request and I hope the RECORD will note or the Chair will acknowledge that that consent was given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW AT 10 A.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see no other Senator seeking recognition. Therefore, I now move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to and the Senate, at 6:06 p.m., recessed until Friday, February 3, 1984, at 10 a.m.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, once again during the month of February our Nation honors the historical contributions and achievements of black Americans.

Many of these achievements were realized, despite the brutal legacy of slavery before the Civil War, and the period of limited freedom afterward characterized by restrictive "Black Codes," inferior educational opportunities, and institutionalized racism.

The countless and significant accomplishments of black Americans marks the success of the American spirit of achievement, and serves as an enduring source of cultural pride for all our citizens.

The contributions of blacks in America dates back to its discovery, when Pedro Alonzo Nino accompanied Christopher Columbus on his new world voyage. In our Nation's struggle for independence, a black man named Crispus Attucks was killed in the Boston massacre while defying British soldiers. James Armistead risked his life behind enemy lines, providing the Marquis de Lafayette with valuable reports, enabling the French commander to check the troop advances of British General Cornwallis. Blacks served as part of the Continental Army at Valley Forge. One black who died there, Salem Poor, also fought at the Battle of Bunker Hill.

One of the best kept secrets of our day is the fact that the overwhelming majority of the original founders of Los Angeles were black. Los Angeles was founded in 1781 by a group of 44 individuals, of which 16 were Indians, 22 were black, and 2 white.

Frederick Douglass, a black abolitionist, delivered powerful speeches against slavery, persuading many Northerners that their own civil liberties, as well as his, were in danger. An exslave and runway, Douglass founded an abolitionist newspaper called the "North Star," and used his eloquent style to urge emancipation for black slaves.

Another abolitionist, Sojourner Truth, later became an advocate for women's rights and served as an intermediary during the Civil War between Government officials and blacks in Washington, D.C., and other parts of the country.

Known as the "Moses of her people," Harriet Tubman was the famous conductor of the "Underground Railroad," an informal series of networks that aided fugitive slaves to escape slave-catchers of secure passage to Canada.

Within the walls of this very institution, 22 black Congressmen served their country honorably in the early Reconstruction era, although the constant victims of racial harassment. There legal status was often challenged, their supporters intimidated and even murdered and yet they continued their public service, sharing the common goal of forging a better America for all citizens.

Booker T. Washington built Tuskegee Institute in Alabama into a nationally known black industrial, vocational and agricultural college. George Washington Carver, a former slave, became the leading agricultural scientist of his day as the discoverer of hundreds of industrial and commercial uses of the peanut.

Dr. Charles R. Drew, pioneered the use of blood plasma and the blood bank. He ironically and tragically died due to loss of blood because he could not gain admittance to a hospital because of the color of his skin.

Other blacks have made tremendous societal contributions, although less well known. Andrew Beard invented couplers for railroad cars, Garrett A. Morgan invented the traffic sign and the gas mask, and C. B. Brooks invented the streetsweeper. Blacks also contributed to the development of the lawnmower, fountain pen, the ultraviolet camera for Apollo 16, and new techniques for transplant surgery.

Matthew A. Henson, a black explorer, accompanied Lt. Robert Peary on the historic first expedition to the North Pole in 1909, and placed the American flag there in behalf of the United States.

Phyllis Wheatley, one of the best known black American poets, came over from Africa at the age of 8 and within 16 months was able to read the most difficult verses of the Bible. Her work "Poems on Various Subjects," was the first volume published by an Afro-American writer.

Black Americans participated in 449 engagements in the Civil War in behalf of the Union Army, despite the threat of being captured and facing execution by Confederate forces. All black cavalry units, also known by the Indians as "Buffalo Soldiers," were part of the American trailblazing spirit which tamed the Western frontier. A black, by the name of York, accompanied Lewis and Clark on what would become one of the greatest scientific and geographical expeditions undertaken in the United States. York was a hunter, fisherman and interpreter and significantly contributed to this historic enterprise which opened up the Northwest.

Nat Love, better known as "Deadwood Dick" was the most famous black cowboy of his time. Bill Pickett, another black cowboy, was the originator of steer wrestling and also invented bull-dogging.

In the Spanish-American War, there were 16 regiments of black volunteers. The all-black 92d and 93d infantry divisions served heroically in World War I. The 364th Infantry Regiment, part of the 93d Division, became known as the "Hell Fighters," and were the first Allied regiment to reach the Rhine River in the offensive against Germany.

A cruel policy of strict segregation in the armed services did not influence the valiant efforts of these outstanding black fighting men.

In World War II about a million black Americans served in the Armed Forces. The largest black combat unit was the 92d Infantry Division, known as the "Buffalo Division," taken from the all-black calvary unit of post-Civil War American West fame. The 93d Infantry Division served in the Pacific theatre, and was the largest combat unit in that region. Even in WWII blacks were restricted to segregated units. This policy was enforced at all military posts, the theatres, mess halls, service clubs, et cetera. This obvious policy of discrimination created enormous barriers for blacks in military promotions and duty assignments.

With regard to military segregation, John F. Kennedy would later say:

> No one has been barred on account of his race from fighting or dying for America—there are no "white" or "colored" signs on the foxholes or graveyards of battle. Surely, in 1963, 100 years after Emancipation, it should not be necessary for any American citizen to demonstrate in the streets for the opportunity to stop at a hotel, or to eat at a lunch counter in the very department store in which he is shopping, or to enter a motion picture house, on the same terms as any other customer.

In the Korean conflict, a black combat unit known as the "Suicide Six" were reputedly one of the fastest gun crews in the 2d Infantry Division. Thousands of blacks served their country in Vietnam and have gone on to assume high-ranking positions in the armed services.

Blacks have added an awesome dimension to the quality of American collegiate and professional sports. Athletes such as Henry Aaron—most homeruns—in baseball, Wilt Chamberlain—most points scored in a game and career—in basketball, and Jim Brown—most yardage gained running—in football—are testimony to the great athletic achievements of blacks.

Jesse Owens embarrassed Adolph Hitler when he dominated the 1936 Berlin Olympics with his track and field efforts. A former congressional colleague of ours, Ralph Metcalfe, was part of that memorable winning relay team.

And as an anxious world watched a boxing bout filled with nationalistic zeal, Joe Louis, knocked out German boxer Max Schmeling in the first round. Louis who was inducted into the U.S. Armed Forces in WWII in the prime of his boxing career, fought for charity, donating his proceeds to the Army.

Jackie Robinson, became the first black to play major league baseball, thus paving the way for other talented black players who until that time were denied the right to play America's favorite sport.

Althea Gibson and Arthur Ashe also broke the color barrier for their respective sexes in the sport of tennis, and both went on to win titles at Wimbledon.

Blacks have excelled to achieve important positions in the field of education, as teachers, principals and administrators. The road to achieve equity in education was not easy for blacks in this country. Because of the lack of schools for blacks in the South after the Civil War, groups of children could be found studying in the streets. The Freedman's Bureau, organized in 1865 to unify and coordinate the many organizations dealing with the problems faced by freed slaves, helped to establish schools for blacks. When these schools were burned down, they were quickly rebuilt. Gen. Oliver Otis Howard was appointed Commissioner of the Bureau, and later Howard University was named in his honor.

And of course there are the countless black heroes who championed the cause of civil rights in America. W. E. B. DuBois, in 1905 played a leading role in the formation of the Niagara Movement, a coalition of black intellectuals who pressed for full citizenship rights and articulated the contributions of black Americans. Many members of the Niagara Movement, together with a number of whites, later formed the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People—NAACP.

The list of American civil rights advocates are endless, Medgar Evans; Whitney Young; the quiet yet effective leadership of Roy Wilkins; A. Philip Randolph; and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. who through his nonviolent methods gave our Nation an education on the black experience and helped to bring the issue of equal opportunity and discrimination to a national debate. Last year I was proud to support the successful legislative initiative commemorating Dr. King's birthday with a national holiday.

And who can forget the undominatable spirit of Rosa Parks, the 42-year-old black seamstress who refused to get up when ordered to give up her bus seat to make way for white passengers. Her courageous stand inspired a successful black boycott of the Montgomery City lines. A black minister, operating a carpool during the boycott, stopped to pick up an old woman who had obviously walked a long way, "Sister," said he, "aren't you getting tired?" Her reply: "My soul has been tired for a long time. Now my feet are tired and my soul is resting."

Only in this past year we have seen the first black Miss America and first black astronaut in space. With so much progress realized it would be a national tragedy to narrow the avenue of equal opportunities for minorities. At a time when the first significant signs of civil rights policies and mechanisms are becoming visible—we must insure that we maintain a strong and viable national policy of affirmative action and equal employment opportunity for all those who have the desire and the ambition to contribute and succeed.

Mr. Speaker, "Black History Month" is a celebration for all Americans. It is both a time to reflect on great achievements and a time to plan for the possibilities of the future. In short, it is a time to work for the realization of a better world.●

TRIBUTE FOR JOSEPH J. SCHAPPERT, JR.

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, February 7, the Wyoming Valley Chapter of the American Red Cross will present its highest award, the Certificate of Merit, to Joseph J. Schappert, Jr., of Kingston, Pa.

This award represents an outstanding achievement and one in which all of us take justifiable pride. Mr. Schappert earned this award for his efforts in reviving a drowning victim, Debbie Johnson of North Gates Street in Kingston, who was found floating face down in the Hamilton Street pool. Mr. Schappert used cardiopulmonary resuscitation skills, which he learned in a Red Cross course, which resulted in the survival of Debbie Johnson.

Mr. Schappert is currently a freshman at the Pennsylvania State University's Wilkes-Barre campus. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph J. Schappert of Kingston, Pa.

Mr. Speaker, I join with the family and friends of Joseph J. Schappert, Jr., in paying tribute to this outstanding young man.●

EUROPEAN SUPPORT FOR SPACE-BASED DEFENSE

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, one argument that has been made against the President's proposal to develop a space-based antiballistic missile system is that it would serve to decouple the United States from our NATO allies.

The following article, from the London Times of last December 28, gives another European perspective. In the view of Mr. Gerald Frost, executive director of the Institute for European Defence and Strategic Studies, a "star wars" defensive system would solidify the NATO alliance because it would perform "the inestimably valuable task of reducing the scale of the risks to the United States in providing nuclear protection to its European allies." The potential for Soviet nuclear intimidation of Western Europe would be sharply diminished, and the prospects for a stable peace strengthened.

[From the London Times, Dec. 28, 1984]

WHY A STAR WARS STRATEGY COULD HELP KEEP THE PEACE

(By Gerald Frost)

European attitudes to President Reagan's "star wars" proposals—the move to develop a space-based antiballistic missile system, agreed in principle a few weeks ago—have generally contained elements of both amazement and derision.

The arguments advanced by United States analysts in favour of the programme, aimed initially at long-term research, have not even been thought worthy of serious examination in Britain, despite their revoluntary nature and their possibly momentous consequences.

The European media have variously described the Reagan proposals as "absurd", "irresponsibly expensive", "dangerous" and "alarming". There has been almost universal agreement that the development represents another dangerous and escalatory round of the arms race. Strategic studies departments and institutes have either doubted that the proposals are feasible or have suggested that they represent a return to United States isolationism. Few people, if any, have publicly suggested that there might be some important political or strategic advantage to Europe or, for that matter, that there might be colossal dangers to Europe if the Soviet Union were to obtain an unmatched advance in "star wars" weaponry.

It is taken for granted that any benefits the proposals might yield would be purely and narrowly American ones. But if the development is taken in the context of the continuing crisis in transatlantic relations and the recent Soviet arms build-up, then it may be seen altogether more favourably.

Indeed, it may provide the answer to problems, inherent in the NATO strategy of flexible response, which have long been perceived by a number of those with a professional interest in strategic issues—weaknesses which politicians have generally not been keen to expose to public scrutiny. These weaknesses flow from the nature of the ultimate step in the flexible response strategy; the use of US intercontinental missiles in retaliation against a Soviet attack on Europe.

According to common view, even if the United States was willing to unleash its intercontinental ballistic missiles for this purpose, there would be little point in doing so, for Europe would have already been devastated. In any event, the critics say, no United States president in full possession of his mental faculties would risk American cities to defend frequently "disloyal" European ones. Yet if the Soviets came to believe that the United States might feel this way, they might no longer be effectively deterred.

Evidently, the United States' nuclear umbrella is not what it was in the secure and happy days of American strategic superiority. The only merit in the present policy, it is said, is that the Soviets could not be sure that the United States would not so respond—and this doubt is sufficient to provide Europe with adequate deterrence against a Soviet attack. But with the progessive deterioration in transatlantic relations—of which the Grenada episode is but the latest chapter—and with further increases in Soviet military might, NATO's credibility has now been significantly eroded. How much more erosion can it withstand before the whole strategy becomes plainly incredible is a difficult question to answer.

Moreover, even with significant numbers of cruise and Pershing missiles in place, such doubts and anxieties are likely to remain. The question that may come to be asked is not "would the United States press the button against the wishes of European leaders?" but "would the United States ever contemplate pressing the button if it believed that by not doing so war could be limited to Europe?"

An effective western anti-ballistic missile system in space, however, could transform this situation by performing the inestimably valuable task of reducing the scale of the risks to the United States in providing nuclear protection to its European allies. If the risks are judged to be fewer, it follows that United States readiness to accept them is likely to be much enhanced, and the Soviet Union will have to take account of this in its strategic calculations. This is an important argument, but so far no European public figure appears even to have taken it into account.

Supposing, however, the Soviet Union continues to exploit space for military purposes, ignoring the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972 while the United States feels restrained by that treaty or by its critics at home and abroad. A moment's reflection suggests that if that happens, the western alliance will be doomed; close examination of the consequences only confirms one's initial fears.

If the Soviet Union were to develop the ability to destroy 90 per cent or so of the enemy's ballistic missiles before they re-entered the atmosphere while the United States failed to obtain a similar capacity, the Warsaw Pact might face a new and unique experience; a queue of admiring, friendly and sycophantic West European states waiting to join.

Since the United States Administration is committed so far only to examining the feasibility of "star wars" weaponry, we cannot be sure what degree of direct protection would be provided against missiles targeted on Europe. It is possible, however, that the "killer satellites" thought to be envisaged under the proposals could destroy ballistic missiles such as the SS20 as well as the strategic weapons aimed at the United States.

It is objected that the whole "star wars" phenomenon is in some ways more alarming than existing weaponry. Its development would certainly result in a substantial change of nuclear doctrine and strategy. Instead of the West signalling its intention to cause massive and unacceptable damage if attacked with nuclear weapons, it would instead be signalling its capacity substantially to withstand such an attack. Assuming that the Soviets continue to develop a similar capacity, we would have moved from mutually assured destruction, a policy which has caused profound if irrational anxiety, to mutually assured survival.

This arguably, could well bring about a less turbulent and danger-fraught international climate in which it would be easier to reach agreement about reductions in offensive weapons because by switching the emphasis to defensive systems, the stakes would not be so appallingly high. Is this so "alarming"? Historically speaking, most effective strategies have generally included a defensive as well as an offensive element; the present massive reliance on weapons of attack is an aberration, and may well account for many of the fears and apprehensions that have fuelled the growth of the peace movement, however illogically.

To be sure, there is a strange breed of extra-terrestrial ecologists who argue that it is immoral to "take warfare" into space. But it is not warfare which would be sent there, but new instruments of deterrence. If that deterrence failed, the result would be a conflict between sophisticated and unmanned machines hurtling through the arid wastes of space, but it would be a war without initial loss of human life.

It cannot be safely asserted that war would remain conveniently in space. What may be said is that the immediate targets would be spaceborne vehicles, missiles, or satellites, rather than cities or manned military installations on earth, and that such a conflict could conceivably end with a political settlement before human life had been lost.

This is a small part of the case that may be advanced in favour of some kind of "star wars" defence in the United States. Although it is new and strange to most people, it is not demonstrably absurd. Nor, I think, should it alarm Europeans more than, say, the deployment of the SS20s. It deserves serious and searching examination rather than scorn and derision.●

FINANCIAL DEREGULATION AND H.R. 4506

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the deregulation and amalgamation of our Nation's financial institutions, including banks, securities dealers, insurance companies, and others continues at a furious pace.

These changes are occurring without review by Congress, and often in spite of Federal and State laws designed to protect consumers. This is a matter of concern to me, and, I believe, other Members of Congress.

On November 18, I introduced H.R. 4506, which proposes a rational scheme within which Congress can review this question in an orderly way. H.R. 4506 established a commission to study specific questions, and report to Congress its recommendations. During this deliberation period the financial community could not make structural changes that were not specifically permitted by law. After Congress acts on the commission's recommendation the financial community will be free to make any change then permitted by law.

On January 30, 1984, the New York Times editorially raised similar concerns about the ongoing changes in the financial marketplace. I place this editorial in the RECORD for the information of the Members.

BANKING'S BUSTING OUT ALL OVER

While Government has been struggling to define a proper level of regulation in many industries, one critical sector of the nation's economy has been vigorously deregulating itself. Banks and thrift institutions, stockbrokers and mutual funds, insurance companies and even Sears, Roebuck have encroached on each other's traditional functions to an extent none could imagine only a decade ago.

The longer Congress and the Administration avoid facing up to the confusion, the more likely that the nation's financial structure will evolve in chaotic and dangerous ways.

Three issues now dominate debate about reordering the system: What functions should various institutions be authorized to perform? Who should regulate their activities? Should they be permitted to operate nationwide?

The basic banking laws of the 1930's and 1950's set barriers between banks and the stock markets to prevent any recurrence of the massive Depression failures, and forbade bank holding companies from venturing into non-banking commercial activities. These barriers have since been partially relaxed, by regulation and legislation. They are also being eroded by technology and the aggressiveness of many financial institutions.

New York's giant Citicorp, for example, has acquired or established banking, savings and loan, credit and insurance operations in many parts of the country. BankAmerica, Merrill Lynch, Sears, Prudential, American Express and many mutual funds are in hot pursuit, branching and buying into each other's former domains.

Yet the laws by which they are regulated lag far behind and the regulators, far from getting together, are feuding over turf.

Senator Jake Garn, the chairman of the Banking Committee, has long tried to alert Congress to the dangers. His proposals, focusing on function, would expand but nonetheless control the services various financial institutions may perform. He should be listened to.

So should Vice President Bush's task force, which would concentrate Federal financial regulation, reclaiming it from a variety of agencies. If similar services are to be offered by once dissimilar enterprises, their rules should be the same.

Neither Mr. Garn nor Mr. Bush has addressed the question about the proper geographical scope for banking companies. Money markets have a way of merging themselves, and computers have made that easy. But this situation may require entirely new safeguards to govern the conduct of huge financial conglomerates. Guidelines in this area are urgently needed.

Fortunately, the public does not see any of this as politically controversial. No member of Congress risks a seat by trying to understand, and provide for the safety of, the financial system. The importunings of industry lobbyists notwithstanding, Congress should stop ducking this difficult but vital responsibility.●

THE SEARCH FOR PEACE

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, when I was in North Dakota at the end of last year, I had a chance to read an enlightening editorial which appeared in a publication known as the Small Voice. It is published in Fargo, N. Dak., and I would like to bring it to the attention of my colleagues.

Editor Jerome Lamb makes important points about the struggle for peace, about the willingness of the world's people to rush into war, and about the threads of hope to which we must continue to cling.

DECEMBER 1983.

We think about peace a lot. Who doesn't? As a subject for meditation it's always in season, and in the wake of Beirut, Grenada, "The Day After", Tripoli it occupies a larger than usual chunk of our horizon.

Like most things much sought after but seldom, perhaps never, attained, like happiness, like love, like wisdom, there isn't a whole lot of agreement about peace, what it is or how it is to be got. Everybody's for it though. Even old unshaven Mars, the bloody handed, pot bellied, armor clad Roman bully political cartoonists are (or were) so fond of probably billed himself as a guardian of the peace. Certainly generations of statesmen have confessed to a passionate yearning for peace, which would long since have been achieved if only the statesmen on the other side had not been such intractable boneheads and bastards. Likewise generals, when memoir time rolls around, are invariably four square in favor of peace, a sentiment they seem to share with munitions manufacturers and terrorists. One might expect someone in that line of work to point out occasionally how good warfare can be for the soul, character building and, don't you know, kind of fun. But it almost never happens. From earliest times warriors have professed profound discontent with their career field.

So for a while we wondered if maybe the trouble with peace was that everyone was for it. It might fare better if it had a few natural enemies. As it stands people seem to favor it so avidly and rigorously they're inclined to lay hold and throttle those whose avidity and/or tactical purity are questionable. Wars, according to this view, may be no more than a matter of peace seekers on one side of the fence, deciding to knock a little sense into the heads of peace seekers on the other side who are going about the quest in the wrong way. It's a useful theory when it comes to explaining the ease with which some folks, sincerely devoted to the cause can assume a "more peaceable than thou" stance, and shout down disagreement, while muttering dark thoughts like "a boot in the behind is the only thing these jackasses will ever understand."

As a theory it is nonetheless all wet. Everyone's for peace, no doubt about that, but great numbers of people believe having a war is the best way of reaching peace. It's not only mad dogs like Bonaparte and Adolf and the Ayatollah but a lot of plain, mostly decent people who appear to feel that war is just dandy, as long as it's going their way. And located in distant lands. It was, though it should not have been, a surprise to find out in the aftermath of the Beirut-Grenada week how quickly questions of why and what for get buried in the bluster of what passes for patriotism. When we heard all the man-in-the-street type crowing about how great it was to win a war at last (a war?), how necessary it was to stop the Commies dead in their tracks, how admirable it was to be tough and decisive, we couldn't help remembering the Italians in 1936, swept away in the euphoria of their famous Abyssinian victory (a victory?). The moral, we suppose, is that now and fifty years ago, just as in Aesop's time, the cock must close his eyes to crow.

It is not pleasant to go into the Christmas season with a re-awakened awareness of the bellicosity of humanity, but here we are. Well, what we have to offer for the season is the observation that as unpeaceful as the prospects may be there is still and always hope. Brutality and stupidity abound; intolerance increases; winter sets in. There is still and always hope. In the loops and shadows of the days that become history sense has sometimes prevailed. Rhetoric has been known to cool down, dumb notions to fade. Perhaps now. It is Christmas, a season reknown for hovering angels, unusual stars, mysterious babies, and hope. Whatever peace may be, it is a good part hope; patience, forbearance, firmness and a hundred other things, but mainly hope.●

TRIBUTE TO BRET HUTTENSTINE

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, on February 25, 1984, the Greater Hazleton Jaycees will honor Bret Huttenstine of West Hazleton, Pa., as their 1983 recipient of the Distinguished Service Award honoring the "Outstanding Young Man of the Year." This represents an outstanding achievement, and one in which all of us take justifiable pride.

Mr. Huttenstine is a graduate of West Hazleton High School and of the Union Special Technical Training Center in Huntley, Ill. He is presently employed as a mechanical technician for Geissler's Knitting Mills, Inc., Hazleton.

Mr. Huttenstine has been involved in a number of youth oriented programs. He has served on the West Hazleton Recreation Board and coordinated that community's first tennis tournament. His involvement with youth also included serving as coach for West Hazleton Biddy Basketball, working with Boy Scouts of America, and serving as chairman of the Luzerne County Junior Miss Program.

Mr. Huttenstine is currently the external vice president of the Greater Hazleton Jaycees. He is the son of Mrs. Doris Huttenstine of West Hazleton and is engaged to be married to Ms. Linda Barletta, Hazleton. He was nominated for the award by the Soroptimist International of Hazleton, the Hazleton Community Concert Association, and the West Hazleton Recreation Board.

Mr. Speaker, I join with the family and friends of Bret Huttenstine in paying tribute to this outstanding young person.●

NORTHEAST-MIDWEST CONGRESSIONAL COALITION BUDGET TASK FORCE

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, the Northeast-Midwest Congressional Coalition has looked carefully at President Reagan's new budget for fiscal year 1985. As cochairs of the coalition's budget task force, Representative STEWART MCKINNEY and I have prepared an analysis of the budget's impact on our region of the country and the Nation as a whole. We wish to share the product of our review with our colleagues: our statement and the regional analysis follow:

STATEMENT BY REPRESENTATIVE ROBERT W. EDGAR AND REPRESENTATIVE STEWART B. MCKINNEY, COCHAIRS, NORTHEAST-MIDWEST CONGRESSIONAL COALITION TASK FORCE ON THE BUDGET, FEBRUARY 1, 1984

President Reagan's proposed fiscal 1985 budget contains few surprises, but nevertheless is a major disappointment for members of Congress who hoped to see movement toward increased fiscal responsibility and measures to prolong the economic recovery. By continuing—and in some cases accelerating—the trends of the past three years, this budget would jeopardize the economic revitalization of the Northeast-Midwest region and undermine its prospects for long-term prosperity.

In addition, the budget ignores several of the major challenges currently facing the federal government: the need to better balance income and expenditures, more fairly distribute federal resources, and correct the inequities resulting from government policies.

These challenges require hard choices, but this budget doesn't make them. Instead, it focuses its attacks on domestic programs that already have suffered severe cuts and that now constitute only a small percentage of federal spending. In so doing, the budget fails to address the critical needs of a region attempting to cope with the impact of fundamental economic change. The programs it would cut are the very ones that have been used by our states and communities to foster new economic growth, preserve their employment and tax base, and relieve the pain of those who have been victimized by economic forces beyond their control.

Since taking office in 1981, President Reagan has achieved the great majority of his objectives regarding federal budget and spending practices and tax policy. His program is in place, and deserves to be judged fairly. Inflation has been reduced significantly, the economy is improving, the dollar is strong. Unfortunately, however, more people remain unemployed than in January 1981, our balance of payments deficits are at historic highs, and we face unprecedented federal budget deficits into the foreseeable future.

The Northeast-Midwest region has borne the brunt of the economic adjustments of the past three years, with exceptionally high unemployment, extensive worker displacement, numerous plant closings, state budget shortfalls, and disproportionate losses of federal programs. The recovery has brought relief, and some parts of the region—particularly in New England—apparently have regained economic health, with relatively low unemployment rates. However, even in New England pockets of severe distress remain. Youth unemployment—especially among minorities—remains exceptionally high in central cities throughout the Northeast and Midwest. And in some of our largest industrial states, unemployment still is above the national average and confidence in continued growth is tenuous.

The budget we have before us would shrink further many of the domestic programs on which the rejuvenation of our region's economy depends. From 1981 to 1984, federal grants to state and local governments went through a sharp decline, then rose to just above their previous level. The 1985 request would put them at $102 billion—a drop of 21 percent in four years when adjusted for inflation. In 1985 such grants would constitute only 10 percent of federal budget authority compared to 14.7 percent in 1981.

The administration has emphasized the need for state and local governments to take greater responsibility for economic development and other domestic programs. However, those areas that have been hit hardest by the three recessions of the last decade have the least resources to do the job. For the federal governments to abandon its role in fostering economic growth is to leave these areas at an unfair disadvantage to more prosperous states and communities with more abundant resources of their own.

Ironically, the administration has taken just the opposite tack in the realm of foreign policy. The president's Caribbean Basin initiative proposes to use targeted economic development to modernize the economy and increase the political stability of that region. The Kissinger commission on Central America proposed similar measures as part of its plan for that troubled area. We don't need another commission to tell us that the older industrial states in our country could use this same type of assistance. A domestic Caribbean initiative targeted to distressed communities could provide the infrastructure improvements and repairs needed to stimulate economic growth and offer new employment opportunities to millions of Americans.

Instead, the budget confirms the patterns of the past for those programs that could be part of such an initiative. For example:

For the fourth year in a row, the budget seeks to eliminate the Economic Development Administration. Even though Congress has refused to go along with this request in the past, funding for the program now is 45 percent lower than in 1981.

Once again the administration is proposing to phase out all operating assistance for public transportation. For fiscal 1985, funding would be limited to $546 million—$329 million below the statutory cap in current law.

The Urban Development Action Grant (UDAG) and Community Development Block Grant (CDBG) programs would be maintained at the same levels as in 1984. However, that level of funding would represent an inflation-adjusted decline since 1981 of 46.7 percent for UDAG and 23.2 percent for CDBG.

While the administration's budget continues the cutback in programs essential to the economic revival of our region, it pumps more money into programs that perform some of the same functions in the South and West. Only last week the administration announced that the federal government would pay the full cost of Bureau of Reclamation dam repair projects and increase irrigation and flood control subsidies. This decision contradicts efforts by Congress to reduce subsidies to large landowners and water users. It will cost the federal government hundreds of millions of dollars in coming years and magnify inequities in the distribution of water development funds. Our region traditionally has received less than 15 percent of the federal water supply budget. New England in the past received only $6 per capita for water projects, compared to $38 per capita for the West.

The budget also continues the rapid expansion of military spending, and would obligate us to even larger increases in future years. The 1985 request would increase defense budget authority by 18 percent over 1984, which would mean a nomimal increase of 71 percent since 1981. Not only do increases of this magnitude drain our national resources and raise the deficit, they add to the current imbalance in the distribution of federal funds. For example, this year per capita defense spending in our region will be $290, while in the South and West it will be $741. An increase of the kind proposed by the administration will do little to enhance our national security, but it will undermine the economic security of most of the region.

Over all considerations about the fiscal 1985 budget looms the prospect of continuing huge deficits. The president's proposal projects a deficit next year of $180 billion, and continuing deficits of over $150 billion through 1988. This imbalance between income and expenditures is unacceptable. We all have heard warnings that high deficits could choke off economic recovery by driving up interest rates and soaking up available capital. We are here to warn that such a development could have its most devastating impact on our region, especially those areas whose economy depends on the manufacture of higher cost durable goods.

The recent deep recession demonstrated convincingly the sensitivity of the Northeast and Midwest to fluctuations in interest rates and the money supply. Lowered interest rates have allowed industries in the region to undertake massive investments in plan modernization, new products, and productivity improvements. This process must continue if American industry is to regain its international competitiveness and provide jobs for millions of workers. Much of the recovery in our region has been fueled by increased consumer purchases of durable goods, especially automobiles, appliances, and electronic equipment. A return to the higher interest rates of a few years ago could stop this recovery in its tracks and plunge much of the region into another recession.

Domestic programs no longer can serve as the whipping boy in attacks on "wasteful federal spending"—especially when defense and entitlement programs together constitute 75 percent of federal outlays and interest charges account for nearly half the rest. Courageous efforts are needed to reign in areas of rapid growth—such as military pensions and health care costs—that if left unchecked will saddle future generations with an intolerable burden. In the 1960s the federal deficit averaged $6 billion; in the 1970s it averaged $30 billion; we cannot simply accept its multiplying five-fold again in this decade.

The president's suggestions for attacking the problem—a balanced budget amendment, a line item veto, a report on tax reform next December—either are of dubious constitutionality or cannot be enacted in time, if at all, to have any major impact on the deficits projected for the next several years.

We in the Northeast-Midwest Congressional Coalition have tried to get the administration to recognize the inequitable impact of its policies on our region. It has failed to do so, and as a result has unnecessarily prolonged the pain and insecurity of millions of citizens and delayed the economic renewal of a region with 44 percent of the nation's population.

This year we will renew our efforts to control the growth of military spending; to insure the continued existence and viability of programs that sustain the needy; to target resources to distressed states and communities so that they can build for the future; and to achieve a more equitable distribution of federal funds among states and regions.

After the major buildup of the past three years, we believe defense spending increases should be limited to the level of inflation—between 3.5 percent and 4 percent. This would result in savings of $36.5 billion in budget authority and $24 billion in outlays in fiscal 1985. The Pentagon should be forced to make the same difficult choices that face other government agencies and sectors of the economy. Elimination of some of the waste in defense procurement and other areas alone would increase Pentagon buying power significantly, even at an inflation-level increase.

We will work to restore the cuts that have been proposed in crucial programs serving human needs such as food stamps and Medicaid. We will work to continue if not expand the Economic Development Administration, and to improve its targeting mechanisms so that aid is focused more closely on distressed communities. And we will seek continued funding of mass transit operating assistance, which the president has proposed to phase out.

We also will fight for increases in education and training funds. These programs represent an investment in our future, and are needed to guarantee the continued health of our economy. They are especially important to our region, with its heavy concentration of long-term unemployment and unemployed youth in our central cities.

These programs and others may be more mundane than a permanent space laboratory, but they are not less essential. We are not necessarily opposed to spending $8 billion in space, but we must recognize an equal claim on federal resource for infrastructure improvements, education, and training, which are essential to economic growth.

We also will seek changes in pension, Medicare, and other entitlement programs that are not based on need. Budget authority for military pensions alone is expected to grow by 65 percent in 1985, from $16.5 billion to $27.3 billion, with even greater increases in the future. Programs like these have powerful constituencies, but if we are to make headway against federal deficits—which rob future retirees as much as future workers—we must begin to target them more closely to those most in need.

That said, we must acknowledge that 1984 will be a difficult year in which to achieve any significant redirection of federal budget policy. The changes pushed through by the president in the past have taken hold, and the political atmosphere of an election year mitigates in favor of leaving things as they are and against the risky business of reform.

What we need now is leadership—leadership that must begin with the president. The president must take the initiative to attack a deficit that threatens our economy and shakes the confidence of our citizens. The president must work with Congress to create a political consensus behind a serious effort to curb runaway spending in the growth areas of the budget. Presidential leadership is needed to reform the tax system and close the loopholes that cost the government billions of dollars in revenue.

We stand ready to work with and support the president if he offers this kind of leadership.

THE BUDGET AND THE REGION—AN ANALYSIS OF PRESIDENT REAGEAN'S FISCAL YEAR REQUEST

Summary

The federal budget has an extraordinary influence on the economy of the Northeast and Midwest. While state and local economic initiatives play an important role, the tax and spending policies embodied in the federal budget in large measure determine the economic state of the region.

This dominant influence of the federal government has prompted elected officials from the Northeast and Midwest to focus special attention on President Reagan's fiscal 1985 budget request. Due in part to earlier federal policies, states in the region bore the brunt of the recent deep recession. While the current recovery has improved economic conditions, unemployment rates in several states still are well above the national average, which in turn remains higher than three years ago.

The apparent fragility of the recovery and its shallow effect on employment are of special concern to regional leaders. Because the economies of most Northeastern and Midwestern states are dominated by the manufacture of higher cost durable goods, the region is extremely sensitive to increase in interest rates caused by heavy federal borrowing or restrictions in the money supply.

This inital analysis of the President's fiscal 1985 budget request was prepared jointly by the staffs of the Northeast-Midwest Institute and the Northeast-Midwest Congressional and Senate Coalitations. The analysis examines the nature of the president's proposals and their specific impact upon the region, and highlights major areas of the budget considered critical to the region's future by most of its public and private leaders.

As with past budgets submitted by presidents of both parties, the fiscal 1985 proposal would continue a massive redistribution of funds among the states and regions of the country. Current federal tax and spending policies draw billions of dollars each year out of the economies of hard-pressed industrial states and transfer them to areas enjoying higher growth. The large increases proposed for defense spending in the 1985 request would exacerbate this problem. The Northeast and Midwest receive a disproportionately small share of defense spending, and thus derive far less economic benefit from military expenditures than do other regions. In addition, the economic development and social welfare programs on which Northeastern and Midwestern states depend heavily have been the targets in recent years of major cuts or spending freezes.

Many of the cuts proposed by this budget are focused on a range of domestic programs that together constitute only 10 percent of federal budget authority. Included are programs on which many state and local governments in the Northeast and Midwest rely for their efforts to foster economic growth. The few programs targeted for budget increases—such as defense, military retirement, and Bureau of Reclamation water project funding—tend to benefit other regions more than the Northeast and Midwest.

Finally, many argue that the $180 billion deficit proposed for fiscal 1985 could choke off an economic recovery by driving up interest rates and soaking up available capital. Much of this capital now is being used for investment in plant modernization, new products, and productivity increases that are essential to continued prosperity in the region and the nation.

Following are highlights of the budget proposal in major issue areas:

Community Development and General Revenue Sharing

In a reversal from past requests for budget reductions, the administration has asked for level funding for the Urban Development Action Grant (UDAG) and Community Development Block Grant (CDBG) programs at $440 million and $3.468 billion, respectively. Even so, that funding level would represent an inflation-adjusted decline since 1981 of 46.7 percent for UDAG and 23.1 percent for CDBG. The president has dropped those new federalism initiatives that would have turned UDAG back to the states and folded CDBG into a federal-local block grant. Only minor changes are requested in the CDBG program. Sustaining funding for each of these programs is important to efforts to revitalize the economy of the Northeast and Midwest. Between 1978 and 1983, UDAG grants of over $2 billion to cities in the region are credited with leveraging $11 billion in private investment and creating or retaining over 340,000 jobs.

Funding for the General Revenue Sharing (GRS) program, which sends $2.1 billion to communities in the Northeast and Midwest, would be maintained at $4.6 billion for each of the next three fiscal years under the president's request. The dollar figure for the GRS budget has remained constant for the past ten years. Adjusted for inflation, this represents an 18.2 percent decrease in spending power from 1981 to 1985.

Economic Development Administration (EDA)

The fiscal 1985 budget calls for elimination of all program funding for EDA. This is the president's fourth proposal to dismantle the agency. Previous attempts did not gain the support of Congress, which has appropriated $240 million for 1984. Nevertheless, current EDA funding is 45 percent lower than the 1981 level. The regional distribution of economic development program dollars underwent a notable shift last year. The Northeast-Midwest region, where 55 percent of the nation's long-term unemployed reside, received 56 percent of EDA funds in 1980 but only 44 percent in 1983.

Employment and Training

The president's proposal for fiscal 1985 includes $5.552 billion in budget authority for employment and training programs. The proposal requests $1.89 billion in block grants to the states for training disadvantaged youths and adults—Title II of the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA)—and $223 million for dislocated workers (Title III). Funding for these programs would be maintained at fiscal 1984 levels, compared on a 12-month basis. The 1984 budget authority for JTPA will finance the program for 21 months, from October 1, 1983, to June 30, 1985, to encourage long-term planning. Fiscal 1985 budget authority will finance a 12-month program year beginning on July 1, 1985.

In fiscal 1984 (including the nine-month transition period and the first quarter of the 1984 program year), an estimated 47 percent, or $848 million, of funds for training for the disadvantaged and 50.5 percent, or $55.5 million, of funds for dislocated worker training will go to states in the Northeast and Midwest.

The administration proposes a one-year extension for the Targeted Jobs Tax Credit, whose authority runs out at the end of 1984. In addition, the administration again proposes elimination of the Work Incentive Program (WIN).

Education

The President's 1985 budget request for the Department of Education is $15.5 billion, slightly above the 1984 appropriation of $15.4 billion. Approximately 47 percent of these funds—$7.3 billion—is for elementary, secondary, and vocational programs. Budget authority for the Education for the Disadvantaged program (ECIA Chapter I) and Vocational Education would be maintained at their 1984 levels of $3.48 billion and $738 million, respectively. In fiscal 1984, states in the Northeast and Midwest will receive $1.447 billion for education aid for the disadvantaged and $304 million for vocational education.

The administration again will propose legislation to fold a number of vocational programs into a block grant. However, unlike last year, the proposal would leave adult education as a separate categorical program. In addition, the president is proposing to fund Chapter II, the state block grant program, at $738 million in budget authority—up from $479 million in 1984 and $614 million in 1981. This year the program will send $194 million to states in the Northeast and Midwest.

The president also proposes a number of reforms for the Guaranteed Student Loan Program. One proposal, which the administration estimates would save $24 million, would require all students applying for loans, regardless of income, to meet a "needs analysis test." At present, only students whose families have incomes over $30,000 are subject to a needs test. An additional estimated saving of $10 million would be achieved by reducing federal responsibility for "reinsuring"—i.e. guaranteeing—all new loans. The federal government currently provides 100 percent reinsurance. Under the president's proposal, the federal government would provide 80 percent, with the states required to pick up the remaining 20 percent.

Public Housing

The president's fiscal 1985 budget would reduce public housing operating subsidies by over $200 million from the current appropriation level, asking for $1.123 billion in new budget authority. In addition, the budget proposes a rescission of $331 million from the fiscal 1984 authorization. Part of the 1985 reduction would be offset by carryovers from fiscal 1983 and 1984, but some of it is calculated on the basis of undocumented energy savings and proposed decreases in vacant unit subsidies. The administration has dropped last year's plan, which was potentially devastating to authorities in the Northeast-Midwest region, to base operating subsidies on local private market rents. However, failure in 1985 to fund authorities fully under the present cost-based system would have the most severe impact on large urban authorities operating in the Northeast and Midwest. Serious flaws in the current system already place an extra burden on these authorities. Approximately 60 percent of the 1.2 million units of public housing is located in the Northeast and Midwest.

Food Stamps

The administration's request would cut approximately $555 million from the food stamp program in fiscal 1985. In addition to a $176 million decrease projected to result from lower unemployment and inflation, the administration anticipates achieving substantial cuts through proposals to implement mandatory workfare, simplify the food stamp application process, and hold states liable for erroenous payments in excess of 3 percent of total benefits. Although the administration projects savings of $85 million from its workfare proposal, recent analyses by congressional agencies estimate that actual savings will be significantly less and that new requirements could increase state administrative costs more than total budget savings. Congress refused to enact similar workfare proposals in 1982 and 1983. The administration's proposal to force the states to pay more than $500 million in erroneous benefits will be most costly to state and local governments in the Northeast and Midwest because these states tend to offer higher benefit levels and because high unemployment creates heavy demand for services.

Health

The administration proposes to save $567 million in fiscal 1985 by reducing permanently the federal matching rate for Medicaid by 3 percent. An additional $270 million would be saved by requiring states to charge copayments to all noninstitutionalized beneficiaries, including pregnant women and children. The fiscal 1985 Medicaid budget level of $21.213 billion represents a growth rate more than 2 percent lower than the rate of increase from fiscal 1983 to 1984. Measures proposed by the administration to achieve slower growth could force state legislatures to enact further cutbacks in Medicaid eligibility and coverage. Coupled with changes in Medicare reimbursement, federal Medicaid cutbacks may result in increased local government spending to support public hospitals, which treat a higher proportion of the poor and uninsured.

Energy Conservation

Although the president has, to a large extent, maintained funding levels of many energy conservation programs—largely through the use of oil overcharge funds—the total request still represents a 55.9 percent decrease from the fiscal 1981 level when adjusted for inflation. A total of $252.2 million has been requested for state and local grant programs—the same as in fiscal 1984—with $238 million coming from a newly created Petroleum Overcharge Restitution Fund. The president's budget assumes no funding for the Energy Extension Service or the programs funded under the Energy Production and Conservation Act, but would provide $190 million for the Weatherization program and $48 million for the Schools and Hospitals conservation program. The president's fiscal 1985 budget proposal states that "If receipts deposited into the fund are insufficient, the balance of the budget request for the Weatherization Assistance and Schools and Hospitals Grant programs will be derived from the general fund of the U.S. Treasury." However it is unclear whether the president will stand by these funding levels if Congress does not establish an oil overcharge account.

The fiscal 1985 request for energy conservation research and development is $148 million—$17.1 million of which is to come from appropriated funds not spent in previous years and savings resulting from new management practices. The fiscal 1985 request almost equals the fiscal 1984 appropriations of $150.9 million. The buildings and community systems and industrial portions of the research and development budget are about the same as in fiscal 1984. The transportation portion is reduced from the current level and the multi-sector portion is somewhat higher.

Energy conservation grant and research and development programs are of particular importance to Northeastern and Midwestern states. The region is home to growing numbers of low income people, has a disproportionate share of the nation's older, energy-inefficient housing, and has the highest household energy costs in the nation.

Low Income Energy Assistance

The president has requested a total of $1.875 billion for the Low Income Energy Assistance program for fiscal 1985 and tied the authorization level to the release of oil overcharge funds. The 1985 request represents a substantial increase over the president's previous proposals, and equals the amount appropriated so far by Congress for fiscal 1984. The president proposes to finance the program from a newly-created Petroleum Overcharge Restitution Fund, rather than from general revenues. Legislation will be sent to Congress in the near future to both create the fund and finance the program through it.

The fiscal 1985 funding level represents a decrease from fiscal 1981 of 17 percent after adjusting for inflation. The Northeast-Midwest region, with 44 percent of the U.S. population, currently receives approximately 63 percent of the energy assistance funds. The president's decision to finance the program out of oil overcharge funds may be problematical, since many members of Congress believe those funds should be used to supplement rather than supplant current funding sources.

Energy Supply

Although the administration's fiscal 1985 budget submission would increase proposed funding for fossil fuels and renewable programs sharply, overall spending for energy still would be much lower than in 1981. The request for nuclear programs (Fusion and Nuclear Energy) is $1.101 billion; for fossil programs, $272.9 million ($70.2 million of which would come from funds not spent in previous years and new management initiatives); and for solar and other renewables, $191.3 million ($10 million of which would come from funds not spent in previous years).

The nuclear request is down slightly from the fiscal 1984 appropriation level, due mainly to termination of the Clinch River Breeder Reactor. Although the proposed funding for fossil fuels and solar and other renewables is somewhat lower than the amount appropriated by Congress for this year, the fossil fuels request is 98 percent higher than the administration's fiscal 1984 request, and the request for solar and other renewables is 87 percent greater than last year's. However, after adjusting for inflation, between 1981 and 1985 overall spending for nuclear energy would decline by 37.6 percent, for fossil fuels by 75.3 percent, and for solar and other renewables by 77.4 percent.

Development of alternative energy resources is important for the Northeast-Midwest region because all of its states are net energy importers. Research and development programs in both basic and applied energy are needed to bring technologies to full commercialization, and should be encouraged particularly for energy sources indigenous to the region.

Water Resources Development

Construction outlays by the Army Corps of Engineers are scheduled to decline by $228 million in fiscal 1985, as many projects near completion. Only two new construction starts are included in the Corps' request, which assumes offsetting receipts of $200 million in anticipation of congressional approval of port and navigation user fees. The Bureau of Reclamation budget, which limits funding to 17 Western states, would increase by 17 percent, from $922 million to $1.079 billion, with two new projects authorized for construction. Budget authority for the Soil Conservation Service's watershed and flood prevention program would drop from $184 million to $94 million, but the budget for the Farmers' Home Administration rural water and waste disposal loans and grants program, cut by more than 50 percent between fiscal 1981 and 1984, would decline only slightly next year, from $360 million to $340 million. The Northeast-Midwest region receives 32 percent of FmHA water program funding, but averages less than 20 percent of national spending for all water resource programs combined.

The week before the budget was introduced, the administration withdrew its proposal to establish a uniform cost-sharing requirement for federal water projects in favor of negotiations on a project-by-project basis. This decision will result in extra expenditures over the long term for federal water projects, few of which are located in the Northeast-Midwest region.

Water Quality

The president's fiscal 1985 request would increase funding for EPA regulatory, enforcement, and research programs by 8 percent, from $1.088 billion to $1.177 billion, bringing the agency's budget for these programs to approximately 71 percent of 1981 levels in inflation-adjusted dollars. The acid rain research budget would almost double, from $28 million to $55 million. The administration pledges additional resources for a federal-private sector project to demonstrate a competitive clean coal technology to reduce the sulfur dioxide emissions thought to cause acid rain. However, no funding amount is specified. Budget authority for the Superfund program would increase 39 percent, from $460 million to $640 million, reflecting 133 new additions to EPA's National Priority List of abandoned sites and increased demands on the program as cleanups get under way. Of the 512 identified priority sites, 65 percent are in the Northeast-Midwest region.

The Wastewater Treatment Construction Grants program would be authorized at last year's level of $2.4 billion, although this year the state matching requirement for most projects will increase from 25 percent to 45 percent. The Northeast-Midwest region receives 54 percent of the funds under this program, which is roughly equivalent to EPA's assessment of the region's wastewater treatment needs.

Transportation

The fiscal 1985 budget request asks for $3.4 billion in budget authority for the formula grant, discretionary grant, and interstate transit transfer grant programs of the Urban Mass Transportation Administration, a cut of $194.5 million from the projected fiscal 1984 level. The administration proposes to phase out all operating assistance for public transportation by fiscal 1989, and to limit fiscal 1985 operating assistance to $546 million—$329 million below the statutory cap in current law. With adjustments for inflation, that level of assistance would represent a reduction of 69 percent from 1981 authorizations. Large cities would lose the greatest proportion of funds under the graduated funding system the administration purposes. The Northeast-Midwest region receives approximately 60 percent of the urban formula assistance funds that provide operating and capital assistance.

The Federal Aid Highway Trust Fund programs would receive $14.645 billion in fiscal 1985 budget authority, an increase of $738 million from the estimated fiscal 1984 level of $13.907 billion. However, the budget recommends a fiscal 1985 obligation limitation of $13.875 billion, excluding emergency obligations.

Amtrak would receive $680 million in fiscal 1985 operating budget authority, a reduction of $36.4 million from the fiscal 1984 level of $716.4 million.

The Northeast Corridor Improvement Project will receive no new budget authority under the administration proposal, but will continue to make outlays from previous years' authority. The administration recommends no new authority for the local rail service assistance program, which distributed $12.5 million in fiscal 1984.

Defense

Budget authority for the Department of Defense in fiscal 1985 is proposed to reach $305 billion, and outlays $264.4 billion. This $47 billion or 18 percent increase in authority and $33 billion or 14.5 percent increase in outlays over fiscal 1984 reflects the administration's continuing commitment to real funding increases for national defense. In addition, a fiscal 1984 supplemental appropriation request will be made for military operations in Lebanon and Grenada, as well as to increase certain military benefits.

The defense share of the nation's output of GNP will be 6.8 percent in fiscal 1985, and is projected to average slightly more than 7 percent over the next five years. DOD's share of federal budget outlays is projected to increase to approximately 30 percent.

Heavy emphasis continues to be placed on procurement, which would be funded at $107.6 billion in fiscal 1985. This amount is over one-third of the entire DOD budget, and represents a 25 percent increase over fiscal 1984 levels. Procurement plans for the Pentagon will remain similar to those of fiscal 1984, as they generally are controlled by multi-year actions. The Army however, does, plan to activate a new light infantry division in fiscal 1985, and total active duty strength is projected to increase by 29,900 during the year.

In 1982, only 33 percent of all defense installations, 17 percent of personnel, and 39 percent of military prime contracts were located in the Northeast and Midwest. Over 75 percent of defense expenditures (excluding procurement) are scheduled to go to the South and West in fiscal 1984. Per capita spending in this category for the South and West would be $728, compared to only $290 in the Northeast and Midwest. Between 1981 and 1985, Pentagon budget authority, when adjusted for inflation, would increase almost 40 percent; in procurement, the increase would be over 83 percent.

Small Business Administration (SBA)

The administration has requested $332 million in budget authority for the SBA's Business Loan and Investment Fund program, down from $363 million in 1984 and $609 million in 1981. The president also is requesting $3.3 billion worth of loan guarantee assistance for 1985; however, the administration is seeking to phase down the program to $970 million by 1987. The budget submission also assumes virtual elimination of the SBA direct loan program. The only surviving component would provide $41 million in direct loans to minority enterprise small business investment companies (MESBICs), the same amount requested in 1984. Small businesses are vital to the Northeast-Midwest region; one study found that in the Northeast alone, from 1969 to 1976 small businesses created 166 percent of net new jobs, more than making up for job losses in large companies.●

FEDERAL GRANT REFUSED

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, if there is any truth in the old adage that actions speak louder than words, it is certainly demonstrated in the commendable action of my constituent, Mr. Joe Shipman, general sales manager of Navajo Forest Products Industries in Navajo, N. Mex. Mr. Shipman, and members of the board of directors of the Wood Moulding & Millwork Producers Association, upon being notified that they had been awarded a Federal grant of $217,000 from the U.S. Department of Commerce, refused the money.

The board of directors gave as their reason for this action:

It is our view that all such programs should be discontinued until the Federal deficit is brought under control.

The Federal deficit is of such mammoth proportions that obviously no single measure will solve the problem. I continue to believe the Congress should consider a package that will provide for—

First, reasonable reductions in the growth of entitlement programs;

Second, reasonable reductions in the expanding defense programs; and Third, reasonable adjustments in our tax rates.

You may recall Samuel Johnson's observation that "to do nothing is in every man's power." This is so. But Joe Shipman and the Wood Moulding & Millwork Producers have made a first step in the State of New Mexico. I urge the Reagan administration in Washington to take a page from their notebook.

I would like to share with my colleagues the letters of Mr. Shipman and the board of directors of the Wood Moulding & Millwork Producers Association. The text of the letters is as follows:

NAVAJO FOREST PRODUCTS INDUSTRIES,
Navajo, N. Mex., December 30, 1983.

Hon. BILL RICHARDSON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. RICHARDSON: The Board of Directors of Wood Moulding & Millwork Producers Association recently turned down a cooperative agreement with the U.S. Department of Commerce, International Trade Administration, Office of Trade Adjustment Assistance, Technical Assistance Division.

While this $217,000 grant might have helped our industry in the long run, the Board of Directors acted prudently in thinking of our country first and our association second. The Board's reason for this action. . . . "It is our view that all such programs should be discontinued until the federal deficit is brought under control."

Our firm concurs with the action taken by the Board of Directors and we commend them on this action. To this end, we express to you our own concern for the deficit and a desire for you, our representative to take whatever action necessary to eliminate the federal deficit.

Your comments and views will be appreciated.

Cordially,

JOSEPH T. SHIPMAN,
General Sales Manager.

WOOD MOULDING & MILLWORK PRODUCERS,
Portland, Oreg., December 13, 1983.

Mr. DANIEL F. HARRINGTON,
Director, Technical Assistance Division, Office of Trade Adjustment Assistance, U.S. Department of Commerce, Washington, D.C.

Mr. HARRINGTON: After additional consideration, and in view of the federal deficit, the Board of Directors of Wood Moulding & Millwork Producers Association has decided the association will not become involved in the TAAC program.

It is our view that all such programs should be discontinued until the federal deficit is brought under control.

For Wood Moulding & Millwork Producers Association's Board of Directors:

Gary D. Moore, President, Cascade Wood Products, Inc.

Loren G. Forrister, Vice President, Forest Products Company.

Theodore R. Allen, Treasurer, Mt. Taylor Millwork, Inc.

Leonard G. Richert, Immediate Past-President, Challenge Lumber Products, Inc.

Bernard J. Tomasko, Executive Vice President, Wood Moulding & Millwork Producers Association.

Charles G. Cannon, Contact Lumber Company.

Tim Drury, Louisiana-Pacific Corporation.

Robert W. Gonsalves, Western Moulding Company, Inc.

Kieran P. Madden, Ponderosa Mouldings, Inc.

Earl J. Moore, Corning Moulding Corporation.

J.D. Robbins, Klamath Moulding Mill, Inc.

Jeff Setzer, Setzer Forest Products.

John Sked, Jr., American Forest Products Company.

Charles Vignal, Canadian Millwork, Inc. (CMI).

BERNARD J. TOMASKO,
Executive Vice President.●

TRIBUTE TO MEMBERS OF LOCAL NO. 44

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, February 24, 1984, the Sheetmetal Workers Local No. 44 of Wilkes-Barre, Pa. will be honoring 30 of their members with 25-year pins for their service and dedication to the local.

The members receiving pins this year are: James Austin, Grant Bachman, Bill Borton, David Brown, Bill Burns, Joe Ciavarell, Tom Conroy, Andy DeStanfano, Bill Entz, John Everett, Paul Free, Gerald Heck, Ralph Isley, Walter Johns, Ed Kaleshefski, Ed Klein, Al Madara, Charles Milbrand, Andy Petroski, Charles Phoenix, Dan Pisarcik, George Robertine, Vince Savinelli, Adam Semanski, Mitch Sobocinski, Fred Thieman, Don Walsh, Ed Wojtal, Norm Wydila, and Joe Splendido. These pins will be awarded at the Plains American Legion, Carey Street, Plains, Pa.

Local No. 44 became part of the Sheetmetal Workers International on June 19, 1939, under General President Robert Byron and General Secretary William O'Brien.

Mr. Speaker, I join with the entire membership of this local under the management of Thomas Austin, Jr., in paying tribute to these outstanding members.●

GRENADA AND THE PRESS

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, it is noteworthy that a survey of American students on Grenada has found that 92 percent of those questioned approved the President's decision ordering our forces to rescue them.

The survey, conducted by George Washington University's media analysis project, also found that two out of three believed the President was right to hold back the press when our troops landed. As these were the persons whose lives were directly at stake, their views carry special weight.

Curiously, this survey does not seem to have received very much attention in the press. I call to my colleagues' attention the following article from the Washington Times of January 19, 1984.

STUDENTS IN GRENADA HAIL CHIEF, RIP PRESS

(By Carol Innerst)

A new survey of the American medical students on Grenada has found that the students approved of President Reagan and the invasion much more strongly than first thought—and of the press much less than first thought.

Two out of three of the students returning to St. George's Medical College said President Reagan was right to hold the press back when U.S. troops invaded Grenada in October, two George Washington University researchers said yesterday after spending last week on the island interviewing students.

They found the students even more enthusiastic about the president's decision than the American public at large.

According to Dr. Michael Robinson, director of George Washington University's Media Analysis Project, 64 percent of the students interviewed felt reporters should not have been permitted to accompany U.S. troops when they arrived in Grenada because it would have jeopardized the safety of the students, the safety of the reporters themselves and the need for secrecy.

Just under 40 percent of the students interviewed said the press that had covered them "did not behave in a responsible manner." At the same time, "only 3 percent of those interviewed thought the American soldiers had behaved irresponsibly," said Maura Clancy, assistant director of the research project.

Ninety-two percent of those questioned believed the president did the right thing.

Mrs. Clancy said about half the students who left have returned. Others, described as more "gunshy," are on Barbados where a convent has been rented and classes are starting up for the new semester.

The research data were based on interviews with about 115 medical students who are U.S. citizens.

The pair went to Grenada to see whether a systematic survey would reinforce the media-based images about student opinion that emerged after the invasion.

"What we found was these impressions were understated," Mrs. Clancy said.

In a test vote between Mr. Reagan and Democratic presidential candidate Walter Mondale, 80 percent of the students back on Grenada voted for Mr. Reagan.

The Media Analysis Project is a foundation-funded research project that studies how the major media treat public policy news.●

FAA POLICE BILL

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to correct the inequitable pay problem of Federal Aviation Administration airport police. My distinguished colleagues from Maryland, Mr. BARNES and Mr. HOYER, join me in this effort along with my fellow Virginian, Mr. PARRIS. Senator PAUL TRIBLE of Virginia will introduce a companion bill next week in the Senate.

This problem was brought to our attention by the Federal police officers at the area's Washington National and Dulles International Airports—the only federally owned and operated airports in the country. These police officers shared with us the hardships placed on them by inequitable salary schedules and the resultant inadequate staffing levels. The staffing problems were resolved last fall by regulation; however, the Department of Transportation's request to the Office of Personnel Management for pay relief went largely unheeded.

The only pay relief these officers have actually received during the past 15 years came in 1974 with adoption of a DOT special pay rates request. These regulatory pay requests, however, are defined as temporary in nature and include sunset provisions. The 1974 effort to provide equitable pay for these officers had totally eroded by 1979. Five years have passed since then and these employees have fallen seriously behind other comparable civil service employees, other Federal law enforcement personnel, and area police departments.

We supported DOT's efforts to alleviate this problem through a special pay rates package and were disappointed with the marginal relief OPM provided. We do feel, however, that a permanent solution to this problem should be sought. For this reason we are establishing a statutory special pay rate for the airport police officers thereby treating them in the same manner as other Federal police forces such as the Library of Congress Police, National Zoo Police, and U.S. Park Police who have had their pay rates established through special pay legislation. This type of relief is long overdue.

Although the entire DOT package was not accepted by OPM, we feel the figures and proposals made by that request reflected a reasonable attempt to provide parity for the FAA police with other Federal law enforcement personnel. Therefore, we are incorporating the pay package request of Secretary Dole in our legislation. The figures used in deriving the pay schedule listed in the bill were determined through a composite of the pay rates for other Federal police officers and the police departments of the surrounding metropolitan area.

To better understand the problem at hand, I provide the following. Police protection at National and Dulles International Airports is provided daily to approximately 50,000 people. In 1982, these airports were used by over 16 million passengers and visitors. The airports' boundaries encompass approximately 11,000 acres, much of which is used for aircraft operations and must be patrolled to maintain adequate security 24 hours each day. The level and scope of police coverage by the FAA police are comparable to the law enforcement requirements of an average-sized community.

This community comparison is reinforced not only by the actual population statistics, land area, and property values protected, but also by comparison of the types of emergencies and other law enforcement incidents that occur at the area airports and in a municipality. In addition, the airports servicing the Nation's Capital, and indeed the capital of the free world, are located in a unique geopolitical environment, serving elected officials of not only the United States but leaders and diplomats from throughout the world. This fact makes these airports more vulnerable to terrorist activities and subject to a higher level of media coverage and scrutiny by the police.

I point out these facts to illustrate the unique job responsibilities of the FAA police. The daily duties and stress they encounter would seem to warrant salary and benefits levels comparable to other Federal police forces; however, that is not the case. The pay for FAA police ranges anywhere from $3,200 to $6,600 less than salaries for police officers at the Library of Congress and Park Service, respectively.

The discrepancies between pay for these officers is not substantiated by the differences of duties performed. In a July 1981 draft Study of Protective Occupations, the Office of Personnel Management found that Federal police work is diverse with differing levels of complexity and responsibility for individual officers and special, sometimes unique, missions for whole forces. Officers stationed in an around most office buildings are likely to encounter situations such as theft, robbery, vandalism, and would less frequently encounter assaults, bomb threats, rapes, or civil disorders. The bulk of any workday in this "closed" police environment would involve checking identification in limited access areas, enforcing parking regulations, and occasionally assisting persons in emergency situations. For example, police officers at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and those at the Supreme Court whose compensation is based on special legislation, spend most of their time checking ID's, issuing parking tickets, and giving information to tourists.

In contrast, the airport police function in an "open" police environment. the number of passengers and visitors to the airports in not a finite entity and continues to increase as air travel becomes a more economical means of travel. I have talked with police officers at National Airport, in particular, who feel that the Metro station has facilitated easier access to the airport for the general nonflying public and may have contributed to the increase of armed holdups, number of stolen cars, pickpockets, credit card fraud, vagrance, and property crime at the airport since the station opened. With approximately 50,000 people using National and Dulles Airports every day, the variety of situations that must be dealt with by the police includes violent crimes such as murder, robbery, and aggravated assault, as well as possession and/or distribution of drugs, possession of weapons, and fraud.

There is little similarity in complexity of situations encountered by the FAA airport police officers who operate in an "open" police environment and the officers of the Supreme Court and the Library of Congress who operate in a "closed" police environment. Yet the salaries for these officers differ substantially as outlined earlier.

If the compensation comparison is extended to local non-Federal jurisdictions and to police forces of other airports, the FAA airport police force compares even less favorably. Yet the responsibilities of the FAA airport police are comparable to those of other jurisdictions such as the Alexandria and Arlington police forces, U.S. Park Police, Capitol Police, and the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority Police, all of whom operate in a similar "open" environment.

Due to the lack of parity with other neighboring Federal law enforcement agencies, the FAA airport police have become a training ground for these other agencies. The younger officers take the opportunity to transfer to another Federal or non-Federal agency when the opportunity presents itself. I do not believe this represents the best expenditure of taxpayer funds.

We believe the case is clear that the current situation needs immediate correction. For this reason, we urge adoption of this package and passage of this legislation in a timely fashion to resolve this inequity.

A section-by-section analysis and the bill follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

FEDERAL AIRPORTS POLICE SALARY ACT

Section 1. The title of the bill is the "Federal Airport Police Salary Act."

Section 2. Immediately following Section 5375 which details the pay schedules for National Zoological Park police, Section 5376 as "Police Forces of Washington National Airport and Dulles International Airport" is added.

The Airport Police Salary Schedule is listed and consists of 9 levels of positions: Level 1—entry-level police officers; level 2—airport police officers; level 3—special functions officer; level 4—sergeant; level 5—lieutenant; level 6—captain; level 7—deputy inspector; level 8—inspector, and level 9—chief of police. These positions were previously designated by particular grades; however, they will not be listed as a level rather than a GS grade.

Under this section, airport police would be subject to the same periodic step increases as outlined in Section 5335 and Section 5336 of the U.S. Code which govern GS employees. Each level has 10 steps which are corresponding steps to the current general schedule step and grade system. These level and step determinations apply only to police force employees of the Federal Aviation Administration at Washington National Airport and Dulles International Airport.

To convert from steps-in-grade to steps-in-level, employees will retain the current step of their general schedule rating and move to the corresponding step listed in the level structure outlined in section 2 of this act—they will essentially retain the same step.

The conversion from the general schedule to the level system and any pay increases associated with this conversion shall not be construed as a periodic step increase as outlined in section 5335 of the U.S. Code.

The pay of employee covered under this act shall be reduced as a result of enactment of this bill.

Section 3. Although these employees are no longer subject to general provisions of the Code governing general schedule employees, they will be subject to the same comparability pay increases as general schedule employees.

Section 4. This section insures that FAA police are still subject to the retention rights granted general schedule employees.

Section 5. FAA police could be granted hazardous duty differential pay under this section. These police officers are currently subject to this portion of title V although Office of Personnel Management has never designated these employees eligible for actual receipt of pay under this provision. The inclusion of this portion of the legislation does not entitle FAA police personnel to hazardous duty differential pay; however, should, in the future, OPM determine these employees as eligible for the differential, this section of the legislation would make payment of such rates possible.

Section 6. This pay schedule will become effective the first pay period 30 calendar days after the date of enactment of this legislation. The salaries of FAA police will reflect these new rates in the applicable pay period after enactment.

To convert from grades to level, employees now listed as GS-4 will be rated at level 1; GS-5 employees, level 2; GS-6, level 3; GS-7, level 4; GS-8, level 5; GS-9, level 6; GS-10, level 7; GS-11, level 8; and GS-12, level 9.

H.R. 4748

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Federal Airport Police Salary Act".

ESTABLISHMENT OF PAY SCALE

SEC. 2. (a)(1) Subchapter VII of chapter 52 of title 5, United States Code, relating to Federal employee pay rates and systems, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 5376. Police forces of Washington National Airport and Dulles International Airport

"(a) Each employee in a position within the police force of Washington National Airport or the police force of Dulles International Airport shall be entitled, under regulations prescribed by the Office of Personnel Management, to have his pay fixed in accordance with the following schedule:

AIRPORT POLICE SALARY SCHEDULE

Grade and title	Annual rates
	Step 1	Step 2	Step 3	Step 4	Step 5	Step 6	Step 7	Step 8	Step 9	Step 10

"(b) Classification of positions the rate of pay of which is fixed under subsection (a) shall be under such regulations as the Office of Personnel Management shall prescribe.

"(c) The provisions of sections 5335 and 5336 of this title, relating to periodic step-increases, shall be applicable to employees covered under this section. In applying such provisions to employees under this section, the references contained in such sections to grades and pay rates shall be considered to be references to grades and pay rates specified under subsection (a) of this section.

"(d) For purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'police force of Washington National Airport' refers to employees of the Federal Aviation Administration appointed under section 4(a) of the Act of June 29, 1940, entitled 'An Act to provide for the administration of the Washington National Airport, and for other purposes'; and

"(2) the term 'police force of Dulles International Airport' refers to employees of the Federal Aviation Administration appointed under section 8(a) of the Act of September 7, 1950, entitled 'An Act to authorize the construction, protection, operation, and maintenance of a public airport in or in the vicinity of the District of Columbia'."

(2) The table of sections for chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately after the item relating to section 5375 the following new item:

"5376. Police forces of Washington National Airport and Dulles International Airport.".

(b) Section 5102(c) of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out the word "or" at the end of paragraph (26);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (27) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(28) members of the police force of Washington National Airport and members of the police force of Dulles International Airport, whose pay is fixed under section 5376 of this title.".

PAY COMPARABILITY

SEC. 3. (a) Section 5301(c) of title 5, United States Code, relating to the pay comparability system, is amended in paragraph (1) by inserting before the semicolon the following: ", or section 5376 of this title, relating to the Airport Police Salary Schedule".

(b) Paragraph (1) of section 5303(a) of title 5, United States Code, relating to authority to prescribe higher minimum rates of pay, is amended by inserting "or 5376" after "5332".

(c) Section 5304 of title 5, United States Code, relating to policies and regulations implementing pay comparability, is amended by inserting "section 5376 of this title," before "chapter 51".

GRADE AND PAY RETENTION

SEC. 4. Section 5361 of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1), by inserting "or section 5376" after "chapter 51"; and

(2) in paragraph (5), by inserting "the Airport Police Salary Schedule under section 5376 of this title," after "the General Schedule,".

HAZARDOUS DUTY DIFFERENTIAL

SEC. 5. The second sentence of section 5545(d) of title 5, United States Code, relating to pay differentials for hazardous or intermittent duty, is amended by inserting ", or section 5376 of this title," after "chapter 53 of this title".

EFFECTIVE DATE; TRANSITION PROVISIONS

SEC. 6. (a) The amendments made by this Act shall become effective at the beginning of the first applicable pay period which commences on or after the thirtieth day following the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b)(1) Effective on the effective date of the amendments made by this Act, initial adjustments of the rates of basic pay of individuals employed as members of the police force of Washington National Airport or Dulles International Airport on such date shall be made in accordance with paragraph (2).

(2)(A) An individual whose pay is within a grade of the General Schedule immediately before the effective date of the amendments made by this Act shall be paid—

(i) within the appropriate grade of the Airport Police Salary Schedule under section 5376(a) of title 5, United States Code (as added by section 2 of this Act), as determined under subparagraph (B); and

(ii) at that step of such grade which corresponds numerically to the step of the grade of the General Schedule at which such individual was paid immediately before such effective date.

(B) For purposes of making the initial adjustment in the rate of basic pay for any individual under this subsection, the appropriate grade under the Airport Police Salary Schedule is the grade appearing across from the grade of the General Schedule at which such individual was paid as a member of the police force of Washington National Airport or Dulles International Airport, as the case may be, immediately before the effective date of the amendments made by this Act, as follows:

General schedule grade:	Airport police salary Schedule grade

GS-5	Level 2
GS-6	Level 3
GS-7	Level 4

	Airport police salary
GS-8	Level 5
GS-9	Level 6
GS-10	Level 7
GS-11	Level 8
GS-12	Level 9

(c)(1) An increase in pay by reason of an initial adjustment under the preceding provisions of this section shall not be deemed to be an equivalent increase in pay within the meaning of section 5335 of title 5, United States Code, for purposes of step-increases under the pay structure established by section 5376 of such title (as added by section 2 of this Act).

(2) For purposes of periodic step-increases under such pay structure, an employee shall be credited, as of the effective date of the amendments made by this Act, with all service since such employee's last periodic step-increase under section 5335 of title 5, United States Code, before such effective date.

(d) No rate of basic pay in effect immediately before the effective date of the amendments made by this Act shall be reduced by reason of this Act.

(e) For purposes of this section, the term "police force of Washington National Airport" and the term "police force of Dulles International Airport" each has the meaning given such term by section 5376 of title 5, United States Code (as added by section 2 of this Act).●

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, the chronic indebtedness of many State unemployment compensation systems require prompt attention, both in State legislatures and here in Congress. Financial solvency is paramount, and will only be achieved through a major overhaul of the system.

Over 20 States have had to borrow funds from the Federal Government in order to provide compensation. Many States continue to borrow. Interest on these loans are accruing into millions of dollars, adding further to the State debt burden.

Unemployment compensation should neither be a dole, nor a substitute for work, nor an incentive not to work. As noted by the following Minneapolis Star and Tribune editorial, the program should be comprehensively overhauled to fit the original intention of the program which was to protect temporarily Americans out of work through no fault of their own. The editorial follows:

DO MORE THAN TINKER WITH JOBLESS BENEFITS

The distressed Minnesota unemployment compensation system apparently will get legislative attention in 1984. Attention is overdue. The system owes more than $400 million to the federal government, which is one reason business groups have made reform their top legislative priority for 1984. Unfortunately, most of the reform ideas—good though many are—involve only tinkering to bring benefits paid in balance with taxes collected. But financial solvency alone does not define a good unemployment-compensation system. And few seem willing to re-examine the basic premises of unemployment compensation to see if they remain appropriate.

When the federal-state unemployment compensation program was first devised a half-century ago, the U.S. economy and the U.S. workforce were different. Single-wage, two-parent families predominated. The father worked and the mother remained at home to rear children. Thus, when unemployment-compensation designers determined that the system should make up 50 percent of a worker's previous gross income—subject to maximums—in most cases that amounted to 50 percent of a family's income.

That simple scenario no longer holds, for many reasons. Paramount is the prevalence of two-worker households. Nearly two-thirds of American families now have two or more incomes, and the number continues to grow. For those families, the loss of one income may be a hardship, but it is not the catastrophe that it was—and still is—for single-wage families. If unemployment compensation's purpose is still to make up 50 percent of a family's income, unemployed workers in two-income families need less individual compensation. A 1979 Government Accounting Office study found that when other income was included, unemployment-compensation claimants received an average 64 percent of their working income.

The years since 1935 have also seen the growth of another group—the single-parent provider. When these people—predominantly low-paid women—lose their single income, their fall into poverty is precipitous, and their efforts to climb back are difficult. For them, unemployment compensation equal to 50 percent of income may not suffice.

Other things have changed since 1935. One is tax rates. They have gone up. In 1935, unemployment compensation equal to 50 percent of gross income was close to 50 percent of take-home pay. Today, 50 percent of gross income may exceed 60 percent of take-home pay.

Still another change is the proliferation of welfare programs that cushion the effect of unemployment. In 1935 there were no food stamps, no Aid to Families with Dependent Children, no Medicaid. These programs lessen the amount of unemployment compensation needed.

Some experts oppose redesigning unemployment compensation to take account of these changes. They argue that the judgments involved smack of welfare and destroy unemployment compensation's "insurance" character. But the 1935 unemployment-compensation system was not developed in a vacuum. The decision to make up 50 percent of a worker's wage is itself a judgment about need—a judgment based on worker characteristics at that time. Now those characteristics have changed, and new judgments are needed. The unemployment compensation system should not merely be solvent, it should serve its stated purpose.●

EYE RESEARCH NETTING RESULTS

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I call attention of my colleagues to recent strides in eye research and their effects on preventing blindness in the United States. A recent article in the Chicago Tribune entitled "Science Dimming Threat Of Blindness," printed on January 22, 1984 explains that "the past 10 years have possibly been the most remarkable in opthalmology in over 100 years."

The new space age technology, mostly developed at the National Eye Institute—which finances 80 percent of eye research in the United States—has created "lasers that permit surgery inside the eye without having to open the delicate eyeball; artificial lenses that restore normal vision; drugs and surgical techniques that dramatically improve visual handicaps; operating microscopes that greatly expand the field of view for surgeons; and fine sutures that mend incisions with practically no trace."

These tools have allowed opthalmologists to treat thousands of patients who would ordinarily have gone blind. For example, with the use of lasers and artificial lasers, cataracts, which are the leading cause of blindness in the world, rarely cause loss of sight in the United States.

I commend the National Eye Institute and others on their wonderful work and hope that the advances of the future will be as fruitful as those of the recent past.

The following is a full transcript of the Chicago Tribune article:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Jan. 22, 1984]

SCIENCE DIMMING THREAT OF BLINDNESS

(By Ronald Kotulak)

More than 90 percent of what we know about the world comes through our eyes. So it is little wonder that a recent survey by the National Society to Prevent Blindness showed that Americans fear blindness above all other medical disabilities.

But the threat behind that fear is rapidly diminishing. A decade of revolutionary advances in eye care has reduced the risk of blindness to its lowest point in history.

Diseases that meant almost certain loss of sight in the recent past are routinely treated, sparing tens of thousands of people what has been called a "living death."

"The restoration of lost sight is an extraordinary achievement," said Lew Wasserman, president of Research to Prevent Blindness, an organization devoted to eye research.

"So too is the preservation of vision threatened by blinding diseases. Both are being accomplished today on a scale never before envisioned—through scientific and medical knowledge only recently attained."

"The past 10 years have possibly been the most remarkable in ophthalmology in over 100 years," said Dr. Frank Newell, a University of Chicago professor and editor of the American Journal of Ophthalmology.

The revolution in eye care is being fueled by Space Age technology: lasers that permit surgery inside the eye without having to open the delicate eyeball; artificial lenses that restore normal vision; drugs and surgical techniques that dramatically improve visual handicaps; operating microscopes that greatly expand the field of view for surgeons; and fine sutures that mend incisions with practically no trace.

These striking advances are a far cry from a decade ago, when eye care primarily involved prescribing glasses, plucking out cataracts and giving drops for glaucoma.

"Ophthalmology is being transformed by an influx of new ideas and technologies from other sciences;" said Dr. Carl Kupfer, director of the federal National Eye Institute, which finances 80 percent of eye research in the United States.

The payoff has been tremendous. The four major causes of blindness in the United States—cataracts, diabetic retinopathy, glaucoma and senile macular degeneration—are being tamed.

Cataracts are the biggest cause of blindness in the world, having stolen the sight of more than 17 million people in other nations. But they are so successfully treated in this country that they rarely lead to blindness among Americans. In addition, thousands of people who were left visual cripples after having cataracts removed years ago are getting back near-normal vision with permanent lens implants.

Blindness from glaucoma, which has ended the eyesight of more than 62,200 Americans and is the leading cause of blindness in the United States, can be prevented in 96 percent of the patients if it is caught early and treated properly.

Blindness in the United States in percent of blind people

Major causes of blindness:	Percent
Glaucoma	12.5
Macular degeneration	11.6
Senile cataract	8.3

Diabetic retinopathy	6.6
Leading causes of new blindness each year:
Macular degeneration	16.8
Glaucoma	11.5
Diabetic retinopathy	10.1
Senile cataract	9.8
Optic nerve atrophy	4.3

Laser beams are providing a new way to treat glaucoma, the devastating build-up of pressure inside the eye that destroys the optic nerve.

The laser also has opened the door to preventing many cases of blindness among victims of diabetes and sickle-cell anemia. Their illnesses often lead to diabetic or sickle-cell retinopathy, disorders in which fragile blood vessels inside the eye leak, filling the eye with a vision-blocking pool of blood.

Vision loss from macular degeneration, which is emerging as the No. 1 cause of blindness as the population of senior citizens increases, can be prevented in some cases with laser blasts. The laser destroys abnormal blood vessels at the back of the eye that, if allowed to rupture, can destroy the sensitive macula, the thumbtack-size tissue at the back of the eye that governs central vision.

In other instances, sight can be joyously returned to people who have endured total or partial blindness.

Patients blinded by diabetic retinopathy, for example, once considered a permanent loss of vision, are getting back their sight. Surgeons are entering what used to be the "no man's land" in the interior of the eye to delicately remove blood clots and other opaque deposits.

To those whose sight has been restored, the new technology can seem miraculous.

Lynette Porter, an 18-year-old high school senior and cheerleader from Munster, Ind., had lost sight in her left eye because of a rare infection that clouded the vitreous gel that fills the eye.

Local doctors told her that vision in her infected eye was permanently lost. But last December surgeons at the University of Illinois Eye and Ear Infirmary used delicate instruments to extract the opaque gel and replace it with a clear solution.

"I thought I'd always be blind in one eye," she said. "About a month after the operation, I could see again. It's a miracle, just fantasic."

Her mother, Linda, said, "We kept telling her the story about God healing the blind man and that if He did it for him, He'd do it for her. Our prayers were answered."

"The technical revolution has changed my life," said D. Morton Goldberg, head of ophthalmology at the University of Illinois. "It has changed the way I look at patients."

The revolution also has changed the courses taught in ophthalmology schools. Much of what was in textbooks only 10 years ago has become outmoded. Within the last five years, most of the nation's ophthalmologists have had to scurry back to school.

"I don't do anything the way I did during my residency period, which I finished in 1967," Goldberg said.

"Many diseases which were thought to be hopeless are now eminently treatable. Although there are still some risks, the overall outlook is much more optimistic than it has ever been, and it seems to be increasing."

That means new hope for those threatened with blindness or eyesight impairment. Of the 46,600 new cases of blindness that occur each year the National Society to Prevent Blindness estimates, half could be prevented with early detection. Nearly 500,000 Americans are legally blind.

Another 11.5 million Americans suffer from some type of serious visual loss, and 103 million, or nearly half the U.S. population wear corrective lenses.

Many things can go wrong with the delicate parts of the liquid-filled orbs that allow us to see.

In the eye, light first passes through the cornea, the outer covering, and then travels through the lens. The cornea can become infected or damaged, or can suffer from a genetic distortion and may need to be replaced. The lens, over time, may cloud and become a cataract.

The job of the cornea and lens is to focus light on the retina, a lining of light-sensitive cells at the back of the eye. The retina is an extension of the brain, the organ of vision.

The retina's photoreceptor cells convert light into electric signals that travel to the brain, where they are sorted into the images we recognize as vision. Many things, from abnormal blood vessels to infections to age-related degeneration, can damage those cells, blocking signals from reaching the brain.

The cornea and lens are nourished by a clear liquid called the aqueous humor. Like a sink with a running faucet, aqueous humor is constantly being produced and constantly being drained. When this drain is blocked, pressure builds up inside the eye to cause glaucoma.

The center of the eye is filled with a transparent, gel-like substance called the vitreous humor, which helps keep the eye's shape. Strands forming in the gelatinous material can block vision, or they can pull the retina from its foundation, causing retinal tears or detachments. It is this vitreous humor that also becomes filled with blood in diabetic retinopathy and other disorders.

Many of these disorders are rapidly succumbing to the laser. Eye doctors made the first medical use of the laser in the late '60s, and they continue to lead in its development. The majority of ophthalmologists use them routinely.

Unlike regular light sources that spread rays in all directions, a laser produces a narrow beam that can travel a needle-thin path for extremely long distances.

To produce a laser, a material such as krypton or argon is energized, usually by an electric spark. The material's atoms give off energy in the form of synchronized light waves that produce an extremely concentrated and intense laser beam.

Depending on the power, the narrow beam of light can be used for many jobs. At low intensities, it is used to diagnose disorders; at high intensities it is used for surgery without scalpels—spot welding tissue, zapping precise holes in targeted areas and vaporizing internal structures.

The laser is the most perfect tool devised for eye therapy. Most of the eye's internal structure can be viewed from the outside. Laser beams take advantage of this unusual access by harmlessly passing through the cornea and lens to hit diseased tissue.

The new arsenal includes lasers employing argon, krypton and combined helium-neon gases, and, most recently, the YAG laser, which has been called the "dream machine."

The YAG laser was developed for the Swiss watch industry to drill holes in jewels serving as bearings. Unlike other lasers that use heat to burn tissue, its microscopic lightning bolts actually tear atoms asunder, ionizing the target into a microbubble of steam.

It gets its powerful beam from neodymium, a rare metallic element, which is encased in a crystal of yittrium-aluminum-garnet, whence its name is derived. Introduced in this country only in 1982, the YAG laser is expected to have enormous impact.

"If you had told me two years ago that I could remove opaque scar tissue from the pupil of the eye, allowing people who could only see shadows to read a book again, I'd say you were crazy," Goldberg said. "But, in fact, I'm doing five to six patients a week now with the YAG laser."

Lasers can perform four operations inside the eye:

Coagulation. When the red krypton or blue-green argon laser beams hit tissue inside the eye, they create tiny hot spots from 100 to 140 degrees. These hot spots coagulate the tissue to form spot welds made of extremely small scars that are useful in reattaching retinas or sealing off abnormal blood vessels.

Vaporization. At higher temperatures, from 212 to 1,112 degrees, laser beams can vaporize such targets as cancers.

Disruption. With the YAG laser, surgeons can focus a beam to an intense point that cuts tissue inside the eye as easily as a scalpel. The burst of energy lasts for only a billionth or a trillionth of a second, but it can reach temperatures of 27,000 degrees and a power level of 10 million watts.

Radiation. Eye tumors treated with chemicals that make them extremely sensitive to light can be destroyed by a low-intensity laser beam.

For patients, the laser is a tremendous boon. Laser surgery means no instruments inserted into the eye, no risk of infection and little or no pain. Operations that used to take hours are done in minutes. The long hospital stays from eye surgery are being eliminated, and many procedures are performed on an outpatient basis.

The following is a listing of the eye dis orders on which lasers are proving most effective:

SECONDARY CATARACTS

As the number of cataract operations skyrockets—exceeding 650,000 a year—surgeons are faced with a growing side effect, the formation of secondary cataracts. When surgeons remove the clouded lens that forms the cataract, they leave behind the membrane sac that held the lens to support an implanted artificial lens. These membranes frequently become clouded over time, causing secondary cataracts and blindness.

Surgeons were forced to cut into the eye to open the clouded membrane so that light could pass through. The YAG laser can blast a hole through the membrane in a painless office procedure that takes only a few minutes. The YAG laser is not used to remove the original cataract, which is surgically extracted.

So successful is the procedure that the American Academy of Ophthalmology recently recommended that the YAG laser be used over conventional surgery for secondary cataracts.

DIABETIC RETINOPATHY

Thanks to the argon laser's ability to photocoagulate tissue, "an untold number of diabetics have been saved from visual impairment," said the eye institute's Kupfer.

Diabetic retinopathy is the proliferation of abnormal blood vessels in the back of the eye, a vision-threatening disorder that affects 50 percent of the people who have had diabetes for 12 years or more. Those fragile vessels frequently rupture. Blood leaking into the eye blocks light from passing through, causing blindness.

In 1976, a study by the eye institute showed that a barrage of as many as 2,000 or more microscopic spot welds on the retina could dry up the abnormal vessels, reducing the risk of blindness by 60 percent. The institute is sponsoring a study to determine if photocoagulation in earlier cases will further reduce the risk.

GLAUCOMA

Glaucoma is the leading cause of irreversible blindness in the United States. The disease, often called the "sneak thief of sight," affects an estimated 2 million Americans, but half don't know they have it.

Ninety percent of the victims have chronic glaucoma. In this condition, the drain, a spongy ring called the trabecular meshwork, becomes blocked. The liquid in the eye builds up, creating pressure that damages the optic nerve, slowly and painlessly destroying sight.

Since side vision goes first, many victims do not seek help until extensive damage has been done. The disease, which tends to run in families, can be detected by a simple eye test that measures intraocular pressure.

In most cases, eye drops and oral medication will lower the pressure by decreasing the production of aqueous humor. Where that fails, the laser raises new hopes for controlling the devastating disorder.

A series of 60 to 100 tiny argon laser burns spaced evenly around the spongy ring is remarkably effective in opening the drain. Most patients still have to take some medication to lower pressure, but some are able to discontinue drugs.

"While much research work remains to be done . . . this new concept of apparently reversing the basic mechanism of glaucoma offers real hope of a cure for this disease," said Dr. James B. Wise of the University of Oklahoma College of Medicine.

The remaining 10 percent of cases involve acute glaucoma, and for these patients the outlook is even brighter. In acute glaucoma, the outflow of fluid through the pupil can be blocked by various means, including the lens pressing too tightly against the iris. Unlike chronic glaucoma, this condition is very painful and can cause blindness if not corrected in one to two days.

Surgeons used to have to open the eye surgically, a procedure fraught with complications. With YAG and argon lasers, they can blast holes through the iris, instantly making an outlet for the pent-up fluid. Since the iris does not heal, the hole remains open permanently, curing acute glaucoma.

MACULAR DEGENERATION

A study by the eye institute completed in 1982 revealed that laser therapy can prevent blindness from senile macular degeneration, which has become the leading cause of new cases of blindness in this country. The disease, whose incidence increases with age, is a deterioration of sensitive eye tissue.

The good news is that laser photocoagulation can prevent 13,000 new cases of blindness a year—one out of every seven people who become blind.

The bad news is that the severe form of the disease, in which abnormal blood vessels form in aging eyes, must be caught early. Once the blood vessels begin to proliferate and damage the retinal cells, they can cause blindness in two to three weeks.

Patients who have abnormal blood-vessel growth represent only a small portion of the people with macular degeneration, but they are the ones most likely to become blind. In the institute's study, ony 25 perent of the laser-treated eyes lost vision, compared with 60 percent rate of vision loss in untreated eyes.

To catch the severe form in its treatable phase, all people over age 50 should have regular eye examinations, medical authorities say. They recommend that an eye doctor be contacted immediately if any of the following symptoms develop: blurring of letters on a page; distortion of straight lines, such as the edge of a door; or a dark or empty area in the center of vision.

OCULAR HISTOPLASMOSIS

The newest laser magic was announced last year after an eye institute study demonstrated that the coagulating beams may be able to spare the sight of 1,500 Americans each year who suffer from ocular histoplasmosis syndrome.

The disorder, most prevalent in the Midwest and Southeast, is caused by a soil fungus. Spores produced by the fungus can be inhaled. Usually, the infection causes only a mild, cold-like respiratory disorder. In some cases the spores settle in the macula at the center of the retina and stimulate abnormal blood vessel growth. When these vessels leak, blood seeps into the sensitive macula cells and destroys central vision.

If the disorder is caught early, the fragile blood vessels can be destroyed with laser blasts, reducing the risk of blindness by 50 percent. The early symptoms of ocular histoplasmosis syndrome are similar to those of senile macular degeneration—distortion of straight lines, blurring and difficulty in reading.

EYE TUMORS

Photoradiation with a low-intensity laser has produced promising early results in shrinking eye tumors without surgery.

A drug that settles in cancerous cells but not in normal cells is injected into the patient. Exposure to a red laser beam activates the chemical to destroy only the tumor cells.

RETINAL DETACHMENTS

Lasers are one of three techniques that have raised the success rate for repairing detached retinas to 85 percent, a nearly threefold increase over the last 30 years.

In the past, patients spent up to 28 days in bed, eyes bandaged and head held immobile by sandbags. Today, the same type of patient is up and about the day after surgery.

Most detachments are preceded by retinal tearing, where the retina begins to pull away from its foundation. Symptoms, include a flicker of light at a regular point in the field of vision, or brown and black specks. If untreated, the condition leads to blindness.

The three treatment techniques are designed to reattach the retina to the back of the eye by forming a binding scar. In cases of serious detachment, a tiny belt around the eyeball creates pressure to force the torn retina back in place, where it can be spot welded.

"All this spells not only a triumph over blindness, but savings of many millions of dollars each year in the nation's bill for hospital care and lost work time," said Wasserman of Research to Prevent Blindness.●

ENERGY SECURITY: THE FREE MARKET SOLUTION

HON. TOM CORCORAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I received a Heritage Foundation executive memorandum written by Mr. Milton R. Copulos, a senior policy analyst for Heritage. The memorandum, entitled "Energy Security: The Free Market Solution," focuses on the issues raised as a result of threats to close the Strait of Hormuz.

Copulos discusses the downward trend of U.S. reliance on petroleum supplies from that area of the world as well as the moderation of petroleum prices since President Reagan decontrolled oil in January 1981. He describes the geographic dimensions of the Strait of Hormuz and concludes that the threat to close the strait is hollow in view of the large size of the strait. Finally, Copulos urges that any U.S. Government response to a petroleum shortfall be focused on the early use of the strategic petroleum reserve. He also suggests several other appropriate actions.

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of our colleagues, I would like to include the text of Mr. Copulos' statement in the RECORD at this point.

ENERGY SECURITY: THE FREE MARKET SOLUTION

Threats by both sides in the Iran/Iraq war to close the Strait of Hormuz once again have focused congressional attention on the issue of energy security. Some lawmakers equate energy security with federal oil price and allocation controls. As such, they are pressing for a reimposition of controls.

They fail to recognize, however, that the evidence is overwhelming that controls will not work. Since 1973, moreover, the world oil market has changed in fundamental ways that give the U.S. many new options in the event of an oil cut-off. More important, experience with two oil supply interruptions in a decade has demonstrated that minimizing federal obstacles in the marketplace is the only approach that ensures efficient allocation and conservation in a crisis.

Controls, for example, did little to stem the rising tide of imports. By 1977, the share of U.S. oil consumption accounted for by foreign supplies had risen to 46.5 percent of the total, up from 34.5 percent in 1973. The share coming from Arab members of OPEC (AOPEC) rose from 5.3 percent to 17.3 percent of total U.S. consumption. But once price controls were lifted, the results were dramatic. By the end of 1983, imports had dropped below their 1973 level in absolute terms and were at the lowest point in a decade as a proportion of total supplies. Moreover, the share of imports accounted for by OPEC nations in general—and AOPEC nations in particular—had plunged to levels even below those of 1973.

Prices have moderated with the removal of controls, despite predictions to the contrary by opponents of decontrol. Gasoline now sells for less, in real terms, than it did in 1980. And the nominal price is lower than in March of 1981, even though 10 cents to 14 cents have been added to the pump price in new state and federal taxes. Crude oil prices have been dropping, and few expect an increase in the near term. In short, the market is working, and working well.

Still, because surpluses can change to shortages with alarming speed, energy preparedness is essential. The question is: What form of preparedness? The answer is found in lessons of the past.

During the last two supply disruptions, the principal reason for the gasoline lines, price run-ups, and spot shortages was public fears of a loss of supply—not sharp cutbacks. Therefore, the most important action the federal government could take would be to quell public panic while the market brings supply and demand into balance. This can be accomplished most effectively through market-oriented actions which emphasize voluntary cooperation by the energy industry, in combination with early use of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve (SPR). The SPR is the keystone of a coordinated strategy to deal with an oil interruption. Its use should be announced, with much fanfare, as soon as possible after any oil interruption occurs.

In addition to releasing the SPR's oil, the Secretary of Energy can accomplish much by working closely with the oil industry as soon as an international crisis begins to materialize—and before market forces begin to compensate for the interruption in supply He can ask industrial users of fuel oil, for instance, to switch to natural gas. He can ask refiners to alter their production runs. He can ask petroleum retailers to enforce minimum purchase requirements to prevent tank topping. He can ask federal agencies to reduce their energy consumption. And he can ask utilities to maximize power pooling. By asking for such actions early in a crisis, spot shortages could be avoided.

This informal strategy would be far more effective than the legislated rules and bureaucratic plans that have failed in the past. It would allow a flexible response to a crisis, and speed up the corrective changes set in motion by the market system. A legislated strategy, in contrast, would frustrate market corrections by imposing a rigid plan on the industry.

Congress could help by enacting a measure to recycle windfall profits tax collections during a shortage, through reductions in federal withholding deductions. This would minimize the financial impact of price rises on wage earners. A portion of the tax revenues could be allocated to offest higher fuel costs. Congress could also allow the Secretary of Energy to request waivers from pollution abatement requirements for utilities and industrial firms that want to burn coal instead of oil.

It is important that Congress not allow itself to be panicked into intemperate action. For example, the threat to close the Strait of Hormuz, which precipitated the current debate, is hollow. The strait is nearly 50 nautical miles wide, with a maximum depth of well over 600 feet. Closing a waterway of those dimensions would be no simple task. Neither Iran nor Iraq possesses the naval power to blockade the strait, or the military hardware to mine it. Moreover, Iran may be making such threats, but it stands to lose far more than it would gain from such action. The threat, in other words, is perceived, not real.

Congress must learn the lessons of the past decade, and realize that the best solution to the energy security problem is actuallly the simplest: let the market work.

FRULI—A SUCCESS STORY HELPED BY AMERICAN FUNDS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, almost 8 years ago a devastating earthquake ravaged the Friuli region of Italy. One of the first nations to respond to the tragedy was the United States when Congress adopted an amendment I was proud to have sponsored to provide an initial commitment of $25 million which eventually became a total of $53 million.

On November 28, I had the pleasure of attending a ceremony and the official opening of the Friuli Exhibition in New York City. I was proud to receive a special gold medal for my work on behalf of the Friuli effort.

The tremendous work that was accomplished by the people of Friuli is worthy of our commendation. In order to get a flavor of the Friuli experience, I insert into the RECORD two items. The first is an article from the Philadelphia Inquirer and the second is a speech delivered at the opening of the exhibit by the distinguished executive director of Il Progresso newspaper my good friend Carlo Scarsini.

ITALIAN MAYORS VISIT TO THANK U.S. FOR AID AFTER EARTHQUAKE

(By Marc Kaufman)

Mostly, they wanted to hear about Frank Rizzo.

Forty-five mayors and other officials from the Friuli region of northeastern Italy, in the United States to give thanks for help they received after a devastating earthquakes in 1976, were in town yesterday for a brief tour of the historic sites.

They were polite about Philadelphia's "pride in its history" and its urban renewal, but they were clearly less than bowled over. Italian history, after all, stretches back far more than 300 years, and the renewal of Society Hill pales when compared to the almost total reconstruction of a Friulian town such as Gemona, population 11,000, which was nearly destroyed in 1976.

But when it came to Philadelphia's only mayor of Italian descent, the men and women of Friuli were peppering their guide with questions—wanting to know what local people thought of him, why he didn't win the charter change, whether he could win again.

"They all seemed to know about him," explained their guide, Anamaria Rubinic. "To them, he's a proud son of Italy, and that they like—even though he's not from Friuli." Ties that bind the old country with the new were very much on the minds yesterday of the delegation from Friuli, an autonomous region on the hilly Austrian border. Their goal in coming to the United States, explained Friulian vice president Bernardo Dal Mas, was not only to thank Americans for their help, but also to tell those of Italian descent that the area had been reborn.

"We have been able to use the tragedy of the earthquakes to modernize and improve Friuli," he said through a translator. "We want to invite people to come and see this, and to settle with us and rebuild."

The 1976 earthquakes, which killed thousands of people and leveled dozens of cities and villages, brought back many Friulians from abroad to help, Dal Mas said. He said that although few thought of staying in Friuli at first, many remained after seeing that the massive aid money from the Italian government and from abroad was transforming the area.

"The image of Italy here still comes from the tales told by fathers and grandfathers who left the country," he said. "There is a big gap in the image. We are a modern area, with high technology, now."

Special state laws favor Friulians returning to "their home," Dal Mas said. Although the region has 1.2 million people, he said that more than 5 million descendants of Friulian immigrants are scattered around the world.

Italian Counsul General Giuseppe Cassini, who joined the group for lunch, said that the region recovered from the earthquakes partly because it received $53 million from the United States, mostly through the Agency for International Development. Almost all of the villages destroyed have been reconstructed, he said, although most of the aid money did not reach the area until 1978.

"When they were in Washington," Cassini said, "the group actually gave back $3 million because they just didn't need any more aid."

Because few Italian-Americans in Philadelphia were originally from Friuli, the delegation planned only one day here, and there were no meetings with local groups. Some Philadelphians will go to New York this weekend, however, for a meeting of the "Friulian Home," an international group of descendants of Friuli.

"The people of Friuli are a tough, peculiar breed," Dal Mas said. "We are known as hardworking people, often mountain people who can build things and carve in stone."

"A person from Friuli is always from Friuli, wherever he lives."

SPEECH BY CARLO SCARSINI, NOVEMBER 28, 1983

Dear Friends, I have been asked to say a few words for the opening of this exhibition on the history and civilization of Friuli, not in my capacity of chief editor of Il Progresso (the Italian language daily published in the U.S.) but rather as a Friulian born who was brought up and schooled and made his first steps as a journalist in that very special region of Italy which we are celebrating and showing today for the first time in New York City.

Since time immemorial the Friulian people has been traveling the roads of the world, but they did so in a much more humble and unconspicuous way than, for instance, their Venetian neighbors, the sailors and merchants of the very Serene Republic. A silent and tenacious worker, the Friulian emigrant (of any trade and profession) has always been very shy, softspoken, subdued, never boasting of any special achievement. This is the nature of the Friulian people (reflected also by its folklore and its nostalgic songs) whose civilization we see here so vividly depicted and illustrated. These are, in fact, achievements of which every nation in the world would be proud.

But what is Friuli? It's the northernmost—and also easternmost—region of Italy, stretching from the Dolomites to the Yugoslav border, from the Austrian Alps to the Adriatic, its size is approximately one-third that of Massachusetts or, if you want, the double of Rhode Island. Twenty centuries of recorded history have shaped it the way it is now. The word Friuli comes from the Latin forum Julii, because Julius Caesar made it the administrative and military base of his campaigns beyond the Alps, towards the east and the north of Europe, when he was starting to build the Roman Empire.

Four or five centuries later Friuli was known as the "eastern door" of the Italian Peninsula, both for its geographical position and because it became the natural gateway of the invasions from central and eastern Europe whose populations melting with the local ones, brought down the Roman Empire but were at the same time romanized.

This special breed of people settling so between the Alps and the sea have today characteristics so diverse from, say, the Romans, the Neapolitans or the Sicilians, as a native from North Dakota can be different from a native of South Carolina. Actually, much more.

But again, Italy, notwithstanding its very old history, is a much younger sovereign nation than America. It became a unified country just when these United States were fighting the Civil War. For about fifteen centuries Italy was only a geographical entity, in which more than a dozen different nations prospered, or suffered, each with its own peculiar civilization, sometimes with different idioms, linked only by trade and commerce.

Friuli, in fact, has its own language, an offspring of Latin combined with local Celtic dialects, which flourished parallel to Italian and produced a remarkable amount of indigenous literature, spanning from the age of Dante to our days.

Quite properly, therefore, when in the early sixties the Italian state became decentralized and the regional structure was born, with considerable local powers, Friuli became an autonomous region, so much as it was during the two centuries preceding the annexation to the Republic of Venice, in 1420. The Venetian authority on Friuli lasted nearly four centuries, ending in the thunder of the Napoleonic wars, when the young French consul and then Emperor tried to unify Europe under the Aegis of France.

But, history apart, the region we are talking of combines so many interesting features and an environment so beautiful in its variety that the Italian romantic writer Ippolito Nievo—a patriot who fought with Garibaldi—called this land "a small compendium of the universe".

For our American friends who for the first time come in touch, tonight and through these images, with the Friuli region, it is proper to remind that it has been the scenary and the inspiration of one of the masterpieces of modern American literature, the famous "Farewell to Arms" by the late Ernest Hemingway, written when he was a young ambulance driver during the First World War, a war which for the first time in history saw American soldiers fighting in Europe, a war of which Friuli was one of the crucial theatres.

A big tragedy struck Friuli in the spring and summer 1976: The most devastating earthquakes in the history of the region, which killed thousands of people and leveled dozens of cities and villages. Many historic monuments were destroyed or heavily damaged. The tragedy brought back many Friulians from abroad to help.

The Government of this country and the Americans of Italian descent helped generously. (And I am particularly glad to pay homage here to our friend the Congressman Mario Biaggi who was instrumental in coordinating the effort).

With national and international aid combined, but especially through the strenuous work of its people, Friuli is today on its feet again, and, in many ways more prosperous.

I wish to conclude with an episode of which I was myself a witness last year, when a group of mayors and administrators from the urban areas of Friuli which had been most hit by the earthquake, came to Washington with a big check: 3 million dollars. That money was actually given back to the American Government because—as one of the administrators put it—"we just didn't need any more aid".

This episode, I think, speaks eloquently of the nature and of the moral fiber of the Friulian people.

With these feelings in mind, I thank you very much and I welcome everyone to this brilliant visual testimonial of an ancient and glorious civilization.●

TRIBUTE TO SANDOR YELEN, ESQ.

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, recently the city of Wilkes-Barre honored an outstanding citizen for service to his community. Attorney Sandor Yelen, a resident of Kingston, Pa., was honored by the mayor of the city of Wilkes-Barre, the Honorable Thomas V. McLaughlin, for excellence far beyond the call of duty as solicitor for the Wilkes-Barre Police pension fund.

On December 12, 1983, the city of Wilkes-Barre observed Attorney Sandor Yelen Day, a fitting tribute to this fine professional. Attorney Yelen is a graduate of Meyers High School in Wilkes-Barre, where he excelled in basketball. He is also a graduate of Wilkes College, where he received a bachelor of arts degree in political science. He also holds a juris doctorate from the Dickinson School of Law. After serving in the U.S. Army, attorney Yelen served in the position of Luzerne County solicitor. He is an active member in many fraternal and civic organizations. He is a member of Lodge 655, F&M and Irem Temple Shrine, a member of the Pennsylvania Bar Association, American Trial Lawyers Association, and served as a special assistant attorney general for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Attorney Yelen had previously served as attorney for the Eastern Basketball League and was former owner of the Wilkes-Barre Barons basketball team. Attorney Yelen is associated with his brother and maintains a law office in the United Penn Bank Building, Wilkes-Barre, Pa. He resides with his wife, Janice, and children, Michael, Jeffrey, and Lisa.

Mr. Speaker, I join with the city of Wilkes-Barre and family and friends in paying tribute to this outstanding citizen.●

LIFE IN THE SOVIET UNION

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, Americans traveling abroad always experience surprises and culture shock, and return home with a renewed sense of patriotism and appreciation of American life. This is doubly true when one's trip takes them anywhere behind the Iron Curtain. Two of my constituents, Ken Reeder of Park Ridge, Ill., and Rich Clement of Des Plaines, Ill., recently visited the Soviet Union and upon their return shared their impressions of life under the totalitarian Soviet regime.

The following three articles are most insightful reading. I commend Mr. Reeder and Mr. Clement for sharing their views and experiences with us, and the Park Ridge Herald for publishing their fascinating accounts.

[From the Park Ridge Herald, Jan. 12, 1984]

BACK IN THE U.S.S.R.—PARK RIDGE MAN FINDS ONE PARTY IS NO PARTY

(By Bob Kehoe)

Ask most Americans about the Soviet Union and what you're likely to hear is a diatribe against a society they know little, if anything, about.

Aside from news footage of Soviet government meetings and military displays in Red Square, Russia is as much a mystery to modern America as outer space was to comic book writers in the early 1950s.

Ken Reeder heard the stories about the Soviet regime. As a child, he viewed Russians as a snake views a mongoose—a natural enemy. But somewhere on the road between adolescence and adulthood the Park Ridge native's preconceptions turned to curiosity.

Recently, Reeder took the ultimate step toward satisfying that curiosity. He took a 29-day trip to the land that most people only think they know.

Reeder found many of his suspicions about the massive continent with seven time zones to be true. The Russian people were often reclusive, security was extremely tight, and the food was as about as exciting as the national pastime of waiting in line.

But the lessons Reeder learned about the other side of the Iron Curtain answered many of the questions that Westerners often ponder in idle hours and at dinner table conversations that go nowhere.

"The people don't know what's going on," Reeder said, summing up what many Americans take for granted.

That encompassing statement applies to the way the government makes decisions, to why there is a lack of consumer goods and to why the Russian people don't discuss current events.

"Pravda, which is the state owned newspaper, is typically only two pages. The stories are short. They have political contests, but they aren't public. People don't vote, the party does. And it's not uncommon that all of those in government vote for the same person or the same idea.

"I guess that's why there is only one party. (They think) there is no need for a wrong party. They fear there would be revolution if another party was around to put doubt in peoples' minds," said Reeder, a senior at Illinois State University majoring in economics with a minor in international business.

Reeder began learning about Russian lifestyle and Soviet government in a political science course. He does not consider himself an expert on the country or its people, but Reeder's experiences in the streets of Moscow and other capital cities left lasting impressions.

"The people are very nice. They are warmhearted and invite you into their homes. The thing that struck me was that they don't have the materials and colors and goods that we have," Reeder said.

Learning about the Russian people came quickly for Reeder. He spent three days with a Soviet doctor and his family.

"I was very leery at first when I went there. He asked me not to use the phone. The doctor spoke very good English, but his wife spoke only a little English. Shortly after I got there, the doctor left. Later, when he returned, things got more comfortable. He took me to a pizza place—of which there are supposedly only two or three in the Soviet Union," Reeder continued.

The pizza was only slightly different than what we have here in America, Reeder said. However, the rest of the Soviet diet seemed like something out of an animal version of "Quincy."

"They eat a lot of organs like liver and brains. There is some chicken. The main meal is lunch, where a soup called 'borscht' is often served. Bread and cheese are the main part of the diet and are often served as snacks."

Living with the doctor and his family taught Reeder about some of the differences between Soviet and American enterprise and compensation for one's work.

"The doctor and his family made 130 rubles a month. A Soviet taxi driver can make upwards of 300 rubles a month," Reeder said in a surprised tone.

In the daytime, Reeder and others he was touring with were taken by tour-guide to the major Russian attractions. The almost non-existent Soviet nightlife was left up to the students. Reeder spent much of his time wandering through major Soviet cities trying to get a feel for what Soviet life is like.

"I would hop a bus in the city and walk back. I went to a lot of stores. Things were very expensive. There really aren't any department stores like we have here," Reeder said.

As part of his college work, Reeder researched the Soviet tranportation system. Although similar to American transportation systems in major U.S. cities, Reeder said the Soviet system is cheaper to use and on time more often. Bus rides cost about 5 cents while train and trolley use cost 7 cents, he said.

However, the one major difference between Soviet and American transportation is how far one is allowed to travel. There is no hopping a plane to take a weekend shopping spree in Leningrad. Soviet citizens need visas to travel within the country and are limited to a 25 kilometer radius of travel from their hometown, he said.

Politics is often a taboo subject when talking with Russians, Reeder learned. Questions about what citizens think about their form of government and the country's military operations are often met with shrugs and curt replies, he said.

"People don't dwell long on current events. It's not advisable to bring up politics. You get the feeling Big Brother is always watching.

"But the people who did talk seemed to like President Reagan for the most part. Some people told me they like Americans because they hold their heads high and have a gleam in their eye. They seem to see the U.S. as a little more demanding, and they (the Russians) don't have that attitude," Reeder said.

When Reeder got to talk with a Soviet man who was willing to discuss his country's philosophies, he popped a major question.

"Political scientists there compare the war in Afghanistan to our war in Viet Nam. I posed the question to him 'we realized 10 years down the line we made a mistake in Viet Nam, is there any chance the Soviet Union would do the same?' He couldn't answer that. He said 'maybe.'"

Perhaps the question would not have surprised the man if he had known more about Americans. But much like Americans, the Soviets seem to form most of their opinions of their "super power" counterparts by parroting preconceptions espoused by the Soviet government.

The Soviets may never know what Americans truly think because they will never read or hear or see what Americans do.

"They believe in stamping out any Western influence there," Reeder said. "There is a strong belief that it pollutes young minds."

Likewise, Americans are not likely to see any time soon on the evening news the beautiful countrysides and fairytale-like nineteenth century buildings of the Soviet Union. But for those who have been to both countries, there is an understanding.

Reeder has reached an understanding of the Soviets. He still doesn't like the Soviet governmental system and he may never get used to the food. But he'll probably go back.

"It certainly was not a vacation. There was no nightlife, burlesque or beaches," he laughed. "But there's a good chance I'll go back. It was a learning experience. It taught me to appreciate what we have here."

Reeder figures a sizeable portion of the Russian population would be more than happy to emigrate to America to enjoy "what we have" too. If he were born in Russia, he knows he would work to get out.

"I'd break my back to get out if I lived there. When we were there we tried to think of a way to get out of the country, assuming we were Russians. We couldn't come up with any."

FREELANCE PHOTOGRAPHER CHRONICLES STORY OF THE COUNTRY OF BOILED BEEF

The Soviet Union is not as all-powerful as it would like the world to believe, says photographer Rich Clement.

If the old adage, "you are what you eat" is true, the "land of boiled beef and fried potatoes," as Clement refers to it, doesn't have much to boast about.

Clement visited the Soviet Union for two weeks last October with a group of 26 other "amateur photographers" organized by the Citizen's Exchange Council (CEC) in New York. He himself holds a degree in photo journalism from Northern Illinois University in DeKalb; others on the trip held occupations as diverse as photographer, teacher and police officer.

Clement, 24 is a life-long resident of Des Plaines and a 1977 graduate of Maine West High School. His photographs have appeared in a number of local newspapers, including the Park Ridge Herald.

"Militarily, I don't doubt their advertised strength," said Clement. "Economically, though, the Soviet Union lags several years behind the West.

"I was there for two weeks and got the feeling I was reliving life in America during the 1940s," he said.

Clement, said seeing people wait in line for an hour or more to buy meat and cheese that would be judged subquality by Western standards is common.

"One afternoon in Leningrad, a Russian friend and I went to four shops trying to find some edible-looking chicken," he said. "We didn't, so we retired to the Russian staple—a bottle of vodka."

He also said that there aren't as many cars in Russian cities as there are in the United States, and they all look the same. Coming home and visiting downtown Chicago was almost an overwhelming experience, he said.

Applying for a visa was also an interesting experience, said Clement.

Visas for journalists are harder to come by than they are for tourists, he said, so when he applied he had to list his profession as "artist."

"It's a big hassle if you're a journalist," he said. "They follow you around to make sure you don't get into something they don't want you to."

Clement left on his trip a few weeks after the Soviet Union shot down a Korean jetliner for invading Soviet air space. He was a little worried that the trip would be cancelled, but the CEC assured him it would not be.

"They told me that if flights to the USSR were banned, we would have to take a train from our scheduled stop in Helsinki," he said. As it turned out, the ban was lifted. Their Finnair flight landed in Helsinki and the group caught an Aeroflot flight to the Soviet capital as planned.

"Russians talked about the plane incident, but from a Soviet point of view, of course," said Clement.

"The hotels we stayed in in Moscow and Leningrad were the best in Russia, according to our Intourist guide," said Clement. "One look inside and I felt like I was in an American Hilton."

The Prebaltiyskaya Hotel in Leningrad, he said, is lavishly constructed from marble and resembles a czarist palace.

But lack of variety in meals is as common in tourist hotels as it is to the Soviet citizenry, he said.

"For all the magnificent architecture, the food was horrendous," he said. "Boiled beef, cabbage and fried potatoes were the staples of two weeks' dinners.

"Breakfast was even more adventurous. At the Kosmos Hotel in Moscow we were served egg souffle or runny fried eggs and one cup of coffee each," he said. At the Prebaltiyskaya, said Clement, the waiters realized after two days that some of their guests needed more than one cup of coffee to wake up.

"But when the group asked for seconds of coffee, our breakfast 'rations' were cut in half," he said.

"Rationing food seems to be ingrained in the Russian way of thinking because of the sieges and home-front wars that make up a large portion of their history," said Clement. "But it seems to me the main thing keeping people from having a nutritious, varied diet is the government's inability to run an efficient economy."

If not for Russia's "second economy," the black market, many Russians would not be able to acquire the things most Americans take for granted, said Clement—like a well-made pair of shoes.

"Before I went on the trip, I thought the black market was made up of a bunch of social outcasts who trade in dark alleys," he said.

"Middle-aged men all the way down to teenagers propositioned me to exchange rubles for U.S. dollars for up to five times the official exchange rate," he said. "One younger man offered me 450 rubles on the spot if I would sell him my down jacket, blue jeans and hiking boots. That's about $600 in American money."

The problem with making such a trade, said Clement, is that a tourist is not allowed to leave the country with more money than he declared upon entering.

"Considering I was frisked and my luggage was gone over with a fine-toothed comb by customs officials at the Soviet-Finnish border, I was lucky not to have made the deal," he said.

Other American goods—such as cigarettes, chewing gum and whiskey—are also in high demand in the Soviet Union and can help a tourist get many favors, said Clement.

"One day a friend and I decided to eat lunch in town at the Metropol restaurant," he said. "We placed a pack of Marlboro cigarettes on the table in plain view of the waiter and received the quickest and friendliest service we'd had anywhere in Russia."

After the meal, they gave the waiter the cigarettes and a pack of gum and he agreed to pose for a picture for them.

"Posing for photographers is something few Russians will agree to do," said Clement. "They seem to have a great inferiority complex regarding their living conditions. When a foreigner is seen taking pictures, most Russians assume the photos will be used for anti-Soviet propaganda."

Though he was harassed and leered at quite a bit for taking pictures in public places, said Clement, on a few occasions someone would stop and smile and try to start a conversation in English.

"Most talks I had with the people were one sided," he said. "I answered a barrage of questions about what life in the United States is really like.

"Though they're fed a lot of anti-American propaganda about race riots and mass poverty, few of the people believe it," he said. "They figure it can't be true, otherwise they would be allowed to emigrate here.

"One man grilled me with such basic questions as 'Can any American run for president?', 'Are Americans allowed to emigrate?' and 'Can Americans go to any college they choose?' " said Clement. "I had to laugh, not at the man for asking, but at his government for being so insecure as to not let its people know the truth.

"Any lack of patriotism I felt before the trip was aburptly reversed during those two weeks," said Clement. "It seemed only fitting that the sun should break through the clouds, for the first time in days, as our train passed from the Soviet Union to Finland."

The first stop the group made in Helsinki, he said, was at a deli, where he and his fellow travellers stuffed themselves with "real food."

Russian Couple Yearns for Freedom, Security of Life in the United States

(By Rich Clement)

The reason I went to Russia was to take pictures of the people in their everyday situations and hopefully to meet someone willing to talk openly about Soviet life.

I did meet quite a few people who were able to speak some English (there are more teachers of English in Russia than students of Russian in the United States), but most of them were too afraid of the police to speak their minds.

It wasn't until we arrived in Leningrad that I met a Russian who would speak freely. My roommate, Ernest, had been to the Soviet Union before and speaks fluent Russian. Ernest introduced two women from our group, Glenda and Ann, and me to a friend of his, Sasha, who had taught himself to speak English.

We went to Sasha's apartment to talk and meet his wife, Lara. Their apartment consisted of two rooms: a living room just big enough for the six of us and a bedroom of equal size. They shared the kitchen and bathroom with the other tenants of the building. The bathroom was the size of a small closet; I couldn't figure out where the shower was.

They used a house phone, which was probably bugged, according to Sasha.

Sasha and Lara insisted on cooking dinner for us, even though we told them we had just finished eating dinner in our hotel. The meal consisted of the usual beef and cabbage, but the way they spiced it made it the best tasting meal we had during the trip. As is Russian custom, we drank seemingly endless vodka toasts.

We talked mostly about what life is like in the United States. Sasha knew a good deal about the States since he was able to pick up VOA broadcasts on his radio. But he was also subjected to constant anti-American propaganda his government feeds its people.

Sasha had a deeper reason than most Russians for wanting to know about the United States—he and Lara wanted to defect.

Russian defection has come to a near standstill during the present administration, and KGB knowledge of the desire to emigrate can lead to police harassment and loss of one's job. However, the couple was ready to suffer the consequences if it meant a chance for freedom.

By the end of the night, we had become such close friends that Glenda and Ann had swapped jewelry with Lara.

Lara, in her mid-20s, was one of the most attractive and happiest women I met in Russia. When Glenda and I told her she would have no problem getting a job as a model in the United States, she danced around the room, laughing and pretending to be modeling.

Sasha, also in his mid-20s, was more reserved. He seemed to be doing the worrying for the couple. Being seen in the company of Americans can raise the suspicion of the KGB. He said he had a friend who had been to a psychiatric ward "many times" for anti-government activities, but would not go into detail about what happened.

Occasionally as we talked, he would peer out the shuttered window for black KGB sedans cruising below.

We spent the next three days in Leningrad with Lara and Sasha as our guides. A couple of times Sasha, very matter-of-factly, said some night there might be a knock on their door and they would be taken away.

But he also kept telling us not to worry, they would be all right. He seemed to have the attitude that whatever happens, happens and there is nothing anyone can do to beat the system. His main reason for wanting to defect, he said, was his hatred for the stifling government.

Our last day in Leningrad we met Sasha in town and went to his apartment to discuss the possibility of helping him and Lara get the freedom they desired so much. We also brought them a backpack stuffed with American necessities—jeans, aspirin, cold tablets and make-up—not available to them in Russia.

As we headed back to our hotel, Sasha and Lara rode with us on the buses and metro until they finally had to turn back. We said our tearful goodbyes, but despite all our optimistic talk, realized we would probably never see each other again.●

TRIBUTE TO ROSENBUSH FURNITURE CO.

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues in the House of Representatives a resolution that was adopted by the State of Alabama House of Representatives. The documentation written by Representative Rick Manley commends the Rosenbush Furniture Co. for its 88 years of service to the people of Demopolis and west Alabama.

Following is resolution, H.R. 494 that was adopted on August 1, 1983:

COMMENDING ROSENBUSH FURNITURE CO. FOR 88 YEARS OF CONSECUTIVE SERVICE TO DEMOPOLIS AND THE WEST ALABAMA TRADE AREA

Whereas, Rosenbush Furniture Company was founded in Demopolis, Alabama, in June of 1895, by the late Julius Rosenbush; and

Whereas, Rosenbush Furniture Company has continued, without interruption, its operation and service to the people of Demopolis and its trade area, subsequently by and under the ownership and management of Julius Rosenbush, Essie Rosenbush, Bert Rosenbush, Sr., and then under the management of Bert Rosenbush, Jr., and Mary Louise Rosenbush; and

Whereas, in 1976, Bert and Mary Louise Rosenbush purchased the historic Merchants Grocery building, and other buildings in that complex, completely remodeled them to a beautiful furniture facility which has greatly enhanced the area of Demopolis where their business is located; and

Whereas, Rosenbush Furniture Company is the oldest home-owned and home-operated furniture store in the State of Alabama; now therefore

Be it resolved by the Alabama House of Representatives, That we do hereby heartily congratulate and commend the Rosenbush family for their many years of service to their community and area and their great tradition in the retail furniture business as the oldest privately owned furniture proprietorship in Alabama.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be presented to Bert and Mary Louise Rosenbush of Demopolis, Alabama.

Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to have this opportunity to extend to my friends, Bert and Mary Louise Rosenbush, the very best of congratulations on the occasion of this resolution. They are a special asset to the Demopolis community and Marengo County. This kind of devotion to a family business should serve as an example to all of us.●

TRIBUTE TO W. ROBERT YACO

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of my colleagues the announced retirement of W. Robert Yaco, the general manager of the Santa Barbara Metropolitan Transit District after 15 years of service to the Santa Barbara community.

During Bob's tenure of service, he accomplished a myriad of tasks that helped to make the transit district the success it is today. In the past 15 years this operation has grown from 30 to 155 employees. Patronage has increased from 3,000 passengers trips per day to 20,000 or 5.5. million per year. Bob has worked to add service for handicapped and elderly passengers by means of an accessible minibus and purchased buses with wheelchair lifts for fixed route, fixed service in order to broaden the transportation opportunities of handicapped individuals.

Bob has been instrumental in initiating the innovative electric vehicle project in cooperation with Caltrans, the Urban Mass Transportation Administration and the city of Santa Barbara Redevelopment Agency. Most importantly Bob has decreased traffic and air pollution significantly on the south coast of Santa Barbara by reducing onstreet traffic by over 19 million miles annually.

In honor of Bob's outstanding service to his community, his business associates and friends have begun a scholarship fund for children of SBMTD employees which he will administer. Throughout this exceptional career characterized by accomplishment, Bob Yaco contributed his time and energy for the betterment of Santa Barbara. He deserves our heartfelt gratitude. We wish him a productive and enjoyable retirement.●

LEGISLATION TO LIMIT U.S. MILITARY PRESENCE IN HONDURAS

HON. GERRY E. STUDDS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to suspend joint military maneuvers between the United States and Honduras, and place a limit of 200 of the number of U.S. military personnel in that Central American country. This legislation, which would extend through the end of the 1985 fiscal year, has been cosponsored by Representatives BARNES, EDGAR, OTTINGER, OBERSTAR, WEISS and 44 other Members of the House.

This legislation is prompted by a conviction that the Reagan administration is leading the United States toward direct involvement in a Central American war. Large scale military activities in Honduras are described as "maneuvers," but they have become, in reality, a semipermanent deployment of U.S. combat troops. This combat presence, in combination with U.S. support for Nicaraguan counterrevolutionaries, and large training programs for Honduran and Salvadoran troops, has had a profound and harmful impact upon the political life of Honduras.

The magnitude of our military operation now far exceeds the assistance required to guarantee the defense of the Government in Tegucigalpa. As a result, right-wing extremists throughout Central America are convinced that the Reagan administration will support a military solution to the regional crisis, even if this requires direct U.S. military intervention in an aggressor's role.

Our legislation recognizes that an ongoing relationship of moderate size between the Honduran and U.S. military is appropriate. The bill would not affect our increasingly generous program of direct military assistance to Honduras, nor would it bar the presence of U.S. military advisers needed to administer that program. It would, however, remove the massive American armed presence which has, in recent days, transformed Honduras in appearance from a struggling, but independent, democracy, into a clone for the early days in Saigon.

The Reagan administration has defended its policy on the grounds that a show of force is needed to convince the Government of Nicaragua that it must moderate its own foreign and domestic policies. The military maneuvers, it is argued, are intended merely to demonstrate that the United States has the will and the capacity to use force, if necessary, in Central America. But that lesson—if ever forgotten by Nicaragua, a country once occupied for two decades by U.S. Marines—has by now surely been learned. The suspicion grows, in consequence, that the administration's intent is not merely to bring pressure to bear upon the Government of Nicaragua. The military operations seem, instead, to be masking additional direct and indirect support for Nicaraguan exiles seeking to overthrow the Government by violence, and to be paving the way for the eventual use of U.S. troops to assist those exiles.

The United States-Honduran military maneuvers began in March 1983, under the designation "Big Pine." The initial operation lasted only 10 days, and cost $5.5 million.

Last August, Big Pine II began. This operation, and actions associated with it, will involve as many as 5,000 United States and 6,000 Honduran troops, and cost $50 million or more. It consists of two major military exercises, and a variety of training, construction, logistics and communications projects.

Big Pine III is expected to begin approximately 3 months after the present exercises conclude in March. The U.S. military presence, which will remain at a high level between the exercises, has expanded, as well, because of ongoing support for Nicaraguan counter-revolutionaries based in that country, and the creation of a "Regional Military Training Center" at Puerto Castillo. The training center, which has ample room for expansion, is presently used for training Salvadoran soldiers, and is staffed by more than 100 U.S. Green Berets.

The Big Pine exercises would not be troublesome if they were of lesser scope, and if they were not being carried out in combination with the "covert" operation. Nor would they be objectionable if Honduras were seriously threatened by conventional military attack. Honduras' most likely foe, Nicaragua, has increased its armed strength, but has little air capability, no ability to launch a major ground invasion, virtually no navy, and no incentive to invite the American intervention that would surely follow over aggression on their part.

The elements of Big Pine II, taken as a whole, constitute less a design for self-defense, than a plan for conquest.

A major radar facility has been constructed, staffed by 60 to 100 U.S. servicemen, and a second is planned. Four Honduran airfields have been built or lengthened. A base for a U.S. Army helicopter squadron has been established. Exercises have included amphibious assault, and paratroop landings. An airbase access agreement between the United States and Honduras has been signed. More and more U.S. equipment has been brought to—and left at—strategic locations inside Honduras. Plans are being laid for construction of a large permanent base at Puerto Castillo. A military hospital built at Comoyagua is considered one of the best medical facilities of any kind in the region. U.S. aid is now equal to half the military budget of Honduras.

With U.S. guidance, military cooperation has been fostered not only between Honduras and the Nicaraguan exiles, but among other governments in the region, as well. The reconstitution of CONDECA, a regional defense pact, could provide the basis for a multinational armed response to any threat—whether genuine or not—from Nicaragua or Nicaraguan-supported troops.

The American invasion of Grenada was justified by a request from East Caribbean states for assistance tenuously predicated on a regional agreement similar in many respects to CONDECA. Consider, for example, article 12 of the CONDECA pact:

> If the inviolability, the territorial integrity, the sovereignty or the independence of any of the States of the Central American Isthmus should be affected by an aggression which is not an armed attack or by an extra-continental or intra-continental conflict, or by any other fact or situation that might endanger the peace of the Central American Isthmus, the Defense Council shall meet immediately in order to agree on the measures which should be taken, in case of aggression, to assist the victim of the aggression, or on other measures necessary for the common defense and for the maintenance of the peace and security of the Central American Isthmus.

Liberally interpreted, this provision could be used to justify a United States move to help CONDECA whenever a politically and strategically opportune moment should arise.

Honduras has a solid claim on U.S. respect and support. It is a desperately poor country—aside from Haiti, the poorest in the hemisphere. In November 1981, it embarked on an experiment with democracy after decades of corrupt military rule. Its history has been unmarred by the brutal repression characteristic of neighboring Guatemala, El Salvador, and Somozist Nicaragua. The 1979 revolution in Nicaragua, the explosion of civil war in El Salvador, and the chronic brutality of left and right in Guatemala has placed Honduras in the eye of a deadly storm.

U.S. economic and military assistance to Honduras has quintupled—without controversy in the Congress—since 1979. The conviction that Honduran territory has been used to funnel arms to Salvadoran and Guatemalan guerrillas produced a proposal by congressional Democrats that U.S. aid be provided to the Honduran military for the express purpose of halting that traffic. Last year, Nicaragua sought to retaliate for attacks on its territory by Honduran-based exiles by helping to recruit and train a group of Honduran nationals for subversive activity within that country. That project was uncovered early and effectively crushed.

The Reagan administration is right to be concerned about Honduras, but it is wrong to respond to that concern by seeking to involve, rather than insulate, Honduras from the surrounding conflict. The military of Honduras professes fear of revolutionary Nicaragua. There is evidence, however, that this fear stems less from strategic concerns than from the realization that the revolution's success could result in a propensity on the part of those desperately poor in Honduras to challenge authority, as happened in Nicaragua and El Salvador.

The resentment caused by corruption and privilege exists in Honduras, as in its neighbors, and the risk of ignoring continued social and economic injustice is as great. No country with 30 percent unemployment, a high rate of population growth, and one of the lowest per capita incomes in the world will find its poor forever untempted by the exaggerated promises of those advocating violent revolutionary change.

Thus, the importance of making civilian democratic rule work effectively in Honduras is clear. But the U.S. military presence has had the opposite effect. Just as the military rules in "democratic" El Salvador, so Gen. Gustavo Alvarez—not President Suazo Cordova—is the most powerful political leader in Honduras. The taking of political prisoners and mysterious disappearances of political activists have increased dramatically over the past 2 years. By focusing so visibly on the military, the United States has vested in Alvarez prestige and power that the civilian leadership—which has made no progress on economic or social problems—cannot match.

Just as important, the United States had encouraged the Honduran military to look upon itself not simply as a professional institution charged with defending national territory, but as the cutting edge of a region-wide antirevolutionary armed force. This role may be comfortable for some Honduran military leaders—particularly General Alvarez—but it does not encourage officers with a more balanced and professional long range view.

The growing U.S. role in Honduras runs directly counter to the efforts of the Contadora group—Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Panama—to promote a peaceful resolution of the crisis in Central America. Last September, the five Central American countries joined with the Contadora group in calling upon all countries in the region:

> To stop the arms race in all its forms and begin negotiations for the control and reduction of current stocks of weapons and on the number of armed troops; and
> To prevent the installation on their territory of foreign military bases or any other type of foreign military interference.

The United States should be leading the effort to establish a basis for equitable political reconciliation in Central America. We have no more vital long range interest in the region than the creation of just such a settlement. But the Reagan administration has steadily resisted this effort, as if it is still realistic in the 1980's to impose upon all of Central America a political and social order subservient to the most narrow construction of traditional U.S. values, economic interests and geopolitical concerns. Leaving aside the question of whether this strategy is "right" or "wrong," it is not working, and it will not, in the long run, ever succeed.

The legislation we are introducing today is intended to focus the attention of Congress and the American people on the true nature of present administration policy in Honduras. It is essential that policymakers and opinion leaders look behind the grandiose design of the Kissinger Commission report, and the rhetoric devoted over and over again by this administration to the goals of economic development, human rights, political dialog and the development of democratic institutions. Between the administration and its congressional critics, these objectives are not at issue, for they are sought by all. What is at issue is the selection of means; the desire to expand rather than contract the basis for a political reconciliation, and to develop a strategy which responds to a balanced rather than a simplistic perception of the causes of armed conflict in the region.

The administration is seeking a military triumph in Central America which it cannot—without the long term and direct involvement of U.S. troops—hope to achieve. The present deployment of American combat forces in Honduras is an essential element of that strategy. Our legislation will challenge that approach, and lay the groundwork, I believe, for a policy far more likely to achieve our goals in Central America, and far more consistent with the desires, interests and values of the American people.●

A TRIBUTE TO BERN AND KAY SMITH

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to honor two of the greatest people I have ever known, Bern and Kay Smith, my parents, on the occasion of their 38th wedding anniversary.

Words cannot adequately express the love, admiration, and abiding respect that I have for my parents. Their enduring love for one another is rare and indeed refreshing; their commitment and loyalty to their family, an inspiration.

Mr. Speaker, like most of those who lived through the great depression, my parents knew physical hardship firsthand but grew up with a fierce determination to improve their lot—and that of their children—through hard work and persistence. A decorated veteran of World War II, my dad married my mother on February 2, 1946, and worked at various jobs to earn a decent living. In 1961, my parents invested their life savings on a dream—owning their own business. Ambitious and adventuresome, they were independent, intelligent, rugged individualists. They risked all they had on their dream, started a business from scratch, and over the years, built a profitable wholesale/retail sporting goods business of which we are all justly proud.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when the world is utterly preoccupied with negativism and paralyzed by fear, my parents stand out as beacons of hope, stability, and light. They are the kind of people who made America great. At a time when others shrink from responsibility and sheepishly cry "why," they characteristically say "why not."

Mr. Speaker, I know I will forever be grateful for the love, care, and guidance my parents gave to my two older brothers and me. When we were growing up, they were always there, like the rock of Gibraltar. There was never any doubt or question as to their commitment to our family. We were their first priority. My parents were also actively involved in community affairs. For example, my dad was a founder of our local little league, boyscout troop—my two brothers and I are all Eagle Scouts—and a family oriented swim club.

Looking back, it seems that no burden, no hardship, was ever too much for them to bear. No challenge was ever too much for them to meet. Clearly, their lives squarely rest on the unshakable foundation of Christian values. They love God, revere family, and regard their neighbors with compassion. They are highly competitive, especially my father—he still beats me in tennis half the time although I hate to admit it—and both possess that indomitable will to persevere regardless of cost, to never quit, regardless of the obstacle or barrier.

Bern and Kay Smith, Mr. Speaker, are ethical, honest people. It is they who are the real day-to-day heroes—not the one-shot variety. They live highly principled lives, are always quietly helping others in some way or another—they seek no recognition for themselves, for that is not their way. They are courageous people who face adversity head on and do what is right no matter what others may think, say, or do. I know my brothers Mick and Tom agree with me that our parents have faithfully practiced over the years what they have preached, and that is saying a lot. Indeed, we learned as much, if not more, by their example, as by their words.

Today, Mr. Speaker, my parents celebrate their 38th wedding anniversary. To many, it is just another day. But not to us. Today my family celebrates two people who are truly unique and special. A rare breed indeed.●

OVER-THE-COUNTER DIET PILLS SHOULD BE REMOVED

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, on January 26, 1984, I introduced H.R. 4675, a bill to require that over-the-counter diet drugs containing phenylpropanolamine (PPA) be dispensed only by prescription. Millions of Americans use over-the-counter diet pills to lose weight and control their appetite. Some young people use them as a stimulant because PPA has an amphetamine-like molecular structure and therefore gives them a "high." In street parlance, a stimulant such as this is called speed.

Last summer, I chaired a hearing to investigate the efficacy and/or safety of diet pills which contain PPA. After hearing testimony, both by experts, and victims who are permanently disabled as a result of taking these pills, I felt it necessary to take these pills containing PPA off the over-the-counter market and put them under the control of medical doctors. I have done this for several reasons.

PPA when taken in diet pills can cause a spike in blood pressure. It can also affect those with diabetes. Diabetes and hypertension are hidden diseases which are much more prevalent in the obese. It has been shown through various studies, that persons taking this OTC preparation who have normal blood pressures experience a hypertensive upsurge in blood pressure. Two studies substantiate this.

A large, well-conducted study made in Australia in 1980, using healthy medical students, found that 11 to 33 percent of the subjects who receive a single dose of PPA developed significant, sometimes severe hypertension. A newly released study sponsored by the diet pill industry had to be unexpectedly aborted when the blood pressure of one PPA-treated person soared to 200/100. Four other subjects' blood pressure also rose to seriously high levels. These studies involved persons who had normal blood pressure. It is estimated that at least 30 percent of overweight people have high blood pressure.

In the New York Legislature, an attempt was made several times to ban the sale of OTC diet pills containing PPA to those youngsters 18 and under. Because of heavy lobbying, the bills were defeated, even though the package in which these pills are contained clearly states: do not use under the age of 18. The Food and Drug Administration has banned the sale of PPA in combination with caffeine after a specified time when used in OTC diet pills. They have also banned the sale and manufacture of look-alikes in this and other combinations with PPA. This is to take effect immediately. This means that those OTC diet pills combination of caffeine and PPA are readily accessible to the young people in drug stores, supermarkets, convenience stores, and gas stations throughout the country until such time that the FDA deems it advisable to discontinue the sale of them. However, I strongly believe, after I have carefully reviewed all the evidence presented by experts and the victims I have heard who suffered strokes, were permanently handicapped, suffered psychotic reactions as a result of taking certain diet pills, the real culprit is PPA. The FDA is now in the process of conducting a review that should have been completed in 1977, but which, according to the latest information I have, will not be over before the year 2000. This review studies the efficacy and/or safety of diet pills containing PPA. Since the FDA is foot dragging on this very important issue, I have no alternative but to introduce this bill so that the dispensing of this dangerous substance can be carefully monitored by those who are concerned with supporting the health of people, medical doctors. Over-the-counter diet pills containing PPA should be dispensed as prescription only. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor my bill.

A bill to require that diet drugs containing phenylpropanolamine be dispensed only upon prescription.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any drug intended to control the appetite or otherwise assist in the loss of weight and containing phenylpropanolamine may only be dispensed in accordance with the prescription requirements of section 503(b)(1) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (21 U.S.C. 353(b)).

SEC. 2. This Act shall take effect ninety days after the date of its enactment.●

FAMILY VIOLENCE: A MAJOR PROBLEM

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, the family violence prevention services amendment, offered by my distinguished colleague from California, the chairman of the Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families, and adopted by the House which will aid millions of Americans, most of them women and children, who are the victims of family violence.

This amendment, with over 100 bipartisan cosponsors, of which I am one, is a response by Congress to the painful reality of nearly 6 million women who are abused by their husbands in any given year; it is a response by Congress to the appalling reality that thousands of these women will be beaten to death as a result of this abuse, and, it is a response by Congress to the fact that our Nation's police officers spend an astounding one-third of their time responding to domestic violence calls, resulting in 20 percent of all police deaths and 40 percent of all police officer injuries. These realities are the national shame from which the cosponsors of this amendment seek relief.

The family violence assistance amendment has as its goals first and foremost the providing of emergency assistance for abuse victims. At east 75 percent of the $65 million provided in this amendment must go to agencies which provide immediate shelter to victims of family violence. Helping private charitable and voluntary groups to offer family violence victims a place to turn is the first priority of this amendment. Strict matching requirements are included in the amendment to insure private sector and local community involvement, so essential to breaking this pattern of violence.

Second, and of equal importance, the amendment provides for Federal assistance for the training of law enforcement officials in the handling of domestic violence. I believe this is an important use of the strongest tool available to combat the domestic abuse problem—the tool of education.

Mr. Speaker, the vicious circle of family violence, domestic abuse, must be broken. This amendment, an amendment to the Child Abuse and Adoption and Reform Act, is an important step toward that goal. In my State of Maine, social isolation, low per capita income, and transportation inadequacies which make it difficult to obtain services, together place severe stress on the resources of many families. This amendment offers the hope that these families all across the United States can break free of the oppressive grip of physical and psychological abuse, abuse from the cruelest of all possible sources—a family member, a loved one. I am pleased my colleagues gave such strong support to this amendment.●

RETRAINING AMERICA'S UNEMPLOYED

HON. BILL LOWERY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, today I, along with my colleagues Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina, Mr. ERLENBORN, Mr. WYLIE, Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois, and Mr. SILJANDER, am submitting legislation to provide a retraining tax credit for educational expenses incurred by unemployed Americans.

This credit would cover 50 percent of a person's educational expenses up to $1,000 and allow an individual to carry back or carry forward to maximize the benefit offered. The course of study need not be applicable to previous employment, as is the case with current tax deductions for educational expenses. If 600,000 people use the credit, anticipated cost to the Treasury will be in the range of $300 to $500 million, easily one of the least costly unemployment solutions on record. In addition, applicants for this credit will not forfeit their unemployment compensation by enrolling in a retraining program.

Changes in our industrial structure are, by now, an integral part of American economic life. Some changes come from outside the economy itself, such as transitions in international competition. Others occur inside the economy, such as changes in the mix between manufacturing and services or increases in productivity and competitiveness through technological advances. The fast pace at which these structural changes are occurring has created a new group—workers dislocated by economic change. These are persons who are not from disadvantaged backgrounds, who formerly enjoyed stable employment at good wages, but who now face job loss and reemployment difficulties. These are the individuals who we seek to assist with this retraining tax credit proposal.

Dislocated workers are best understood primarily as a part of millions of workers, both employed and unemployed, in declining and growing industries, who suffer from imperfections in the workings of the U.S. labor market. The most important imperfections are geographical immobility of workers, insufficient investment in worker training, and inefficiency of labor exchange institutions. My bill addresses the second failure listed, and arguably the most appropriate imperfection for Congress to correct.

Although American industry spends a great deal of money on training workers—one estimate shows that the total cost is some $30 billion per year—this represents only a few hundred dollars a year for each employee.

Unemployed auto workers are an example of how underinvestment in training affects dislocated workers. Many former auto workers have only a low level of specific occupational skills. At the same time, about one-third do not have a high school diploma, and many that do cannot perform at the level of a high school graduate in reading and arithmetic. They are ill prepared for direct entry into the new, usually high-skill jobs that are opening in expanding fields such as microelectronics. They are also relatively unattractive as trainees for those fields because of their weak general educational backgrounds and their lack of training experience.

One approach to insure adequate training of dislocated workers is to establish special training programs for them. Such an approach is embodied in the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) of 1982 which I heartily endorse. However, this approach may not be optimal because it does not address the basic problem that these workers have been undertrained throughout their careers while employed.

Accordingly, a useful role for the Federal Government is to encourage workers' investment in their own retraining. Current public policy often operates in the opposite direction. The Federal income tax allows an individual to deduct educational expenses if they are related to maintaining skills in his/her current occupation, but not if they prepare him/her for a new occupation. Similarly, in most States except my home State of California, unemployment compensation is not available to persons enrolled in full-time training. This combination of public policies reduce or delay the participation of many workers in their own retraining.

While no jobs are directly created through my tax credit proposal, I believe it provides the necessary incentive for dislocated American workers to move into more highly skilled jobs, hence reducing their chances of future unemployment. My colleagues and I invite all Members to embrace this measure as an important step in the building process of the new American labor force needed to staff our growing, emerging industries.●

THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE TAX ACT OF 1984

HON. HENRY J. NOWAK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. NOWAK. Mr. Speaker, the Congress has taken great steps in the last few years to help American industry compete in world markets. U.S. companies can no longer rely solely on domestic markets to prosper or to meet the needs of a growing work force.

When we speak of a global economy, we must also think in terms of global competition. Exports are now responsible for one out of every seven jobs in the United States. The proportion of American jobs attributable to export sales should continue to grow dramatically.

In this context, Mr. Speaker, I am introducing H.R. 4741, the International Trade Tax Act of 1984. This proposal is a carefully balanced initiative designed to address not only some of the so-called concerns of GATT members, but more importantly, also the need for a viable export promotion initiative. It is an initiative that addresses the financing needs of not only large American companies, but also the needs of the evolving new to export small business. Further, in recognition of the growing importance of service industries to the U.S. economy, my initiative encourages small service business to begin looking at the financial opportunities available through overseas contracting and consulting.

SMALL BUSINESS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Tax, Access to Equity Capital and Business Opportunities, I am keenly aware of the dynamics in the overall debate over tax policy. Due to both the diverse nature of small business and to its lack of adequate resources, smaller firms are often the last to hear about evolving tax or legislative initiatives, and as a result, often lose substantial economic benefit from not becoming involved in the policy debate over such legislation. I believe that this is most unfortunate and may be the major reason for the inherent complexities of the current domestic international sales corporation (DISC) tax incentives.

The fact that only 8,665 DISC returns were filed in 1981 is indicative of the complexity of the provisions themselves. Moreover, although the DISC's, with more than $10 million in gross receipts, made up only 16 percent of the DISC returns filed in 1981, those same entities comprised about 91.6 percent of the trade volume done that year. As presently structured, DISC could hardly be considered a tangible incentive for small business exporters.

A simplified tax incentive for exporting would be important for two reasons. First, it would provide smaller firms with a meaningful incentive to enter world markets. Second, it would play a critical role in helping the U.S. industry to realize its economic potential.

DISC AND GATT

Almost since its enactment in 1971, the European community has charged that DISC is an illegal subsidy for purposes of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). According to GATT, it is an illegal subsidy due to the fact that the "domestic income"—as opposed to foreign income—of an American corporation is being deferred.

As a result of this controversy, the administration has designed a proposal which it believes meets the concerns of the European community and the objectives of GATT. This proposal would replace the DISC with a business entity which is incorporated outside the United States. A portion of the income from export sales made through this foreign incorporated entity would be exempt from U.S. tax.

To the extent the administration's proposal alleviates a political problem with our trading partners, I applaud this objective. Nevertheless, the repeal of DISC should not be done at the expense of the small business person. It is small business that creates approximately 80 percent of all the net new jobs in the United States. Moreover, a proposal that does not take into account the concerns of small business, would be turning its back on the thousands of new to export firms. The U.S. Department of Commerce alone estimated that at least 20,000 firms could export, but do not do so because of certain initial barriers.

[1] Domestic International Sales Corporation Legislation, Department of Treasury—issued July 1982.
[2] Rounded for totaling purposes.

I believe that the European Community and GATT could live with a proposal that is not unduly complex and which meets the concerns of the small business person. This, in effect, would require a so-called de minimis rule or safe harbor for small firms. However, this rule would have to be clearly defined by legislation and, thus, not left to regulation. In addition, an explicitly defined rule would not appreciably upset the trade situation with our trade partners.

H.R. 4741 accomplishes this objective by minimizing the incidences of foreign presence for a small company. In specific, a small firm would be permitted to exempt a portion of its export income as long as it set up a subsidiary, called a "small American international trade corporation" or AITC. Unlike the administration's proposal, my legislation would not require small firms to maintain an office or books and records overseas. It would not require the export subsidiary to have a nonresident director.

Among other provisions, the International Trade Tax Act of 1984 would merely require a small firm to set up a small AITC which is created or organized under the laws of a foreign country. As an alternative, the small AITC could be created or organized in any foreign trade zone. There are approximately 80 foreign trade zones located in various cities throughout the United States. This latter alternative would alleviate the psychological and financial burden on the small business of incorporating overseas. Further, small firms would have the option of participating on a joint basis—or in a joint trading company venture—as shareholders in an AITC.

In summary, H.R. 4741 is both a job creation and export promotion initiative. It not only meets the capital formation needs of medium and large businesses, but more importantly, it insures that small business is provided with its fair share of economic benefit.

By providing American industry with a meaningful incentive, we will be providing our work force and our cities with a hedge against future economic downturns. With an increasingly competitive and global economy, the future prosperity of this country is largely dependent upon export promotion and development. Based on that premise, I include the following summary of my legislation:

THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE TAX ACT OF 1984

Section 1. Title of bill.

Section 2. American International Trade Corporations (general provisions).

AITC DEFINED

The term American International Trade Corporation (AITC) is a corporation which (in general):

A. was created or organized under the laws of a foreign country or a U.S. possession;

B. has no more than 25 shareholders;

C. does not have preferred stock outstanding;

D. maintains its records and a permanent office outside the U.S.; and

E. has a nonresident director.

In general, the term "small AITC" means a corporation which has:

A. $10 million in average annual foreign trading gross receipts; and

B. was created or organized under the laws of a foreign country, a U.S. possession, or within a U.S. foreign trade zone.

EXEMPT FOREIGN TRADE INCOME

Depending upon the administrative or transfer pricing rules used, a specified portion of the foreign trade income of the AITC or small AITC shall be considered exempt foreign trade income.

FOREIGN TRADING GROSS RECEIPTS

Any AITC may generally derive revenues or foreign trading gross receipts from or for:

A. the sale, exchange or disposition of goods;

B. the lease or rental of goods outside the U.S.;

C. the performance of certain managerial or other services related to the sale, exchange or lease of such goods;

D. certain engineering or architectural services performed abroad.

Except for a small AITC, an AITC may derive foreign trading gross receipts only if it is managed overseas and as long as certain economic processes (such as the solicitation or the making of contracts) take place abroad. In addition, to the ways described above, a small AITC may also derive revenues from the performance of services.

TRANSFER PRICING RULES

Based upon the following administrative or transfer pricing rules, the taxable income of an AITC shall not exceed:

A. 1.83 percent of foreign trading gross receipts;

B. 23 percent of the combined taxable income of the AITC and related person; or

C. the taxable income computed according to section 482.

The Treasury Department shall draft regulations permitting shareholders of an AITC to participate on a joint basis (or in a joint trading company venture).

Section 3. Taxable year of DISC and AITC required to conform to taxable year of majority shareholder.

In general, the taxable year of any AITC or DISC shall be the taxable year of the shareholder (or group of shareholders with the same 12-month taxable year) who has the highest percentage of voting power.

Section 4. Effective date, transition rules.

a. Effective Date—

The amendments made by the Act generally apply to transactions made after December 31, 1983.

b. Transition Rules for DISCs:

1. Except as provided below, the taxable year of each DISC shall close on December 31, 1983.

2. Any accumulated DISC income which is generally derived before January 1, 1984, shall be treated as previously taxed income.

c. Special Rules for Small DISCs.

To the extent a small DISC (defined as having average annual gross receipts not in excess of $10 million) has been operating prior to December 31, 1983, that DISC will be given five years in which to comply with the provisions of the Act. This is intended to give small firms, which often do not hear about changes in tax policy or cannot immediately afford expensive tax professionals, a grace period in which to comply with the changes in the tax law.●

DECLARE VICTORY AND BRING THEM HOME

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, for far too long the United States has maintained forces in Lebanon as part of a so-called peacekeeping force which neither keeps the peace nor is able to defend itself. Worse than this, the commitment of U.S. Marines there carries forward no long-term U.S. policies and has no clear-cut tactical goals or methods to assure the protection of our troops.

It is doubtful that the marine contingent entered Lebanon as a peacekeeping force in the same sense as commonly attributed to other U.N. peacekeeping forces. If they did, it is a role they no longer fill.

Progressively, Lebanese of all religious, political, and factional orientations regard them as actively participating in support of the government, militarily and otherwise. This perception of U.S. involvement makes it impossible for us to mediate the differences between the Lebanese forces supporting the current government and those seeking to alter the status quo. For almost a decade, the current fighting within and over Lebanon has resulted in both the military presence of a half dozen Middle East states and the occupation by an ill-conceived peacekeeping force.

The administration seeks peaceful settlement by attempting to negotiate a withdrawal of all foreign troops. Let us lead by setting a shining example. Let the administration declare a victory and bring our troops home. Perhaps our good-faith effort will lead other nations to do the same. The French and Italian contingents have already announced significant troop reductions. The United States should take the lead and reduce our military involvement to zero. The Americans serving so honorably in our Armed Forces deserve better than their present situation. Our visible presence in Lebanon has been reduced to scattered pipes protruding through the fresh-dug earth marking the buried containers that house our troops. It is Groundhog Day every day in Lebanon for our soldiers who spend all their time in these little manmade caverns.

It is a fact that the administration has no clear-cut U.S. strategic aim in Lebanon which relates to our major concerns in the Middle East. Lebanon's Government is important, but not essential, to the peace and integrity of the entire area. It is also not an essential part of U.S. national policy or goals. To escalate our involvement in Lebanese affairs and our troops presence in Lebanon, is to risk a commitment which Americans will not and should not accept.

The U.S. marines sit in a situation not radically different from our troops at Anzio in World War II, where the goal was to establish a large force ashore which could not move inland to higher and safer ground. They did not move from the beachhead and intolerable losses resulted. Regrettably, the lessons of Anzio, and similar events in Khe Sanh, Vietnam, have not benefited this administration.

If there are areas in the Middle East where U.S. interests need protecting, and clearly there are, then appropriate actions can be taken in those areas without making massive political and military commitments in an area which has been afflicted with religious and regional troubles for centuries. Air attacks and gunfire from both Marine weapons onshore and ships offshore are doing nothing to endear us to the Lebanese people. Further, this same fire is doing very little to suppress the troublesome terrorists who are a massive threat to the safety of our forces.

We are currently only worsening a bad situation. Get our marines out of Lebanon now. Even if the removal of all foreign troops were possible, there would still remain at least a dozen internal groups of significant political influence within Lebanon. We cannot presume to set the future course for this sovereign country. Let the processes of diplomacy and the Lebanese themselves solve the terrible conflict in Lebanon.●

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE AID TO SCHOOLS AND CITIES

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. ORTIZ. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill that will provide additional revenue not only to the people of this Nation, but to local governing units in a portion of the 27th District in Texas. By removing an impediment to oil and gas leasing at the Naval Air Station in Corpus Christi, Tex., Congress can provide much needed revenue to the local units of government in Nueces County, and, at the same time, reaffirm its commitment to expanding our country's domestic energy supply.

On July 20, 1981, the Department of the Interior through the Bureau of Land Management lifted an existing moratorium precluding oil and gas leasing on acquired military lands. Section 35 of the Mineral Lands Leasing Act as codified 30 U.S.C. 191 provides that one-half of the royalty revenue derived from production on leases governed by this act will be paid to the Department of the Treasury and the remaining half will be paid to the State. Subsequently, each State legislature may apportion its half of the revenue to those subdivisions that are socially or economically impacted by the development of these mineral leases.

This past year, the Texas State Legislature enacted a law that forwards these funds to the county which encompasses the Federal land in question. The county, in turn, is directed to distribute 50 percent of the revenue to the school districts within the county, retains 35 percent for county use, and disburses the remaining 15 percent to the cities in the county.

As a lease offer was being processed, it was learned that the Naval Air Station had been incorporated into the city of Corpus Christi in 1963. Unfortunatey, even though leasing on acquired military lands is now allowable, there also exists a regulation prohibiting leases being issued in incorporated cities, towns, and villages.

Time is no longer a matter of luxury in expediting this matter. Back in 1962 when leasing was permitted on the Naval Air Station, an amount greater than 1 million barrels of oil was extracted which represents approximately $30 million in current prices. Due to the geological formation of the land occupied by the Naval Air Station, drilling on surrounding private lands will drain the oil under the Naval Air Station. When that happens, a potential source of revenue to this Nation, to the local school districts, to the county, and to the cities in this county will be forever lost.

Mr. Speaker, in this period of severe fiscal restraint, we can ill afford losing this revenue to private interests. Our Nation's schools are in dire need of aid. This bill will provide additional income for improvements to curriculum, facilities and personnel in the schools of Nueces County at no cost to the Federal Government. Our Nation's cities have been told that they must be less dependent on the Federal Government for financial support. This bill will enable the cities of Nueces County to provide better services to their citizens, and at no cost to the Federal Government.

Surely, this body will not allow such a technicality as I mentioned to frustrate the general welfare of the people. I urge my colleagues to consider these facts and to support this legislation.●

RABBI BEN ZION BOKSER

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, the people of Queens, the city of New York, the State, and the Nation have lost a distinguished religious leader and writer. We who have known him mourn the loss of a great and personal friend.

As a tribute to my friend, I would like to include the following obituary which appeared in the New York Times:

BEN ZION BOKSER, 76; A RABBI AND PROFESSOR

Rabbi Ben Zion Bokser, a leading figure in Conservative Judaism in the United States and spiritual leader for 50 years of the Forest Hills Jewish Center in Queens, died of heart disease Monday at New York Hospital. He was 76 years old and lived in Forest Hills.

Rabbi Bokser was chairman of the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards of the Rabbinical Assembly, an international organization of Conservative rabbis. He was also adjunct professor of political science and religious studies at Queens College, and was director and co-founder of the Center for the Study of Ethics and Public Policy at Queens College.

He was a former professor of homiletics at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America and former visiting professor of Jewish mysticism at the Hebrew University in Jersualem.

Among the books he wrote were "Judaism and the Christian Predicament," a study of Jewish-Christian relations; "Judaism: Profile of a Faith" and "Jews, Judaism and the State of Israel."

Rabbi Bokser, born in Poland, was a graduate of City College, and earned a doctorate at Columbia University.

To his wife, Kallia, daughter Miriam, and son, Baruch, we say that in his lifetime he touched so many people, and with his passing we will continue to remember him for his concerns which have contributed toward the betterment of mankind.●

SOVIET ARMS CONTROL VIOLATIONS AND U.S. SECURITY

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, the evidence of Soviet violations of arms control agreements has simply become to overwhelming to ignore.

The United States repeatedly pressed its concern about these violations through private channels, but the Soviets refused to cooperate. As a result, the President had no choice but to present the record to the American people and the world community.

Pursuant to a unanimous congressional request, President Reagan last week submitted a report on Soviet violations of arms control agreements, with potentially far-reaching implications for the future of arms control and United States-Soviet relations.

This initial report documents seven major violations of accords prohibiting the production or use of chemical or biological weapons, of the Antiballistic Missile Treaty, of SALT II, and of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty. Other compliance questions are currently under study.

In very general terms, the violations cited are:

Use of chemical weapons in Afghanistan, Laos, and Kampuchea, in violation of biological weapons convention and Geneva protocol;

Failure to notify of troop movements, in violation of the Helsinki accords;

Construction of phased array radar near Krasnoyarsk, in central Siberia, in violation of the ABM Treaty;

Encryption of missile telemetry—interfering with our national technical means of verification—in violation of SALT II;

Development of two new types of ICBM's, in violation of SALT II—which limits each side to only one new type;

Deployment of the SS-16 at Plesetsk, in violation of SALT II—which prohibits deployment of SS-16's; and Nuclear testing in excess of 150 kt, in violation of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty.

This initial report, submitted in response to unanimous congressional request, represents only the tip of the iceberg; many other violations and probable violations have been documented in a complementary highly classified study, which I hope to see brought to light in the near future.

As President Reagan stated in his letter to Congress:

Soviet non-compliance is a serious matter. It calls into question important security benefits from arms control, and could create new security risks. It undermines the confidence essential to an effective arms control process in the future. It increases doubts about the reliability of the U.S.S.R. as a negotiating partner, and thus damages the chances for establishing a more constructive U.S.-Soviet relationship.

Now it is up to the Soviet leadership to correct their behavior, to comply with their obligations under international law.

If the Soviets are serious about arms control, they will desist from this pattern of noncompliance, and change their behavior to live up to their agreements; and then they will return to the negotiating table at Geneva with constructive proposals—and clean hands.

If, on the other hand they fail to take corrective action, then the United States will have to reassess our participation in arms control negotiations. And we will have to face some fundamental questions. Maybe we will want to continue negotiations, to keep communication open. Maybe we will conclude that the Soviets are not negotiating in good faith, and that therefore there is nothing to be gained from arms reduction talks. But certainly the Soviet response to this public report will be a key element in our decision.

Over the past several months, the Wall Street Journal editorial page has presented some of the most cogent and reasonable commentary on arms control policy ever to appear in print. Continuing in this tradition was their editorial of January 25, 1984, entitled "How Now on Cheating?". The Journal reaches the heart of the matter when it points to "the true implication of Soviet cheating: It is extremely dangerous to U.S. and free world security to negotiate and abide by arms agreements that the Soviets do not intend to keep."

From the standpoint of potential implications for U.S. defense, the most ominous of the Soviet violations is the construction of ABM-related phased-array radar near Krasnoyarsk, central Siberia, in violation of the ABM treaty. Experts see these installations, in conjunction with other observed Soviet activity, as building to a Soviet breakout capability in ballistic missile defense.

Some of this information was first brought to light by Clarence Robinson of Aviation Week and Space Technology. In his detailed and incisive article of January 16, Mr. Robinson warns of indications that the Soviet Union is building toward fielding the major elements of a nationwide ballistic missile defense system.

Because of misplaced arms control considerations strategic defense efforts in the United States have stagnated. President Reagan's strategic defense initiative, presented just this week as part of the President's defense budget request, is a vital beginning in reversing this dangerous neglect.

Mr. Speaker, I insert the Wall Street Journal editorial, "How Now on Cheating?" and the Aviation Week article, "Soviets Accelerate Missile Defense" in the RECORD:

[From the Wallstreet Journal, Jan. 25, 1984]

HOW NOW ON CHEATING?

President Reagan Monday sent a 50-page secret document to Congress detailing what the administration called "an expanding pattern of Soviet violations or possible violations of arms control agreements." Press coverage was muted, as the administration apparently hoped it would be. The New York Times used quote marks in such a way as to imply doubts about the validity of what it called a "fact sheet" describing the report for public benefit. The principal implication the president himself had drawn was that "better treaty drafting" and more workable verification procedures would be needed in future arms negotiations.

In short, few people in or out of government are ready yet to face the true implication of Soviet cheating: It is extremely dangerous to U.S. and Free World security to negotiate and abide by arms agreements that the Soviets do not intend to keep. The message this American vacillation sends to Moscow's generals and politburo chieftains is that they can cheat at no cost. The Americans, they will believe, have been immobilized by the politics of arms control—the hope and belief that arms control treaties do in fact limit the construction and deployment of arms.

Fewer than 10 of some 41 Soviet violations listed in a recent Heritage Foundation study are mentioned in the president's report. But even the four termed as definite cheating are profound.

Most important is the construction of radar stations outside the area allowed by the Anti-Ballistic Missile treaty of 1972. In combination with other ABM violations not cited, such as radar testing and surface-to-air missile deployments nearby, the radar sites form a Soviet ABM capability that goes far beyond the treaty restrictions limiting such defenses to either a capital city or a missile field. With the Soviets building screens against our bombers and submarines, plus extensive civil defenses, the effectiveness of our deterrent force becomes increasingly suspect. To the extent that the Soviets gain an edge, their threatening propaganda messages to the West become more credible, as we learned last summer when they stimulated a significant unilateral disarmament groundswell in the U.S. and Europe.

Other Soviet violations include development of an illegal second nuclear missile the SS-X-25 or PL-5, a drastic addition to the firepower of the old SS-13. Some 14 nuclear tests above the limits of the 1963 test-ban treaty have given the Soviets high confidence in the power of their arsenal. Finally, the report charges that the Soviets have been encrypting missile tests above allowable levels. This prevents our fully monitoring Soviet capabilities and, of course, treaty violations.

Last week, a group led by former Carter negotiator Paul Warnke met to chastise Mr. Reagan for "insufficient" evidence of violations that lack "strategic significance" anyway. The administration should't be raising questions that might prevent us from entering into further agreements, they concluded. Aside from the tortured logic of that argument, it's hard to know what you don't know; if the Soviets have been encoding their tests, who can say what they're building? Former CIA analyst David Sullivan estimates that Moscow has stockpiled more than 4,000 delivery vehicles, compared with 2,250 allowed under SALT and 1,850 in the U.S. arsenal.

Meanwhile, the U.S. is required to significantly weaken its own forces. Since Ronald Reagan took office, America has dismantled or has made plans to dismantle 26% to 33% of its existing megatonnage, mostly to conform to SALT II. As Mr. Reagan noted in a recent speech, the U.S. nuclear arsenal is at a 25-year low.

Back when these treaties were being negotiated, a phalanx of U.S. leaders—Henry Kissinger, Melvin Laird, Gerald Smith, James Schlesinger, Harold Brown, Zbigniew Brzezinski—went before Congress to promise that if a situation like today's ever developed, we would cancel out. In 1972, Mr. Kissinger and Mr. Laird told Sen. Henry Jackson that substitution of heavy missiles for the SS-11 would be considered a clear-cut violation. Yet when the Soviets deployed the SS-19, four times the throw-weight of the SS-11, no abrogation followed.

Even Jimmy Carter was clear about the consequences of cheating. He told Congress in 1979 that Soviet violation of just one key clause, the encryption provisions, would undercut the whole treaty. His defense secretary, Harold Brown, outlined a sensible U.S. policy before Congress: "The issue will not be whether we could prove a case to a jury. We do not need proof beyond a reasonable doubt, nor even evidence we can discuss in detail," he said. "If a problem were not resolved . . . I would not hesitate to recommend . . . abrogation."

No doubt some advisers have been telling the president how clever it would be to accuse the Soviets of cheating but do nothing, playing to doves and hawks alike. That strategy may be worse than ignoring violations altogether. The Kremlin now knows that even if it's caught and accused, the Westerners will issue a pardon.

By falling to take actions that follow logically from the evidence, Mr. Reagan casts doubt on the evidence itself. By his response so far to Soviet cheating, Mr. Reagan is telling the public not to take him seriously.

SOVIETS ACCELERATE MISSILE DEFENSE

CIA NOTIFIES PRESIDENT OF HEIGHTENED ACTIVITY, WHICH COMES AS U.S. RECONNAISSANCE SATELLITES FACE FUNDING SHORTAGE

(By Clarence A. Robinson, Jr.)

WASHINGTON.—President Reagan has been given evidence by the Central Intelligence Agency that the Soviet Union is producing components for and has in place or under construction the major elements of a nation wide ballistic missile defense system.

"The CIA's position on Soviet ballistic missile defense activities is unusual in its strength and clarity—an alarm bell that we must watch the situation very closely," a White House official said.

"The U.S. could be witnessing a Soviet move to place itself in a position to abrogate the Antiballistic Missile Treaty and rapidly deploy a system to defend key areas such as intercontinental ballistic missile fields," the official added.

The USSR is permitted by the treaty to operate a ballistic missile defense system with up to 100 interceptor missiles and six radars to protect Moscow. It also is premitted research and development for defensive systems and to apply advances in technology to upgrade that system.

The U.S. has elected not to deploy the defensive system permitted it under the treaty. Either the USSR or the U.S. can withdraw from the treaty with six months' notice to the other nation if extraordinary events jeopardize its interests.

Factors focusing U. S. attention on Soviet ballistic missile programs include:

Construction of new Pushkino phased-array antiballistic missile defense battle management radars. One site is north of Moscow, and others are under construction. The radar has four faces with phase shifters to provide 360-deg. coverage. It is 120 ft. high and 500 ft. wide (AW&ST Mar. 14, 1983, p. 26).

Pechora-class ballistic missile detection radars located at sites around the periphery of the Soviet Union, except for one new radar located internally at Abalakova in the vicinity of SS-18 intercontinental ballistic missile fields. These phased-array radars are positioned for early warning, detection and tracking.

Production of SH-04 and SH-08 nuclear armed interceptor missiles with deployment of the weapons in silos around Moscow as part of improvements to the system there. The SH-04 is an exoatmospheric missile, and the SH-08 a hypersonic endoatmospheric missile that together provide weapons for a layered defense.

Tests at Saryshagan of the SH-08 interceptor in a rapid reload configuration, firing two of the missiles from the same silo within 2 hr.

Production of the Flat Twin tracking and Pawn Shop missile guidance radars for the SH-08 and SH-04 to form the ABM-X-3 defense system. The radars are designed modularly so that components can be produced and stored until required. They can be concealed and assembled rapidly for use in the system.

Testing of the SA-12 surface-to-air missile against ballistic reentry vehicles. The SA-12 is called a strategic air defense or tactical ballistic defense system because of the inherent dual-mode capability in the weapon.

Netting of command, control, communications sytems, air defense and ballistic defense radars with battle management radars to tie together elements of a national defense system.

"It took a variety of sources and methods to piece together the mosaic the agency presented," the official said.

Evidence presented clearly shows that the mutual assured destruction (MAD) concept may be on the way out, a White House official said. The President wants, as an optimist, to offer the nation a way out of mutual assured destruction through a U.S. ballistic missile defense system. But the President concluded that the Soviets are doing everything they can with ballistic missile defense to bring the U.S. to its knees, the official said.

The President offered the hope of a damage denial ballistic defense system last year, the official added, "but the bureaucracy is not responding to what he wants."

The official said the Administration is equally as concerned over a lack "of national means to accomplish first-rate reconnaissance of Soviet ballistic missile defense developments."

National technical means is a euphemism for electronic ferret satellites and photographic reconnaissance spacecraft used to monitor the Soviet Union, including compliance by that nation with arms control agreements.

It took the U.S. more than 18 months to detect and photograph the large phased-array radar at Pechora, and more than a year after construction began at Abalakova to detect construction of the radar there. Neither radar was detected until the U.S. was told to conduct reconnaissance of those areas.

Cost overruns in developing and producing reconnaissance satellites such as the KH-11 digital imaging system, which can relay its imagery via satellite data system spacecraft within an hour to Washington, has damaged the U.S. capability.

USAF is developing new, improved reconnaissance spacecraft, and the service already is facing an approximately $400-million cost overrun this fiscal year.

Development of the KH-11 resulted in an overrun of approximately $1 billion, forcing the Defense Dept. to halt production in film return spacecraft, such as the KH-8 and KH-9, with their higher resolution capability, to free the funds for application to the KH-11.

As a result, the U.S. has only two film-return reconnaissance spacecraft remaining in its inventory. The high-resolution KH-8 dips to altitudes as low as 75 naut. mi. over the target area to obtain imagery.

Because of the expense involved, the Defense Dept. and Central Intelligence Agency are limited in the numbers of KH-11s that can be maintained in space. The U.S. is unable to obtain adequate reconnaissance of the Soviet Union. "This was demonstrated when we failed to discover construction of the large radars at Pechora and Abalakova," the official said.

He added that a massive effort also is under way in the USSR to counter the KH-11's capability. "The Soviets have formed a camouflage, concealment and deception program called Maskirovka [translation: concealing/masking]," he said. "Until recently, it has been controlled by Marshal N. V. Ogarkov, first deputy minister of defense and chief of general staff (AW&ST Dec. 12, 1983, p. 21).

"From various sources, we have been able to determine that the Soviets have a large-scale production capability for the components of a ballistic missile defense system, and with continued production of weapons such as the SA-12, within a year or so they will be able to alter U.S. strategic targeting."

The SA-12 system has a truck-mounted radar with a 150-naut.-mi. range. A second truck carries the missile launcher and missiles, which can engage targets at altitudes as low as 300 ft. and as high as more than 100,000 ft.

Tests with multiple SH-08s fired from the same silo make deployment of the interceptor a difficult situation for the U.S.

The Soviets are permitted by the treaty to deploy the missle around Moscow to upgrade the capability there. The treaty prohibits multiple launches, including testing in that mode. If a rapid reload capability is perfected, the number of missiles defending Moscow could be doubled.

Balance of power

The Soviets have a fundamentally different view of strategic weapons and the balance of power, according to the official. The USSR is building a war-fighting capability, starting with its offensive strategic forces by modernizing them over the past 10 years. "The U.S. has essentially limited itself to research and development with ballistic missile defense technology while the Soviets bought the time they needed to develop a layered defensive system with the ABM Treaty," the official said.

He added that the system now unfolding in the USSR is not only one with overall improvements in each segment, but one largely based on new technology.

Before the U.S. could declare that the Soviet Union is in the process of breaking out of the ABM Treaty, evidence would be required that serial production of interceptor missiles is taking place at high rates, that radars are in full-scale production and that construction of hard stands for phased-array radars in the ABM-X-3 system is taking place, another Administration official said.

"Clearly the agency is not prepared to go that far," he said. "What seems clear, however, is that there is in progress a pattern that places their activity very close to the line in terms of a breakout," he said.

Breakout in arms control community lexicon means that at national ballistic missile defense system is being covertly deployed in violation of a treaty. "It appears that the Soviets are close to that point, but that they are positioning themselves to withdraw from the treaty and then deploy the layered system," he said.

"We already see the long-lead-time items such as the Pechora and Pushkino radars taking shape all over the nation," the official continued. "The SA-12 missile has been tested against reentry vehicles, and with the dual-mode capability of the SA-10, and SA-11 surface-to-air missiles netted into a system, tactical antiballistic missiles assume real importance."

There is still disagreement with the U.S. intelligence community over whether the SA-12 is designed to destroy nuclear-armed reentry vehicles from intercontinental ballistic missiles or Pershing 2 reentry vehicles, making it a theater defensive weapon.

Production of the Flat Twin radar, the system that takes its NATO code name from the two flat faces with phase shifters, is considered the essential element in whether the Soviet Union is preparing to deploy a nationwide defensive system, U.S. officials said. The Flat Twin radar provides the final tracking of ballistic missiles at reentry.

The Pawnshop radar in the system takes its name from three spherical radar antennas mounted side by side.

There is some evidence that the Flat Twin is in production with its modular components, but the hard stands for the radar have not yet appeared across the Soviet Union in large numbers.

The Pushkino radar assigns targets and ties together all of the elements of a BMD system. Additional Pushkino radars will be required before a full system is operational.

"This is a terribly important issue, and a breakout or the potential for a breakout is acute," another Administration official said. "They [Soviet Union] are building more large phased-array radars, but strictly speaking this may not be a violation. And testing the SA-12 against reentry vehicles may not be a violation, if the reentry targets have the characteristics of a Pershing 2. The violation here is one of intent, if not one of the letter of the treaty. It must be viewed in terms of what the impact is on the overall strategic balance."

Members of the National Security Council are calling for a major evaluation of both Soviet offensive and defensive strategic weapons systems combined and how they affect the balance between the superpowers. "The arms control treaties tended to divide offense and defense, and we have not accomplished a study linking the two. This gives us the perfect opportunity to take a close look at the impact of linking them," the official explained.

The Soviet Union is building the infrastructure for a multitiered defensive program, including the capabilityy to deploy space-based, directed-energy weapons for boost-phase intercepts. The USSR also has a ground-based beam weapons program that could be integrated with the program.

There are three separate directed-energy weapons complexes, each with a different type laser devise, at Saryshagan where weapons tests against targets are being conducted, including tests against reentry vehicle targets.

Useful defense

The Defense Dept. contends that a U.S. ballistic missile defense system is not useful unless it can destroy 99.9% of the hostile warheads fired by intercontinental ballistic missiles. "The Soviet Union, on the other hand, believes that a system that can engage and destroy 40% of the attacking force is worth deploying," the official said.

"The U.S. would have trouble now getting its missiles to all of the targets around Moscow, and with deployment of SA-12 in the vicinity of ICBM fields the capability to respond, making a deterrent credible, would be diminished," the official added. "What makes it even more worrisome is that we know that other systems that have not yet shown up are in research and development."

Politics in an election year make it difficult for the President to call attention to the Soviet Union's ballistic missile defense program, and what appear to be violations of the treaty—testing a dual-mode air defense/ballistic missile defense weapon such as the SA-12 and deployment of the radar at Abalakova where it can protect ICBM fields.

"Arms control is a growth industry in the U.S., and we can sell anything in the name of arms control, especially this year. The U.S. tends to view the world in the prism of arms control agreements and neglect threats not specifically covered by some arms control agreement," the official said.

"We might find this year that we have zero time to respond to an ABM Treaty breakout by the USSR with no way to provide in a timely way a parallel capability. There is no way to accelerate a defensive initiative in the U.S. to duplicate the Soviet capability."●

HEART ATTACK SIGNALS AND ACTION

HON. BOB WHITTAKER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. WHITTAKER. Mr. Speaker, as many as 1.5 million Americans may have a heart attack this year and about 550,000 of them will die. It is a very frightening and helpless experience to be with someone who is suffering a heart attack—and it is even more frightening to realize you do not know how to save them. It happened to me. Had I been trained in cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR) I might have saved a life.

It is from that experience that I realized the importance of CPR training and I now want to do what I can to encourage others to learn CPR before they find themselves in a situation where they are unable to save a life.

Last February, during American Heart Month, I joined with my colleague Mr. WYDEN, the Office of the Physician of the Congress, Dr. Freeman Cary and the American Heart Association to encourage Members and their staffs to take CPR certification classes. More than 300 Capitol Hill employees completed the course in CPR training. Given the success of last year's program, it will be repeated again this February as we recognize American Heart Month.

CPR enables all Americans to give the greatest gift of all—the gift of life. It is an opportunity that should not be passed by.

CPR is only a part of the process of dealing with a heart attack situation. The American Heart Association in its "Heart Facts—1984" publication makes the following general observations and recommendations for recognizing the signs of and the steps in dealing with a heart attack situation.

HEART ATTACK SIGNALS AND ACTION

1. Know the warning signals of a heart attack:

Uncomfortable pressure, fullness, squeezing or pain in the center of our chest, lasting two minutes or more.

Pain may spread to shoulders, neck or arms.

Severe pain, dizziness, fainting, sweating, nausea or shortness of breath may also occur.

Not all of these signals, however, are always present.

Don't wait. Get help immediately.

2. Know what to do in case of an emergency:

If you are having chest discomfort which lasts for two minutes or more, call the emergency rescue service.

If you can get to a hospital faster by car, have someone drive you.

Find out which hospitals in your area offer 24-hour emergency cardiac care.

Select in advance the facility nearest your home and office and tell your family and friends so that they will know what to do.

Keep a list of emergency rescue service numbers next to your telephone and in a prominent place in your pocket, wallet or purse.

3. Be a heart saver:

If you are with someone who is having the "signals," and if they last for two minutes or longer, act at once.

Expect a "denial." It is normal to deny the possibility of anything as serious as a heart attack—but insist on taking prompt action.

Call the emergency rescue service, or

Get to the nearest hospital emergency room that offers 24-hour emergency care.

Give mouth-to-mouth breathing and chest compression (CPR) if it is necessary and if you are properly trained.

I want to encourage my colleagues to learn the warning signals for a heart attack and what action to take—it could save a life.●

UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE EAGLEBURGER'S REMARKS ON LEBANON

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I am a member, is reviewing proposals concerning future U.S. policy in Lebanon.

On February 2, 1984, Hon. Lawrence S. Eagleburger, Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, testified before our committee on the subject of our policy with regard to Lebanon. Mr. Eagleburger's statement is an incisive, comprehensive, and statesmanlike discussion of the adverse consequences facing the United States if legislation is approved calling for the prompt and orderly withdrawal of U.S. Forces from Lebanon. Because this legislation is scheduled, as I understand it, for early floor consideration, I commend Mr. Eagleburger's testimony to my colleagues so they may place the issue of U.S. troop withdrawal from Lebanon within the appropriate perspective.

Accordingly, I insert the full text of Mr. Eagleburger's statement at this point in the RECORD:

PREPARED STATEMENT OF HON. LAWRENCE S. EAGLEBURGER, UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR POLITICAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, I am here today to present the Administration's view of the concurrent resolution submitted yesterday "to bring about the prompt and orderly withdrawal" of U.S. armed forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

Just four months ago, the Congress and the President went through a similar extensive review on a similar subject. A Joint Resolution was passed, which the President signed on October 12 because, as he said, it "provide[d] important support for the U.S. presence and policies in Lebanon and facilitate[d] the pursuit of U.S. interests in that region on the bipartisan basis that has been the traditional hallmark of American foreign policy." That Joint Resolution stated the Congress's finding that the Multinational Force in Lebanon "better enables the Government of Lebanon to establish its unity, independence, and territorial integrity." It spoke in favorable terms of our basic objectives in Lebanon: removal of all foreign forces, national political reconciliation, and restoration of the Lebanese government's control over its own territory.

Since the passage of that resolution, one major event has occurred—the terrorist bombing of the Marine barracks in Beirut last October 23. This tragic event seems to have triggered an abrupt change in sentiment about our important interests in Lebanon. It seems, as well, to have been the factor that has led our debate away from a focus on national interests more and more toward partisan, rather than bipartisan, considerations. The President stands solidly behind his conviction of last October, namely that the "traditional hallmark of American foreign policy"—at least of successful American foreign policy—is bipartisanship. Whoever is elected President this November will inherit the consequences of whatever action we take, as a nation, at this moment.

THE DRAFT CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

The Administration is morally bound to oppose this new concurrent resolution. Whether it is legally or constitutionally "binding" on the President or not, is not my concern here. That is not the point. We take sufficiently seriously the importance of Executive-Legislative cooperation to be deeply concerned that such a major divergence of view could develop between the two branches.

We have serious substantive problems with this draft resolution.

It makes a number of sweeping assertions about our policy that are, simply inaccurate, or based on premises that are inaccurate.

It urges, for example, that "every effort must be made" to protect the security of our Marines pending their withdrawal—totally ignoring the extraordinary steps that have already been taken at Beirut airport that make the Marine positions much more secure than before.

It asserts that the Lebanon problem has impeded "efforts for progress" in the broader Middle East peace process—ignoring the recent moves made by King Hussein to strengthen his position, the progress toward the reentry of Egypt into the Arab fold, the increasing cooperation among Arab moderates in response to the Syrian-Iranian-Libyan threat, and the new, fluid situation in the Palestinian movement that resulted from the PLO's debacle in Lebanon. American diplomats from Phil Habib to Bud McFarlane and Dick Fairbanks to Don Rumsfield have given, and continue to give, the highest priority to fostering direct negotiations to solve the basic Arab-Israeli problem. Indeed, it is a precipitate U.S. withdrawal from Lebanon that would pose the greatest danger to the prospects for the peace process.

The draft resolution calls for a "concerted diplomatic effort at the United Nations" to replace the MNF with a UN peacekeeping force, but gives no recognition to the fact that it is Syrian and Soviet opposition to a UN role that has blocked this so far. In September, there were intensive efforts by the United States and other parties to use UN elements as observers in the Shuf; it was Syria that vetoed the concept. Efforts have been underway for some time to explore whether there has been a change in attitude on the part of the Syrians and Soviets; there is no conclusive answer. And we must remember that it is highly unlikely that a UN presence can really replace the MNF as a counterweight to Syrian power: The most important counterweight will be the Lebanese Army, but even that will require backing and support from Lebanon's friends. Indeed, a successful insertion of the UN in whatever capacity presupposes the achievement of a stable balance of forces in Lebanon between the external powers and between the internal forces. That is what we are attempting to bring about.

A more serious flaw in the resolution is that all its criticism is directed at the United States and Lebanon—the two parties working hardest for a peaceful solution. There is not a word of criticism of Syria, Iran, the Soviet Union, or the Lebanese factions that have assaulted the legitimate government and prevented diplomatic progress toward reconciliation. I find it hard to understand the perennial assumption in some quarters that the only way to break an impasse is to beat up our friends. Both the United States and Lebanon have been forthcoming on the issue of political accommodation; Ambassador Rumsfeld has spent several months making clear our willingness to achieve compromise solutions, and indeed discussing formulas; he has had the full backing and authorization of President Gemayel. Our diplomatic efforts have been constant, intense, and flexible. The unpleasant fact remains that Syria will not permit progress toward a government of national unity until the Lebanese government cancels its May 17 agreement with Israel—which would only create a new crisis with Lebanon's southern neighbor. This is a totally artificial barrier erected by Syria. I can assure you that Lebanon, the United States, and Israel have indicated willingness to settle: The obstacle is Syria. And a major factor encouraging Syria to stonewall is the obvious weakening of will in some of the MNF capitals, including our own.

Finally, the draft resolution gives short shrift to the important interests that the United States has at stake in Lebanon, aside from a passing reference in the opening paragraph.

THE STAKES IN LEBANON

We should all understand clearly what the stakes are in Lebanon.

The true subject of this debate, and the true subject of this resolution, is not Lebanon but the Middle East, because the Lebanon problem is part and parcel of the Middle East problem. I do not have to explain to this committee why the Middle East is important to America's strategic interests, and to the free world's strategic interests. You all know that the Middle East is a strategic crossroads, the repository of vital energy resources on which the free world depends, a crucial arena of competition between the United States and the Soviet Union, and a region of many key countries of great importance to us.

Involved in Lebanon are some of the main players in the wider Middle East conflict, such as Syria and Israel, and some of the same key issues. At stake is a small country's right to survive under outside pressures, threats, and blackmail. At stake is the principle of peaceful solutions to conflict, which is under attack by those who would impose their will by force.

Lebanon is a moderate Arab country—indeed a democracy and a long-time friend of the United States—that has dared to negotiate with Israel—and is under assault for that very reason. If the forces of extremism are permitted to overthrow a moderate government that has turned toward peace, what chances are there that other moderate Arab states will risk committing themselves to peace? If extremism takes over in Lebanon, it will strengthen the forces of extremism in the entire Middle East, and weaken, and dishearten, all those who believe in moderation and negotiation. The security of Israel is bound to be affected. To put it positively, if those who believe in peace succeed in Lebanon, it will strengthen the forces of peace in the entire region.

Congressional delegations and staff delegations have visited the Middle East in recent weeks and have heard—in stark and explicit terms—what all our friends in the area think will be the consequences if we desert Lebanon. The virtually unanimous view of both Israelis and moderate Arabs is that a precipitate U.S. withdrawal from Lebanon would be "a disaster" and "devastating"—these are quotes—for the U.S. strategic position in the Middle East and for the future of the region. I can cite some examples:

The Israeli Ambassador said in remarks to the press on January 10 that a precipitate U.S. withdrawal "would carry dire consequences to U.S. foreign policy. It is up to the American government," he said, "to decide if this region is to fall into Soviet control or into the control of radical Arab states."

The government of Egypt has made clear to us its conviction that precipitate withdrawal would be "a serious mistake" and "would heavily erode American credibility and influence throughout the area." An influential Egyptian leader was quoted in the New York Times of January 25 as saying that if America abandoned its commitment in Lebanon, it would "send shock waves throughout the region," "strengthen the position of Syria and, hence, the Soviet Union," and "weaken moderates, such as King Hussein, who must rely on American support should he decide to risk negotiations."

We have heard similar sentiments from many friendly Arab governments, such as Jordan and Saudi Arabia, that have supported our policy of seeking stability, reconciliation, and withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

In a case like this, walking away from a difficult problem doesn't solve it—it only postpones the day of reckoning. A victory in Lebanon for the forces of radicalism and extremism will only embolden them. Letting Syria gobble up Lebanon now may only be guaranteeing that in the near-term future, an even greater crisis will occur with Syria, forcing Israel—and perhaps also the United States—to react in even more dangerous circumstances.

We face another, specific problem in Lebanon—the problem of terrorism. The challenge now is state-sponsored terrorism—not the work of random groups of fanatics but of regimes such as Iran, Libya, and Syria using terrorism as a weapon of policy. Because of America's position in the world, Americans are bound to be targets—not only our Marines but our diplomats, and even our distinguished educators like Dr. Malcolm Kerr. They are targets because they represent us. State-sponsored terrorism is a weapon directed against us—against our interests, our policies, and our most basic values. These we cannot abandon. This is a harsh reality we must face up to in the 1980's.

The overwhelming majority of our casualties in Lebanon, as you all know, came not from combat, not from military weakness, not from "confusion" about policies or military missions, but from one terrorist attack. If we abandon a major foreign policy and a major national interest because of this one terrorist assault, we are yielding the field to those who do not wish us well.

If terrorism wins such a major victory in Lebanon, what does it signify for the world's future? Will the world be safer? Or will the world be a more dangerous place? Is this how the United States behaves when it is challenged by terrorists in a region of vital strategic interests? We may bring our boys home to safety now, but we run an enormous risk of encouraging escalating crises which may, down the road, compel us to send our boys out again in even more dangerous circumstances. Whatever the costs and risks of staying—which I do not for one moment deny—what of the costs and risks that will surely be incurred if we hand these forces of extremism such a major victory?

The draft resolution takes note of the problem of terrorism, urging measures to protect against it. This we agree with, and this we are doing. But I regret to say that the resolution's operative recommendation in fact would have us give in to it.

The Congress, I believe—indeed I implore—should think carefully about the implications of deserting a friend that is relying on us, and about the price we will surely pay in the months—and perhaps years—ahead.

OUR POLICY IN LEBANON

Let me try to explain, in positive terms, what our policy is in Lebanon.

We have to distinguish between three things: our long-term goals; the mission of the Marines; and what we will accept in a political compromise:

Our long-term goals remain as they were, and as they are stated in last October's Joint Resolution: the unity, independence and territorial integrity of Lebanon, withdrawal of all foreign forces; restoration of the government's control over its territory. These are goals we would seek for any country.

We do not expect our Marines to bring about these ambitious goals. The mission of the Marines has always been a much more limited one: to provide the Government of Lebanon a breathing spell to begin to sort out the country's political problems. Their presence, from the beginning, was to facilitate the restoration of Lebanese government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area and to help assure the safety of people in that area. They were never meant as a combat force or as a permanent force.

We recognize that achievement of long-term goals and even short-term goals will require political compromise. That has always been our position. As I said, our diplomacy has been active—and flexible.

Within the last two months, there seemed to be signs of progress:

An agreement was reached on the evacuation of Dayr al-Qamar.

There were indications that the Lebanese opposition was eager to move ahead to a government of national unity.

Negotiations on the security plan for the Beirut area were proceeding.

The release of Lt. Goodman seemed to indicate Syrian interest in a dialogue.

Our willingness to respond vigorously to shelling and to attacks on our reconnaissance planes seemed to create a climate of caution on the part of those whose objectives differed from ours.

In early January, this progress slowed. Syria's position hardened; this was evident to all those who met with Syrian officials. The negotiations over the security plan suddenly bogged down, as one of Syria's principal allies in Lebanon—Walid Jumblatt—began raising a host of new issues after an agreement had been signed.

The reason for this deterioration was almost certainly that the staying power of some of those resisting Syrian pressures seemed to be eroding. Syrian officials commented that the United States seemed "short of breath." In short, when we showed steadiness of purpose, progress was being made. When we wavered, progress stopped. When we show that steadiness again, progress will resume. Thus, Mr. Chairman, the first order of business if we truly seek a solution in Lebanon is to restore the impression and reality of American steadiness.

We must not overlook the positive developments that are still evident. Among them are: the steady growth and effectiveness of the Lebanese Army; the firmness of United States-Israeli relations, which is helping our diplomacy in Lebanon and will continue to do so; the strengthening of the bloc of moderate Arab countries to counter the Syrian-Iranian-Libyan axis; the continuing diplomatic efforts to nail down agreement on the security plan; and the continuing determination of President Gemayel to pursue the path of political accommodation, reform, and reconciliation.

The Administration that I represent here today is well aware of the many problems we face in Lebanon. It makes no claim of total wisdom in what, admittedly, is a difficult—indeed a tragic—situation. We have reviewed our policies and our programs constantly; we will continue to do so, looking always for ways to do what must be done more effectively, and with the safety of all our personnel in Lebanon, civilian and military, always upermost in our minds. We want to work with the Congress in a cooperative and constructive spirit in this effort.

Nothing in the world is simple any more, if it ever was. We face, in this decade, a complex political/military challenge that yields to no simple solutions. The world will never be in a state of either total peace or total war; few military challenges will ever be as clear-cut as an all-out Soviet threat to NATO or as quick as the Grenada operation. There will always be ambiguous, messy problems requiring, above all, perseverance. There are bound to be risks and there is bound to be sacrifice. But we cannot opt out of the game, because if we do so, the world becomes more dangerous for America, for its interests, and for its friends.

I cannot promise you that pursuing our goals with steadfastness and dedication in Lebanon will yield immediate positive results. But I can assure you that failure to pursue them—cutting and running, if you will—will do enormous harm.

Let me repeat: The President and his Administration remain ready, willing, and eager to work with the Congress in a spirit of cooperation. No one has a monopoly of wisdom or of concern for our people. We are prepared to keep Congress informed, and to discuss all the issues. But the President is constitutionally and morally obliged to defend the interests of the United States as he sees them. It is his duty to stand by this nation's international responsibilities. History will never forgive him—or us—if we give in to short-term pressures and fears, only to give rise to more menacing challenges down the road.

Thirty-five years ago this month, Senator Arthur Vanderberg, a distinguished American statesman and legislator told a Lincoln Day audience in Detroit:

"It will be a sad hour for the Republic if we ever desert the fundamental concept that politics shall stop at the water's edge. It will be a triumphant day for those who would divide and conquer us if we abandon the quest for a united voice when America demands peace with honor in the world. In my view nothing has happened to absolve either Democrats or Republicans from continuing to put their country first. Those who don't will serve neither their party nor themselves."

Thank you very much.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. THOMAS R. CARPER

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 1, 1984

● Mr. CARPER. Mr. Speaker, today, we in Congress are commemorating the 66th anniversary of Ukraine's Independence Day. On January 22, 1918, the Ukrainian National Republic was confirmed with the words:

From now on the Ukrainian National Republic becomes the independent, free and sovereign state of the Ukrainian people.

Through force of Russian arms and the confiscation of grain in Ukraine, millions died in the young republic, and by 1923, the Ukrainian S.S.R. was declared a constituent republic of the Soviet Union. This independence, though short-lived, serves as fuel to the spirit of Ukrainians everywhere, and reminds us of our privileged rights of freedom here in the United States.

Through the Ad Hoc Committee on the Baltic States and Ukraine, I urge President Reagan to open a U.S. Consulate in Kiev. I encourage the State Department to list Ukraine independently from the U.S.S.R. in its country report on human rights. Last summer, I adopted a Ukrainian political prisoner, Stanislav Zubko, a prisoner of conscience sentenced to 4 years of labor camp, and encourage each of my colleagues to do the same.

Let us remember with respect the 66th anniversary of Ukraine's independence, and commit ourselves to a positive approach to securing rights for the Ukrainians today.●

BUCCANEERS OF SPORT

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, it is not very often that I agree with syndicated Columnist George Will. However, this morning I was delighted to read his column "Buccaneers of Sport." He has eloquently outlined the Russian roulette that cities play with each other in trying to get a limited number of sports franchises.

I would like to remind Members that I have introduced legislation, H.R. 2041, which would protect cities from the ravages of these marauders. I would like to insert Mr. Will's column to show what is happening without the legislation.

BUCCANEERS OF SPORT
(By George F. Will)

The suit involving the Oakland Raiders (a k a, temporarily, the Los Angeles Raiders) may yet become American law's answer to "A Chorus Line, "Broadway's longest-running show. I bring to this interminable case a zest that only a Redskins' fan can feel, but the stakes in the case are enormous for many cities.

When Anaheim lured the Rams from the Los Angeles Colosseum, Los Angeles spent millions to entice Al Davis' Raiders from Oakland, where for 13 straight sessions they had played before sellouts in the stadium the city built for them. Now, Oakland, which has a clever head above its blue collar, wants to seize the team under the power of eminent domain. Davis, who thinks of himself as Dred Scott, cries "Slavery!" He has won in three lower courts, but has been reversed three times.

California's Supreme Court says eminent domain can be sued to acquire intangible property, such as the web of contract rights that is an NFL franchise, and that acquisition of a sports franchise could be an appropriate municipal function. Courts are deferential to local authorities' assessments of public uses for property seized by eminent domain. Oakland argues, irrefutably, that a professional team becomes woven into the civic identity, especially in "second-tier" cities such as Oakland. Oakland also argues that re-acquisition of the Raiders would serve social, recreational and economic needs, including the usefulness of the stadium. Oakland can easily establish all that, using facts that illustrate how much turns on Oakland's winning its case.

Consider Indianapolis, where a booster says major-league teams are essential for a major city's image: "Having a major-league franchise is a state of mind." But using professional sports for municipal psychotherapy is a risky business. Soon the $77 million Hoosier Dome will have 61,000 shiny seats, but it will have no teams. Rock concerts cannot pay for such a building, and teams are scarce. Neither the NFL nor major league baseball is about to expand. And if, as I hope and predict, Oakland recaptures the Raiders, most existing franchises will be deterred from even attempting to relocate.

Even if some are able to move, Indianapolis might not hook one. Cities angling for baseball or football teams include New York, New Orleans, Denver, Tampa, St. Petersburg, Washington, Phoenix, Buffalo, Sacramento, Memphis and Vancouver, British Columbia.

Why? Some economists say that for every dollar spent getting into the stadium, seven dollars are spent outside on hotels, restaurants, taxis, etc. A 1980 study showed that eight home Steelers games meant $11 million to Pittsburgh's economy. Denver thinks a baseball team would mean $70 million a year. Tampa raked in $70 million from the Super Bowl. Last October one World Series game meant $8 million to Baltimore. During the 1982 baseball strike, the major of Cincinnati said that every cancelled game meant $900,000 that was not spent.

Furthermore, the new stadiums have a new wrinkle in money-making luxury boxes. Robert Strauss (a nose guard for the Democratic Party) recently received an offer for the box—it seats 12—that he and two others own at the Cowboys' stadium. The offer was for substantially more than Strauss received recently when he sold a four-bedroom house situated on three-quarters of an acre in a nice section of Dallas. One stadium box recently sold for $1 million.

When cities go seeking major league teams there also is the factor of animal spirits or, if you prefer, cachet. When Hubert Humphrey was asked if keeping the Twins and Vikings in Minneapolis mattered, he replied: "Yes. What do you want to become, a cold Omaha?" Today both teams play in the Hubert H. Humphrey Metrodome, but the Twins are being courted by other cities.

Indianapolis and other cities may want Davis to defeat Oakland's suit so that there can be migratory franchises for them to lure. But if they land one, their huge capital investments (stadiums) will be at the mercy of buccaneers like Davis who are nimble at the art of getting cities to bid against one another.

With teams receiving ever-richer tax breaks and other subsidies, sport is becoming a public, not to say semi-socialist, enterprise. Davis, with the sort of brass that would have caused P. T. Barnum to blush, demands an unconditioned right of private property. But his raw materials (players) are produced largely at public expense; the stadiums he plays in are almost all public costs; and he gets a guaranteed annual fortune from a regulated semi-monopoly (the television networks).

Today Davis is rumored to be dreaming about an even greener pasture—New York, which has lost two teams to New Jersey. The bidding may be about to begin. And you thought entrepreneurship had vanished from America.●

EIGHTY-EIGHT HOUSE MEMBERS URGE SOVIETS TO LET LIVSHITS FAMILY GO

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, over 3 years ago, Vladimir Livshits sought permission to emigrate from the Soviet Union to Israel.

The consequences for Livshits and his family have been sad—and all too predictable. They are the victims of the Soviet oppression of its Jewish citizens and of the deterioration of Soviet-Western relations. With the Soviets allowing only an averge of 100 Soviet Jews to emigrate a month, there are now hundreds of thousands of families like the Livshits. They are men, women, and children denied the fundamental human right of freedom to emigrate to join families in other countries.

I am sending today an appeal to Soviet President Andropov signed by 88 House Members in which we ask President Andropov to allow the Livshits freedom to go. The response in this House to my invitation to sign this appeal has been most encouraging. I very much hope that our expression of concern will in some way help Vladimir and Anna Livshits and their two children Boris and Maria.

The Members of this House should know that our letters do make a difference for some Soviet Jews. Three years ago, I began writing on behalf of Boris Dekhovich, a Soviet Jew denied permission to emigrate. After several appeals on his behalf, which, according to Soviet practice, were officially refused for delivery, Boris Dekhovich and his family were given permission to emigrate last fall.

The Minnesota-Dakotas Action Council for Soviet Jewry based in Minneapolis brought the Livshits family to my attention. As a member of the Minnesota Elected Officials for Soviet Jewry, I am pleased to lead this effort on behalf of the Livshits.

I ask that the text of our letter and the list of signatories be included in the RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 27, 1984.

His Excellency YURI ANDROPOV,
Secretary-General of the Communist Party and President of the U.S.S.R., Kremlin, Moscow RSFSR

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We are writing to appeal on behalf of the Livshits family, Kirovsky Prospect 64-3-139, Leningrad 197022. Vladimir and Anna Livshits have applied for permission to emigrate to Israel with their two children Boris and Maria.

The Livshits first applied for emigration visas in September 1981. Their application was rejected in December 1981. Since that time, your government has refused similar requests at least four times. As a consequence of their application for emigration visas, both Vladimir and Anna lost their positions. Vladimir has been threatened with the charge of parasitism, despite his strong desire to find meaningful employment.

In November, after a three week hunger strike, he was finally given the lowest possible menial employment.

The rejection of the Livshits' application to emigrate represents a denial of fundamental rights guaranteed them under the Helsinki Accords.

We urge you to reconsider the unfortunate decisions of your government that have resulted in the denial of such a basic human right to the Livshits. Motivated by desire to practice their religion in freedom and to join family members in Israel, the Livshits have endured harassment and persecution.

As democratically elected members of the United States Congress, we feel that it is our responsibility to speak out on behalf of men and women like Vladimir and Anna Livshits who seek to enjoy fundamental human rights.

We very much hope that the year 1984 will bring freedom for the Livshits family.

Sincerely,

Gary L. Ackerman, James L. Oberstar, Anthony C. Beilenson, Howard L. Berman, Sala Burton, Thomas R. Carper, James McClure Clarke, Daniel B. Crane, Richard J. Durbin, Bernard J. Dwyer, Don Edwards, Walter E. Fauntroy, Vic Fazio, Bobbi Fiedler, James J. Florio, Barney Frank, Sam Gejdenson, Benjamin A. Gilman, Dan Glickman, Tom Harkin, Nancy L. Johnson, Marcy Kaptur.

SENSE OF THE CONGRESS RESOLUTION

HON. DAVID R. OBEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, today on behalf of myself and 16 other House Members (Messrs. BEDELL, BERMAN, COELHO, COOPER, DORGAN, HARKIN, MACKAY, MITCHELL, MOODY, MRAZEK, REID, SABO, SIKORSKI, LARRY SMITH, STARK, and TOWNS) I am introducing a "Sense of the Congress Resolution" calling on President Reagan to resubmit his fiscal 1985 budget.

The President indicated in his state of the Union speech that commonsense budgets would be those that spent no more than they take in. Yet his budget request yesterday included a deficit approaching $200 billion.

The President may not have authority to veto individual line items in legislation passed by the Congress, but he certainly has the authority to veto individual spending items proposed within the executive branch before they are included in his budget. We are simply asking that he use that authority and give us a budget that is in balance.

The resolution we are introducing states:

That it is sense of Congress that the President should submit to Congress a revised annual budget for the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1984, making such adjustments as are necessary to ensure that expenditures by the Federal Government do not exceed revenues received by the Federal Government during that fiscal year. If the President deems that such a budget is impossible to achieve during fiscal year 1985, the President should submit to Congress a revised annual budget for the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1984, making such adjustments as would be necessary to ensure that expenditures by the Federal Government would not exceed revenues received by the Federal Government if the economy were at full employment.

This resolution calls upon the President to submit a budget that is in balance, in line with his comments in his state of the Union message. It gives him the option, if he feels it is impossible to accomplish that in 1 year, to propose a budget that would at least be in balance if the economy were in full employment.

Few people fully appreciate the impact which the budget has on overall congressional decisionmaking. These numbers provide the baseline from which we work. They are the product of the efforts of the thousands of people the President has at his command throughout the Government, whose only job is to determine what is essential to run the Government and what can be eliminated. It is with these people that the fight for a commonsense budget must begin.

Most of the sponsors of this resolution will also be signing a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury offering the President temporary 1-year authority to exercise a line item veto on domestic spending bills in return for an agreement to freeze military spending for 1 year.

I will discuss that in more detail next week.●

A VERY SPECIAL LITTLE GIRL

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Justine Pinheiro, a 4½-year-old girl from Pawtucket, R.I. whose life was filled with more courage and bravery than most human beings possess in a lifetime. From the day she was born, Justine fought a life or death battle against biliary atresia, a debilitating and ultimately fatal liver disease. On Tuesday, January 31, Justine finally succumbed to the disease, quietly slipping from a coma in the intensive care unit of the children's hospital in Pittsburgh, Pa.

Over the past year Justine underwent two liver transplant operations intended to save her life. In the process, her family and loved ones were thrust into a cycle of physical, financial, and emotional trauma. Through it all, Justine displayed an unswerving sense of cheerfulness and optimism. Despite the pain and emotional strain, she attempted to live as a normal child, riding her bike, playing with new friends outside children's hospital, and even attending nursery school in the fall. As her story was related to others through the media, she became a sort of hero. Her courage and bravery attracted the hearts of thousands of Rhode Islanders and citizens across the country, including First Lady Nancy Reagan. This remarkable little girl's fight for life was shared by thousands. Her loss is felt by just as great a number.

The novelist Max Lerner once said that the "best tribute you can pay to some one who dies is to share his belief in life by putting your life ahead of his own death." Such is the legacy of Justine Pinheiro. The setbacks this little girl fought against dwarf the everyday misfortunes which, unfortunately, tend to get the better of many of us. Yet Justine met her challenge face on, with vivaviousness, energy, and unflagging optimism. Perhaps it is true that children by their very nature understand better the strange turns which life sometimes takes. Justine certainly did. All of us who followed her saga must take away from her experience the realization that life is the most precious experience, and that every day we should take utmost' advantage of the special talents and opportunities which God has given us. If our own lives can be filled with one-tenth of the courage which this little girl exhibited, the whole world will be a much better place in which to live.

Mr. Speaker, medical advances may one day make the liver transplant operation as safe and sure as a tonsil operation. We, as policymakers, have a responsibility to expedite that process. We should immediately support legislation to increase public awareness of the need for liver donors, to establish a coordinated system for matching needy individuals with donors, to promote research and development into new drugs like cyclosporin which make successful transplants possible, and to provide some form of catastrophic funding for families like the Pinheiro's who are forced to bear the financial burden of a transplant operation.

I know that all my colleagues join me in extending our consolation and prayers to the Pinheiro family and to the thousands of other children presently waiting to undergo organ transplants. My hope is that these children may face their challenge with the same courage, optimism, and bravery, which Justine Pinheiro so overwhelmingly displayed. She truly was a very special little girl.●

MORTGAGE REVENUE BONDS

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, as a strong supporter of the mortgage revenue bond program, I had read with great interest a press release from the Connecticut Housing Finance Authority regarding the application for mortgages last November. It took only 3 hours on November 25 for anxious applicants to fully apply for the Connecticut Housing Finance Authority's $60 million of mortgage loans at a fixed rate of 9⅞ percent.

This was the greatest demand for any previous single day in CHFA's history, and over 1,200 mortgages have been reserved. In light of the fact that CHFA will soon be accepting applications for the last $50 million of mortgages under the expired mortgage revenue bond program, I want to urge my colleagues to support the continuation of this program when the extension is brought back onto the House floor. Agencies such as CHFA can function for a limited amount of time under the existing conditions, but time is running out and we need to renew this important housing program.●

SCIENCE EDUCATION: THE FEDERAL ROLE

HON. MICHAEL A. ANDREWS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the quality of education in our country has received an unending flow of commentary since the National Commission on Excellence in Education reported the rising tide of mediocrity threatening American schools last spring. The word was dire. And the effect was phenomenal. In Washington, educational excellence became the sexiest issue since nuclear exchange. Apparently, America was finally ready to hear—and not just hear but understand—that the unlimited resources of the American intellectual landscape had been ignored, taken for granted, starved. We had become slack and complacent. We found the laurels that had been sitting so comfortably on our heads for so long replaced again and again by those made in Japan and West Germany.

After we took a look at what had gone wrong, we discovered:

On standardized college entrance exams, the average science and math scores have been dropping steadily for 20 years.

Only one-third of the Nation's school districts require more than 1 year of math and 1 year of science for graduation. It is interesting to note that in the U.S.S.R., China, Japan, and East Germany, specialized study for children begins in the sixth grade with separate courses in math, biology, chemistry, physics, and geology. These courses last 4 to 6 years and are required of all students. The time spent on these subjects, based on class hours, is approximately three times that spent by even the most science-oriented students in the United States. It is no surprise, then, that Japan, with a population half that of the United States, graduates almost twice the number of engineers. The U.S.S.R. produces six times as many.

During the 1970's there was a 77-percent decline nationwide in the number of secondary school math teachers being trained and a 65-percent decline in the number of secondary science teachers being trained. By 1981, 43 of our 50 States reported shortages of math and science teachers.

In 1981, almost five times more science and math teachers left to take nonteaching jobs than left to retire. Very often, the replacements for these trained teachers are not qualified. Of the teachers newly employed in 1981–82 to teach high school science or math, 50 percent were formally unqualified and are teaching with emergency certificates.

Our Nation's scientific strength and technological capabilities depend directly on the quality of scientific education received by its students and on the number of students who enter scientific fields. There is no question that the United States is losing its technological edge. The reason stems directly from our flagging commitment to educational excellence in the science, math, and foreign language areas at the precollege level. We have taken our pioneering role for granted. We can no longer afford to.

As our country continues the transition from an industrial to an information-based economy, technically skilled workers will remain in demand. Twenty percent of our labor force is currently employed in blue-collar manufacturing jobs; and most projections for the year 2005 indicate that only 5 to 10 percent of the work force will be engaged in these types of jobs. Even with 9.2 million out of work, the private sector is crying out for more engineers and technically skilled workers. Yet, only 13 percent of all high school graduates are prepared for the engineering curriculum they encounter in college, compared with 28 percent in 1972. The National Research Council reported that 49 percent of all doctoral degrees awarded in engineering in 1981 went to non-U.S. citizens.

These are sobering facts made more sobering by the recent remarks of Simon Ramo. Dr. Ramo is the "R" in TRW, Inc. He observed that high schools are moving on a trend that will produce scientific illiteracy just at a time when the world is becoming more and more highly technological and when competition both for commercial peacetime products and competition in technological systems having to do with security are reaching new heights. Washington Times, November 29, 1983.

Our schools are crucial to the success of everything we attempted to do. The terms are stark: If our commitment to education ultimately fails, we, as a nation, will ultimately fail. I completely agree with Senator JOHN GLENN when he says that whether or not we do what needs to be done in the area of science education is nothing less than a test of our national will. Granted, we cannot fix the problem overnight. And excellence will require constant vigilance. But we can learn a lesson. We can begin to repair the damage that has been done.

A recent publication by the National Academy of Sciences and the National Academy of Engineering states that kids are turned off by the formal study of math and science. They do not respect their schools or the intellectual effort required of rigorous learning. They do not respect the subject matter nor the people who teach it. The attitude of our children reflects our own attitude, an attitude that must change if we are ever to deal effectively with the mediocrity that has settled on our Nation's schools. The average starting salary for a high school teacher is $11,000. What does that say about the social value we place on education? Instead of expecting teachers to live in genteel poverty on a salary that would starve a church mouse, instead of treating the profession as a glorified form of adolescent day care, it is time we enter the 20th century, and recognized teaching as the strategic profession that it is. We need to pay teachers a decent salary. We need to reward a job well done, and pay attention when the job's poorly done or not done at all. We need to encourage rigorous standards for those that enter the teaching profession and provide incentives for their entry. We need to continue to search for innovative ways to encourage those still teaching to remain, and we need to improve their skills and keep their know-how up-to-date. We need to insure that those who are teaching now are qualified and stay qualified.

We have responded to this challenge. The Emergency Math and Science Education Act, of which I was an early cosponsor, was drafted jointly by the Science and Technology Committee and the Education Committee and passed on March 2. The bill, yet to be passed by the Senate, authorizes $425 million to strengthen elementary, secondary, and postsecondary education in math and science. The bill includes direct payments to State and local agencies for educational improvement programs. It sets up a national incentive scholarship program to encourage college students to enter teaching in math, science, and foreign languages. The bill also funds summer institutes, teacher initiative grants, postsecondary curriculum improvement, and educational research. This bill is not a magic cure, nor is it meant to be. But it is a good starting point and signals that the Federal Government not only recognizes the importance of education to our future, but is willing to back up that recognition with funds.

And we need to raise standards. I am also cosponsoring the American Defense Education Act. This bill provides incentives to local school districts to improve the quality of instruction and research in a number of strategic areas including math and science. In addition, the ADEA provides grants aimed at improving teacher training at the college level.

I believe the ADEA is a step in the right direction. If providing strong math and science backgrounds to our Nation's students is tantamount to providing them with an effective defense—and in the long run, I believe it is—is it wise and is it fair to let educational standards be determined on a volunteer basis? How can we expect a local school district in Texas or anywhere to somehow know what is enough science? Does it not make sense to establish national standards of excellence for elementary and secondary schools and then provide financial incentives to our often impoverished school districts to apply them? I certainly think it does.

There are other options to consider. If we are going to require more math and science in the schools, we need to consider expanding the school year. Or offering electives during the summer instead of the regular school year. We need to open up more dialog between the colleges and universities that are trying to deal with scientifically illiterate high school graduates and the educators at the secondary level who are designing curricula.

We need to attract more students into math and sciences. On the secondary level, we can expand offerings for those who are exceptional in math and sciences. We can offer college credit for advanced science and math courses. We can allow high school students to take college courses before they graduate. We can expand summer research opportunities between high schools and universities, industry and government.

We need to rethink math and science curricula and teaching. Maybe we should be teaching students when to multiply and divide now, instead of how. Perhaps we should introduce the video into the classroom. Certainly, up-to-date computer hardware should be available wherever possible. Today's students need to be equipped with the knowledge to work with computers. Schools need advice and they need money for initial startup costs for hardware and software. Simon Ramo suggest that the Federal Government use competent engineers and educators to design a standardized package of experiments and appropriate apparatus for use in our Nation's high school labs. Obviously, he says, the Government would have to make the initial investment, but once the software and hardware packages for a physics lab is designed, they can be mass produced at a cost that local high schools could afford. It is an idea. That is what we need right now, ideas.

Many people spend a lot of time arguing about the Federal Government's role in education. In this day and age, science education is high technology. The Federal Government, whether it wants to be or not, must be involved in high technology. For good. That is a fact. Our very survival depends upon our ability to compete in a technological world that is making dizzying advances in an entire spectrum of fields. Fact 1: The Federal Government is involved. Fact 2: The schools are crying out for help. They need help understanding the changing academic base required by employers, as well as employment trends and the changing nature of work. Administrators and school board members need help planning and evaluating costly hardware and software. They need help developing curricula that meets and beats science education standards set by nations that we compete with in international markets. Fact 3: If we do not take the initiative now to lead, we are mortgaging the future of our children and, I am afraid, the future of this great country.

There is a great deal that can be done. And there is much that we should be working for during this session. It is up to Congress to do it.●

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM LEARY, JR.

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of my colleagues the announced retirement later this month of William Leary, Jr., from Martin-Marietta Corp. at Vandenberg Air Force Base, in my California congressional district. Bill Leary has served as special assistant to the vice president of strategic and launch systems division, and enjoys nearly a half-century affiliation with the U.S. military.

Bill Leary's career began in the U.S. Navy in 1942, after he attended Pennsylvania State University. A highly decorated naval aviator who flew combat missions in both World War II and the Korean conflict, Bill also performed duty as a special projects test pilot at the Navy's Patuxent River Test Center and at the time of his retirement from the service was qualified to fly every type of aircraft in the Navy's inventory. Bill graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1948, and also attended the U.S. Naval Post Graduate School at Monterey, Calif. Bill's military retirement took place in 1963, at the naval missile facility at Point Arguello, then located on what is now South Vandenberg Air Force Base.

Bill then began a new and productive career with Martin-Marietta Corp. at Vandenberg. During that tenure of service, he earned the corporation's Operational Performance Award and the USAF (VAFB) "Man of the Hour" Special Award.

It was also Bill who orchestrated the very successful quarterly awards program at Vandenberg for the Lompoc Chamber of Commerce, extending deserved recognition to outstanding personnel serving at the base.

Born in Clementon, N.J. and reared in Pennsylvania, Bill is now, I am happy to say, a permanent and important resident of Lompoc, Calif. An active member of this community, he has supported both the Santa Maria and Lompoc Chambers of Commerce. Recognized as "Man of the Year" by the Lompoc Chamber, he also served as chairman of the chamber's Military Affairs Committee since 1965. Bill is also a member of the Society of Experimental Test Pilots, a past member of the California Council on Criminal Justice, a member of the Lompoc Elks Lodge and the Lompoc Rotary Club as well as several national conservation organizations.

Bill Leary's retirement February 29, 1984, marks the formal conclusion of a distinguished career of service and dedication in our Nation's military and civilian defense system. I am certain my colleagues in this body join me in an expression of thanks and commendation to Bill Leary for his service to the Nation and to his community. We wish him a productive and enjoyable retirement.●

HELPING THE SEVERELY DISABLED

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my colleagues for realizing the importance of the Supplemental Security Income (SSI) special benefits program. The section 1619 benefits, as they are called, permit severely disabled people to be partially self-supporting while retaining entitlement to some SSI benefits and medical coverage. Without the extension of this program, the some 5,000 recipients now on the program, would in all likelihood have been forced to quit their jobs and collect full SSI benefits because they could not have afforded their attendant medical expenses. This would have been a tragedy for these people and for the Nation.

I hope the Senate will act as quickly as we have and with as much unanimity to continue this tremendously important work incentive program.●

AGENT ORANGE

HON. GERALD B. H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, January 31, this House passed H.R. 1961, a measure that I would term a significant step forward toward resolving the problems caused by agent orange.

Agent orange has long been a source of concern and anxiety for one of the most important groups in America—our Vietnam veterans. Unfortunately, these concerns have not been matched by medical or scientific data conclusive enough either to substantiate or to allay these fears. We have been subjected by this dearth of conclusive evidence to conflicting and often contradictory reports as to the health effects of exposure to agent orange.

My colleagues on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee have taken decisive action by ordering a comprehensive investigation into the agent orange issue to be conducted by the Center for Disease Control. We hope this will finally answer the many questions still outstanding.

Because this study will not be completed for some time to come, however, our committee has also acted on interim measures to help those Vietnam veterans who believe their health disorders are attributable to agent orange exposure. These interim approaches to the agent orange question are embodied in H.R. 1961—a bill unanimously reported from the House Veterans' Affairs Committee last year.

H.R. 1961 is by no means all things to all people. Strongly differing views on agent orange abound in the land. Those who believe no connection exists between the herbicide and health disorders point to those studies supporting their viewpoint. Those who blame health disorders on exposure to agent orange also cite reports that bolster their contention.

Even while faced with these contradictory positions, our committee never lost sight of our mandate to provide for those who defended our national interests. Although compromise on this sensitive issue seemed at times elusive, I am very proud of my colleagues on the committee; we were able to report a bill unanimously.

H.R. 1961 provides for temporary disability allowances for those Vietnam veterans who were exposed to agent orange if they are shown to have developed soft tissue sarcoma within 20 years from the time they left Southeast Asia. The bill further provides similar monetary benefits to those who have developed a skin condition known as chloracne or a liver ailment known as PCT within 1 year of their departure from Southeast Asia.

I wish to stress, however, that these compensation benefits are scheduled to be terminated 1 year after Congress receives the final results of the comprehensive agent orange research project now underway at the Center for Disease Control. This 1 year time period will allow us to review carefully the study's conclusions, and to determine at that time what further steps should be taken for these veterans. We will be in a much better position to make these determinations when we are armed with conclusive findings on the scope and depth of the agent orange problem, as promised by this CDC study.

As I said earlier, it is a tribute to the Veterans' Affairs Committee and to this House that this compromise could be achieved, and I think we all can be proud of this accomplishment.

H.R. 1961 is not limited to the agent orange issue, however, I am pleased to be able to report that the bill also addresses a long-standing problem facing those of our Nation's veterans who were involved in the testing of early atomic devices during the Second World War.

Under the provisions of H.R. 1961, benefits will be provided for veterans who participated in the testing of nuclear devices while in service. It will also aid those World War II veterans who occupied Hiroshima or Nagasaki and who later suffered from leukemia, cancer of the thyroid, or polcythemia vera—a bone marrow disease—within 20 years from their exposure to nuclear radiation. For those veterans whose disabilities are shown to exist within the time limits in the bill, VA benefit payments will be equal to service-connected disability compensation rates.

In short, Mr. Speaker, this House can be very proud of the steps we have taken through the passage of H.R. 1961 to address issues and concerns of great importance to these special groups of veterans. The health disorders addressed in this legislation are specialized and limited to certain segments of our Nation's veterans population. Nevertheless, they are worthy of our attention if we are to live up to our mandate to care for those who have sacrificed to defend our national interests.●

TRIBUTE TO DR. RONALD E. McNAIR

HON. ROBIN TALLON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, the upcoming launch of the space shuttle, Challenger, is a particularly special one for me and the citizens of the Sixth District of South Carolina. Chosen as one of the astronauts on this flight is Dr. Ronald McNair, a native of Florence County, S.C.

Dr. McNair was born and raised in Lake City, S.C. After graduating from Carver High School in Lake City, he matriculated to North Carolina A&T State University. Graduating magna cum laude with a bachelor of science degree in physics, he went on to receive a doctor of philosophy in physics from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

On Friday, February 3, 1984, Dr. McNair will join an elite group of 70 Americans who have orbited in space. As well, Dr. McNair will become the second black man to travel in space.

For Dr. McNair, selection as an astronaut has been a milestone in a lifetime of remarkable achievement. Dr. McNair has distinguished himself both in his chosen field of science as well as in a variety of other endeavors. His scientific experiments have provided new understandings in the field of physics. Dr. McNair is also a black belt karate champion, a jazz saxophonist, a football, basketball, and track star, a Ford Foundation fellow, and an amateur veterinarian destined for success. Watching the early manned space flights, he knew that this was something he wanted to do. Others shared his interest but thought the possibility of actually being chosen for the space program was impossible. But Dr. McNair insisted that it could be done.

Dr. McNair's friends and family in Lake City remember him as a youth

This "can do" spirit is an inspiration for the youth of Lake City, of South Carolina, and of the Nation. He represents the type of citizen imbued with the quality, described in the words of President John F. Kennedy, of "having done well, we will strive to do better, having achieved much, we determine to achieve more." His life demonstrates what a dedicated individual can accomplish in this Nation.

Dr. McNair provides a model for a citizen in a democratic society. His life demonstrates those very qualities of aspiration and achievement which have made our Nation great. I am sure my fellow South Carolinians and colleagues in the House of Representatives join me in wishing him and his fellow crew members a safe and successful voyage.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, on February 2, 1984, I was unable to be here in Washington because I was traveling on official business. I would like the record to indicate that if I had been present I would have voted "yea" on House vote No. 19, final passage on H.R. 1904, the Child Abuse and Adoption Reform Act.●

THE STATE OF EXCELLENCE IN EDUCATION

HON. DAN SCHAEFER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. SCHAEFER. Mr. Speaker, this week, Congress passed, by voice vote, House Joint Resolution 203, which recommends that States establish commissions on teacher excellence and evaluate the recommendations of the National Commission on Excellence in Education. I would like to go on record as a firm supporter of this resolution.

Education is the conduit of knowledge, and, ultimately, one of the most important sources of strength in our society. If we are to remain the leader of the free world, quality education must be a national priority.

I would stress that education is primarily the responsibility of parents and local school boards. But I applaud Federal initiatives that complement local efforts without interfering with parental rights and local responsibilities. I think this resolution is just that kind of measure—it encourages States to establish task forces to review key educational issues and suggests general goals for these task forces. Education is properly a local issue, but we must realize that America is the sum of our many unique and diverse, though interdependent, localities—high standards at home mean high national standards.

I would also like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues and the Nation the exemplary initiatives already made in my district and in the State of Colorado. About 6 months before this resolution passed the House, Colorado had already established a group of task forces under an umbrella project called Operation Renaissance. These task forces review various aspects of education in Colorado and make recommendations on how we can make improvements. In fact, some of those recommendations are already being implemented, and others are awaiting consideration by the Colorado State Legislature. The legislative initiatives include toughening teacher certification requirements, changes in the definition of tenure, and providing student proficiency exams throughout students' educational careers.

Task force recommendations concerning teachers include the following changes: eliminating tenure; increasing the entry level salary for teachers providing performance-evaluation criteria/methods; revising the certification law; and providing for participatory management in schools and districts.

As part of the State's overall effort, the Governor established a separate, bipartisan Task Force on Excellence in Education to determine a strategy for improving education in the State. The task force has already made an interim report and will be making a final report in March. Members of the task force have had the opportunity to review the many national reports on education, and their interim recommendations reflect a sensitivity to the concerns raised by these reports.

The Colorado Education Association drew on the expertise and knowledge in their membership at a special delegate assembly, the first held in 13 years, to review the 162 recommendations of the association. They have formulated an extensive report and plan for educational excellence in Colorado schools, and I think their special perspective and understanding adds a great deal to Colorado's efforts.

The Colorado State Advisory Council for Vocational Education recently released a paper titled "A Nation At Risk—The Forgotten Majority," calling attention to the needs of youth who choose not to pursue a 4-year college degree. The Colorado State Board for Community Colleges and Occupational Education has also analyzed some of the problems in vocational education and made initial recommendations for addressing these concerns. This area of education should be of special interest. In Colorado, 63 percent of the jobs expected to open from 1983-88 will require vocational education.

Finally, I am establishing the Sixth Congressional Districts Educational Advisory Committee to review the various reports and recommendations on educational excellence, with special emphasis on determining the proper role of the Federal Government. I think the committee can play a key part in focusing the debate and recommending strategies for implementing the reforms deemed necessary.

Colorado is already addressing the challenge presented to America with the publication of the National Commission on Excellence in Education's Report, "A Nation at Risk," and I am very pleased with these efforts. The education community in Colorado has responded swiftly to a difficult challenge, made significant progress toward education, and set a standard for others to follow.

While Colorado is doing its part, other States should be encouraged to follow this example. Just like a report card, and A in 25 States and an F in 25 others make a mediocre average the Nation cannot afford. Each State must take steps to see that education in America is at the top of the world class. Again, I am glad Congress passed this resolution and sent this signal to the States. Colorado is proof of what can be accomplished by such initiatives.

If anyone would like additional information on any of the studies or recommendations from Colorado, please contact my office. We would be happy to provide you with additional information.●

U.S. INTELLIGENCE IN LEBANON AND CONGRESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY

HON. GERALD B. H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, soon after the October 23 terrorist attack on our marines in Lebanon, several Members of the Congress were quick to point out that our intelligence failed to assess the threat to our troops from a possible terrorist attack. I believe, it is worth noting that these individuals are the very same people who have systematically voted to weaken our intelligence capability over the past decade.

If certain institutions or individuals are to blame for a failure by our intelligence system to provide information which may have safeguarded our marines they are the Congress and the Carter-Mondale administration which attempted to strip our intelligence organization of their strength. The Long Commission reaffirms this assessment. The report noted that data, best provided by carefully trained intelligence agents, could have enabled the American commander to better prepare his forces to blunt the effectiveness of a suicidal terrorist attack. It goes on to state that we lacked effective human intelligence support due to a U.S. policy decision to reduce human intelligence support worldwide. These words by Bobby Inman, the former Deputy Director of Central Intelligence best describe the failure of this policy, "America has not yet recovered from all the buffeting of the last 10 years. We are still suffering from the scars."

The congressional approach to the U.S. Intelligence Service during the 1970's emphasized suspicion and mistrust and still undermines our Nation's ability to confront the serious challenges of espionage and terrorism in the 1980's.

During the Carter-Mondale administration the number of skilled covert agents was cut to less than 300. The President has already increased this number to over 1,000. President Reagan's efforts to rebuild our intelligence system has started to reverse the damage of the previous decade. But it takes time and resources to train a skilled intelligence professional. Congress must begin to adequately address this challenge. Under the leadership of President Reagan and Central Intelligence Director Casey the U.S. intelligence apparatus has once again become a reliable and productive instrument of national policy.

Director Casey has been instrumental in the efforts to improve U.S. intelligence capabilities for technical and clandestine collection, cogent analysis, coordinated counterintelligence and covert action. His work has contributed to the essential elements of a dynamic and effective intelligence system. After a decade of overzealous and damaging criticism by Congress we have begun to revitalize our intelligence capability.

Recognizing the dangers of the coming decades, Congress should act now to further strengthen this all important community. America's intelligence activities are essential to the conduct of our foreign policy. They protect the freedom of all our citizens.

Our intelligence professionals dedicate and sacrifice their lives to the survival of our Nation and they deserve the appreciation and support of all Americans, including Members of the U.S. Congress.●

FELICIA LAMPORT'S POLITICAL POETRY

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, a week ago I inserted into the RECORD an example of the delightful political poetry of Felicia Lamport. I neglected to mention in that insertion that Ms. Lamport's topical poems are printed biweekly in the Boston Globe on Sunday and I am sure others will find them, as I do, a very enjoyable way to follow current affairs.●

HOUSE RESOLUTION 375

HON. TOM HARKIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, the rule is a straightforward open rule and should receive the support of every Member of the House.

The bill is important consumer legislation to preserve long standing regulatory policy which was overturned by new regulations at the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

The bill protects the consumer, especially the elderly consumer by helping to keep rates down.

The bill also does provide relief for utilities which are having serious financial difficulties. However, it does not just hand them money regardless of their need.

The bill requires that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission look at providing for CWIP on a case-by-case basis when there is real financial need and when the utility's construction plans are the least cost way to meet customer energy needs.

Historically—ever since the last century, an electric utility has received payment for the cost of building a new powerplant after the plant is completed and providing power. To have the customer pay some of the costs in advance means higher rates. It also means shifting the burden from the utility to the consumer if a powerplant is never completed. And, we have had a number of very expensive plant cancellations in the last couple of years.

Mr. Speaker, the American people do not want to be charged CWIP unless it is necessary. According to a poll conducted for the Department of Energy, including CWIP costs in customers bills was supported by only 27 percent of the people. It was opposed by 63 percent of the people.

This bill has over 100 cosponsors in the House.

It is supported by the American Association of Retired Persons, Consumer Federation of America, National Association of State Utility Consumer Advocates, United Auto Workers, United Steelworkers of America, National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, Citizen-Labor Energy Coalition, American Public Power Association, Consumers Union, Environmental Action, Friends of the Earth, National Farmers Union, the United Methodist Church, Board of Church and Society, and many other groups.

Mr. Speaker, the rule should be passed.●

MORTGAGE REVENUE BOND PROGRAM

HON. THOMAS N. KINDNESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, the mortgage revenue bond program is one of those rare Federal programs which, with only a minimal loss to the Federal Treasury and a minimum of Federal intervention, does a considerable amount of good by allowing States and localities to respond to their local housing needs. The authorization for this vital program expired in December 1983.

A bill to reauthorize the program has already been introduced in this body, but was incorporated in the complex and controversial Tax Reform Act of 1983. Today, I introduced a simple bill to extend the mortgage revenue bond program through 1988. I hope that those Members who support the use of mortgage revenue bonds, but who have difficulty supporting the Tax Reform Act in its present form, will take this opportunity to actively work for passage of the program's extension for 5 years.

Government allocation of credit and Government borrowing to finance the Federal deficit has caused homebuilding to be disadvantaged. It is appropriate to give at least a small position of favor to one of this Nation's most basic needs—decent and affordable housing. Developing opportunities for home purchase mortgages ought to have a reasonable priority.●

RECOGNITION FOR CAPT. LEE BACA, LOS ANGELES COUNTY SHERIFF'S DEPARTMENT

HON. ESTEBAN EDWARD TORRES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the work of Capt. Lee Baca of the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department. Lee began his service with the sheriff's department in 1965. He has been promoted from deputy through the ranks to his current position as captain of the Norwalk Sheriff's Station. The Norwalk Sheriff's Station is located in my district.

Lee started his 18 years of service with the sheriff's department as a deputy at the Wayside Honor Ranch, maximum security unit. He also served as a member of the patrol division of the East Los Angeles Station. In 1968 Lee was promoted to the administrative division of the department. He served as a recruitment officer and a staff drill instructor. In June 1969 Lee moved to the Temple City Station with the rank of sergeant and later that year to the community relations bureau in charge of the sheriff's public education program.

Lee was promoted to the rank of lieutenant in 1971. In April 1972 he was the department group study exchange representative, in London, England. Lee served as the special liasion to the city of London Police, Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, Greater London City Council, Sheriff of London, Brixton Prison, Pentonville Prison, and the Hendon Police College.

After returning from London in June 1972 Lee assumed his role as the watch commander at the East Los Angeles Station. From June 1972 until October 1978 Lee served as the lieutenant of the Altadena Station, Carson Station, and the Lennox Station. In October 1978 Lee worked in the employee relations bureau. He was the department advocate to the civil service commission, commander of the civil service unit, legal unit and manuals, and orders unit. Lee also provided advice to the executive and unit commanders regarding disciplinary charges, suspensions, staff reductions, and transfers of sworn and civilian personnel.

From July 1981 to October 1981 Lee was transferred to the headquarters unit where he headed the court security unit, special process unit, budget unit, and the clerical unit. Lee was also the liasion to the Los Angeles County Grand Jury, department of superior courts and the economy and efficiency commission. In October 1981 Lee was promoted to the rank of captain. He has since served as the captain of the Norwalk Sheriff's Station. He oversees the patrol, detective, community relations, tactical planning, clerical staff, and reserve personnel operations.

Lee holds an associate of arts from East Los Angeles College; a bachelor of science from the California State University, Los Angeles; a master of public administration from the University of Southern California; and is currently working on his doctorate of public administration at the University of Southern California. In 1972 he received a community college credential from the California State Department of Education.

Lee is also a member of the Phi Kappa Phi Honor Society, the California Teachers' Association, the California Association of Administration of Justice Educators, the Professional Peace Officers' Association and the Mexican-American Police Command Officers' Association of California and Arizona.

Mr. Speaker, Lee's record show a commitment to serving his neighbor and community. I ask my colleagues to join me in thanking Lee for this commitment and wish him well in the year to come.●

NATIONAL RECREATIONAL SPORTS WEEK

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution calling upon the President to proclaim the week of April 15 through 21, 1984, as "National Recreational Sports Week."

Recreational sports programs benefit participants in many ways: physically, socially, and emotionally. Plus, they bring fun and enjoyment to all who take part.

The concept of a "National Recreational Sports Week" was developed by the National Intramural-Recreational Sports Association (NIRSA). This nonprofit organization was founded in 1950. Members of NIRSA are professionals in the field of recreational sports, and are working to meet the needs of communities for adequate recreational opportunities.

I commend the National Intramural-Recreational Sports Association on its work in this area. The passage of this resolution will help to increase the public's awareness of the benefits of recreational sports.

I hope my colleagues will join in supporting this measure.●

H.R. 3913

HON. PAT WILLIAMS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, today Mr. STENY HOYER and I are introducing a bill to prevent the Employment and Training Administration of the U.S. Department of Labor (DOL-ETA) from implementing reductions in force assumed in the President's fiscal year 1985 budget request at the same time that they implement those approved in the fiscal year 1984 Labor-HHS-Education appropriations bill (Public Law 98-139, H.R. 3913).

The purpose of our bill is to limit the administration to only those reductions approved by the Congress and signed into law by the President. The cuts currently being implemented by the Department of Labor that are beyond what has been approved by law will probably result in the closing down of a number of the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training (BAT) offices, as well as eliminating the few Indian staff who remain in the division which implements the Native American programs. By limiting reductions in force to current law, the Congress will be able to review the impact of these reductions before making decisions on the fiscal year 1985 budget.

Both the House and Senate Committee reports (H. Rpt. 98-357; S. Rpt. 98-247) accompanying H.R. 3913 were identical in limiting reductions in force from 2,308 positions funded in fiscal year 1983 to 2,009 in fiscal year 1984, or a decrease of 299 positions. Our bill will limit the DOL-ETA to the 2,009 level approved by the Congress and the President.

At the beginning of fiscal year 1984, DOL-ETA had 2,236 positions, and they are currently implementing reductions in force to reach 1,829 positions by May 25, 1984. This is clearly contrary to letter and intent of the law.

It is interesting to note that former Assistant Secretary of Labor, Albert Angrisani, in testifying on the fiscal year 1984 Labor-HHS-Education bill, stated in response to a question by Chairman NATCHER on fiscal year 1984 staff levels:

> Mr. Chairman, we undertook over the last year and a half a thorough management study of our agency. What I basically asked my staff to do was to go back and look at all of our functions, I said, if this is what the Employment and Training Administration is going to look like for the next ten years functionally, tell me how much staff we need to do the job. The number we came up with is 2,000 individuals and our previous levels were 2,300, roughly, which is why we believed that we could take the reduction.
> We are not doing it because we want to reduce staff per se, but it is just that I believe we can do the job with this number of people.

Thus, even the Assistant Secretary Angrisani projected a staff level of 2,000 people for the next 10 years.●

MORTGAGE REVENUE BONDS DESERVE IMMEDIATE ACTION

HON. DON BONKER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, as we begin this 2d session of the 98th Congress, among our top priorities must be one major piece of unfinished business left over from the first session.

Unless Congress takes immediate action, our failure to reauthorize the mortgage revenue bond program (MRB) could deny thousands of young families and first-time home buyers the opportunity to own a home. And without MRB's, our Nation's vital homebuilding, real estate, and forest products industries will be without perhaps their most effective tool as they struggle to free themselves from the worst industry-wide depressions in decades.

Support for mortgage revenue bonds is not at issue. By last November, 329 House Members—three-quarters of this body—had cosponsored legislation to repeal the December 31, 1983, sunset date for the MRB program. The Omnibus Tax Reform Act of 1983, H.R. 4170, included a provision to extend mortgage bond authority for 5 years. Unfortunately, the MRB program became the innocent victim of a dispute over unrelated provisions of the bill, and H.R. 4170 was never considered by the House. The effectiveness of the MRB program is indisputable. Interest rates on mortgages financed by tax-exempt bonds are typically 2 to 3 percent below conventionally financed mortgages, although the spread can be even greater during times of particularly high interest rates. The tax free status of a bondholder's dividend income enables State and local governments to offer yields below those available on taxable bonds. These savings are passed directly on to eligible home buyers in the form of lower mortgage interest rates.

Nationwide, the approximately $11 billion in bonds issued last year by State and local governments provided financing for 220,000 housing units. Roughly 90,000 of these were new units. This new construction created 100,000 jobs, provided $1.7 billion in payroll, and generated $800 million in Federal, State, and local taxes.

Historically, mortgage revenue bonds have provided financing to first-time home buyers and low- or middle-income buyers who simply could not afford a home otherwise. The median income of State mortgage bond beneficiaries was $18,467 in 1981 and $23,511 in 1982. By contrast, the median income of home buyers served by conventional loans was $39,196. Quite simply, if not for mortgage revenue bonds, tens of thousands of young families and moderate-income individuals would have little hope of affording their dream—a house of their own.

The need for mortgage assistance will be greater than ever for the rest of this decade, as the baby boom generation matures and struggles to purchase homes in a tightening economy. In 1981, I warned that the demographic fallout from the post-war baby boom and the national trend toward smaller households would collide with a lack of available housing and affordable mortgage financing.

[From Housing, High Interest Rates, and the Northwest Economy, Representative Bonker, Aug. 24, 1981]

We have no coherent program to help the housing industry. In fact, the policy of high interest rates is destroying the housing market.

This comes at a time when demand for housing continues to soar. More than 16 million new households will be formed during the 10 year period ending in 1989—an increase of 25 percent. More than 41 million people will turn 30 in the 80's, creating an unprecedented increase in the number of first-time buyers entering the housing market.

Yet the supply of housing is plummeting. Housing production tumbled from an annual rate of 2.1 million units in November of 1978 to 906,000 units in May of 1980, a 57 percent decline. Housing production is expected to increase slightly to 1.2 million units this year, but it is still far below demand.

These demographic, social, and financial realities are every bit as pressing today, and underscore the need for a proven, successful program like mortgage revenue bonds.

Critics have argued that the Federal Treasury cannot afford to underwrite a housing program like MRB's, particularly in the face of the enormous Federal deficits under the Reagan administration. To the contrary, MRB's are a proven moneymaker for the Treasury. Even on a strict, ledger sheet analysis, our Nation cannot afford to let this program die.

Opponents cite an annual revenue loss to the Federal Government of $20 million for every billion of MRB's issued. But this estimate is suspect. The true direct revenue loss may be as little as one-third of that figure, because many investors would seek out some other form of tax-exempt security even if the MRB program was abolished. More importantly, each $1 billion in mortgage bonds provides financing for 21,000 new and existing homes, generates 7,500 jobs and $140 million in wages, and results in $62 million in Federal, State, and local taxes.

Reauthorization of the mortgage revenue bond program is especially critical in my own State of Washington, due to our traditional dependence upon the nationwide construction and wood products industries. In addition, Washington State was one of the last States to authorize the issuance of MRB's. As a result, our first issue of approximately $193 million occurred just before the December 31 cutoff. While it will take some time to assess the full impact of the program, the initial figures are very promising. In just the 2-week period from January 4 to 17 of this year, the State MRB program accounted for $59,400,000 in loans for existing homes, providing financing for 1,127 first-time homebuyers.

Based on the experience of other States with the MRB program, this initial issue of $193 million of tax-exempt bonds will enable over 4,000 families and individuals to buy a home, create close to 1,500 jobs, generate $27 million in wages, and provide nearly $12 million in badly needed State, local, and Federal tax revenues.

Now that Washington State has developed this powerful tool for mortgage financing and economic growth, Congress must not allow it to be taken away.●

VIRGIL BOUCK: A MAN WHO HAS SERVED AGRICULTURE WELL

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, it is not often that we as elected officials are able to say that we have encountered individuals who have always demonstrated a willingness to do all that they can to help people, but today I am privileged to tell you and our colleagues about such a man.

Tomorrow, February 3, Virgil Bouck, a man who has served as the head of the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service's office in Tuscola County, Mich., one of the counties which is in my Eighth Congressional District, will be honored as he retires from the agency. Virgil will certainly be missed by the farmers of Tuscola County who have come to know him as one individual who is interested in helping them improve the quality of their farming operations.

He has been in Tuscola County for the past 10 years, after having served in Midland County for 12½ years before that. He has seen some tough times at ASCS as he has tried to help farmers deal with both farm price support programs, and worked to provide information that is necessary to the other agencies of USDA when a farmer is forced to apply for disaster assistance.

I have worked closely with Virgil in my years in Congress. He has always provided me with quality information when I needed to know the problems that some of the farmers in my congressional district have faced. In particular, Virgil very skillfully led the development and implementation of a most impressive project to control the nonpoint source pollution that results from the runoff from farmlands. This project was first approved several years ago by ASCS, and was supported by the Environmental Protection Agency. It has been heralded as a model for the rest of the Nation, and the most successful of the four demonstration projects that were operated around the country.

Virgil has always had a high respect for conserving our agricultural soil and water resources in order to insure a continuing adequate supply of food and fiber while enhancing the environment. He has taken his work seriously, and that is why it has been so successful.

Virgil will certainly be consulted in the years to come when those complicated problems arise that beg to be reviewed by skillful and knowledgeable people. His retirement simply means that he is changing his phone number and work hours, not that he has completed his contribution to Michigan and to agriculture.

I will certainly call on Virgil in the days to come. After all, excellence is too important a quality to ignore.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and all of our colleagues to wish Virgil Bouck well with his new endeavors.●

INTERNATIONAL GAMES FOR THE DISABLED

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, the eyes of the world will fall on Sarajevo and Los Angeles this year as the hosts, respectively, for the winter and summer Olympic games.

As the best athletes in the world will be on display, this is only natural. But another international athletic competition also is scheduled for 1984. Like the Olympics, these games will bring together some of the finest athletes in the world for 2 weeks. Like the Olympics, these games will allow the world to put aside petty nationalism and to come together as one in the spirit of healthy competition.

Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the 1984 International Games for the Disabled, to be held June 16-30 in Nassau County, Long Island. These games will bring together 1,500 people who just happen to be blind, or people with cerebral palsy, or other handicapped athletes from more than 40 nations. Competition will be held in more than 20 sports at a number of sites on Long Island.

Nassau County was chosen for this distinction by the International Olympic Committee. The games are a world-class endeavor, and thousands of hours of preparations have been and will be spent to bring off the games in a manner which shows Nassau County, the State of New York, and our entire Nation in the best possible light.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation to reimburse Nassau County for some of the substantial costs it will incur to stage the games. In addition to the man-hours to be provided by more than 500 Nassau County police officers in gamesite and dormitory security, significant costs also will result from public-safety functions and escorts for touring athletes.

The International Games for the Disabled promote our best national instincts and recognize our national commitment to the handicapped. I urge the support of my colleagues for the Nassau County games in this year of the international athlete.●

LAND OF OPPORTUNITY

HON. BEN ERDREICH

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, for the last 2 years, the Vestavia Hills Chamber of Commerce has presented the "Land of Opportunity" to first-generation immigrants with citizenship intentions who are working and domonstrating by example that the United States is still the "Land of Opportunity." Last year I was privileged to have been given the honor of presenting the award to six nominees. They included Tuan A. Le from Vietnam, who arrived in the United States in 1975, acquired a B.S. degree in mathematics, a B.S. degree in English, is working on an M.S. degree in mathematics and electrical engineering, and is employed at Rust International Corp. in Birmingham; Frank Petho, who came from Domborar, Hungary in 1953, graduated from Rutgers University, and is presently a project engineer for Turner Construction Co. in Birmingham; Dana Darlene Idol, who came from Panama to this country in 1958 and is currently credit manager for the Yielding Stores in Birmingham; Prem Tagra from India, who is an engineer with the Rust International Corp.; Galal Abdulla, an Egyptian native who operates a riding school at Oak Mountain State Park; and Tien Le, who came from Vietnam, graduated from Homewood High School at the age of 16 and received a 4-year premedical school scholarship to Birmingham-Southern College.

I was proud to present the "Land of Opportunity Award" to these six individuals who are living proof that America continues to be a land of opportunity and a beacon of democracy around the world.

I would like to commend those responsible for initiating the presentation of these awards, particularly Mr. Herc Levine, committee chairman of the Land of Opportunity Awards, who was instrumental in turning his lifelong dream of recognizing those who came here seeking freedom to live and work and worship as they wish.

The Vestavia Hills Chamber of Commerce is due to be commended for establishing this recognition to exemplify that our democracy remains the land of opportunity, a vibrant and growing nation whose values of personal liberty, hard work, religious freedom, the importance of family and neighborhoods, contribute to make this Nation the land of opportunity for all our citizens.●

CENTRALIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague from Utah (Mr. HANSEN) and I have introduced H.R. 3950, to give Congress a more effective role in reorganizations of the Defense Department. The comparative voting records of the gentleman from Utah and myself would indicate that we disagree on basic policy much more often than we agree. Nevertheless, we have worked shoulder to shoulder for more than 2 years to oppose an endless series of consolidations of power in our defense establishment, including some which would have created workload windfalls in our districts.

For the last 20 years, through six administrations, the senior permanent bureaucracy in the Pentagon has been accrediting functions from the military services to its own nonaccountable defense agencies. The power to achieve these consolidations comes from language put into the United States Code (10 U.S.C. 125) in 1949 for the purpose of promoting joint functions among the services, long before the autonomous defense agencies even existed. Initially, the creation of some central offices, such as the Defense Mapping Agency, made sense. More recently, however, many of the consolidations have impaired the ability of the services to perform their military mission; and the theoretical efficiencies claimed by their promoters have usually not been realized in practice. Policy direction from the relatively transient appointed officials in the Defense Department, as well as congressional scrutiny, have regularly been evaded.

It is the view of Navy Secretary John Lehman that:

Without question, this building (the Pentagon) could be run at 20 percent savings if we could get rid of the 6,000 bureaucrats in OSD (Office of Secretary of Defense) who are accountable, essentially, to nobody. They masquerade as agents to pull power to the Secretary of Defense, but it's exactly the opposite. They take power away from the Secretary and appointed officials.

Over the past 3 years, I have worked on three specific consolidations. The first was the proposal to transfer the management—that is the purchasing, warehousing, and distribution—of all nonreparable hardware supply items from the services to the Defense Logistics Agency, in spite of the fact that almost all of those parts still in the control of the services are service-specific, weapon-system-critical parts for tanks, aircraft, and ships. The second was the proposal to take the repair and maintenance of military aircraft away from the services and turn them over to a central manager despite the fact that such a manager would bear no responsibility for missions for which those aircraft would be tasked. The third was the national consolidation of operational control of every military base by a civilian agency, in spite of the fact that the major local experiment of consolidated base operations in San Antonio has been an unmitigated disaster from every perspective. At best, we have only been able to hold off these moves temporarily.

While I have not been directly involved with it, another consolidation would create a civilian Defense Health Agency to take over the medical functions from the military services. In addition, a new initiative is in the works to have the Defense Logistics Agency do the acquisition of all automated data processing equipment for the services. We expect to see even more centralization proposals surface in the future.

Rather than continuing to fight each consolidation piecemeal, we have determined that the best policy approach is to amend the statutory language which grants such broad power to the bureaucracy. Our bill would require that major consolidations of functions from the services to the defense agencies—that is, those involving more than 200 persons or $10 million per year—would have to be authorized by Congress before they could be implemented. We believe this would insure that military readiness is not diminished by empire builders and that projected savings are actual.●

H.R. 555—CWIP BILL

HON. DICK CHENEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1984

● Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Speaker, my name is listed as a cosponsor of H.R. 555, the construction-work-in-progress legislation reported out by the Energy and Commerce Committee.

I want the record to show that in fact I did not wish to cosponsor this bill, and that my name was added by mistake to the cosponsor list. I would have sought unanimous consent to withdraw my name from the bill, except that I did not discover the error until after the bill had already been reported by the committee. At that point, House rules precluded me from having my name removed from the cosponsor list.●

SENATE—Friday, February 3, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday, January 30, 1984)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Father in Heaven, as the Senate moves more deeply into its legislative session and recess is imminent, we pray for our families. Pressure, tension, urgency build, and it is easy to justify neglecting spouse and children. Help us to realize that there is no adequate substitute for a husband and wife—no adequate substitute for a father and mother. Give us the grace to put priority where it belongs, knowing that no matter how one may succeed in life, one is a failure if he defaults as spouse and parent and allows the family to disintegrate. Help us, Lord, to take seriously our God-given responsibility to our families. Bless them, strengthen them, deepen and mature family love. In Jesus' name. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting majority leader is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Chair.

THANKS TO THE CHAPLAIN

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I thank the Chaplain for that guidance. I hope that on one of these late evenings, when the tension rises and we are inclined to say it is easier to stay through the night and!solve the problem than it is to go home and have a clear head the next morning and, meanwhile, spend time with our families and be refreshed, someone will remind me of that prayer and I shall read it to the Senate, just to make sure they all hear it.

CECIL BARNES

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am sad to rise today to inform the Senate of the passing of a great Alaskan, Cecil Barnes, who some of you came to know during consideration of the legislation which became the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act of 1971.

Cecil was one of the founders of the Alaska Federation of Natives which played a pivotal role in passage of the Claims Act. He made many trips to Washington during the period leading up to passage of the act.

The existence of the Chugach Region, one of the 12 regional corporations, was in large part, a result of Cecil's untiring efforts. He was also instrumental in establishing Eyak Village Corp., Eyak being the old native town in Cordova where he was born.

In 1971, Cecil became the head of Chugach Native Corp., the corporation overlying the region provided for under the Claims Act. He held that position until 1977, when he left to become a commercial fisherman.

Even after he left the corporate world, Cecil remained active in native affairs, always serving as an inspiration to succeeding native leaders in his region and in the State. His wise council will be missed.

A citation honoring Cecil Barnes was read and passed in the Alaska State Legislature this week. It outlines very well Cecil's contribution to Alaska and the respect all Alaskans had for Cecil. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the citation be printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the citation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CECIL BARNES

The Legislature notes with sadness the passing of Cecil Barnes of Anchorage.

Cecil Barnes was born in Cordova in 1930, and dedicated much of his life to the self-determination and economic development of the Eyak community of the Prince William Sound area, as well as of all Alaskan Natives.

He was the founder of the Eyak Corporation and inspired self-awareness among the Native Alaskans of Cordova and vicinity. At a time when few believed that the Alaskan Native claims movement could succeed either in the courts or in Congress, Cecil Barnes was one of the original pioneers who gave the movement energetic support.

After the passage of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, the shareholders of Chugach Native, Inc., recognizing Cecil Barnes' original leadership and intimate knowledge of the lands and resources of Prince William Sound and the Kenai Peninsula, elected Cecil Barnes as that Native regional corporation's first president.

As its leader Cecil Barnes set a sound foundation for Chugach Natives, Inc. While attentive to the business aspects of the corporation, he retained a keen interest in the quality of life, culture, and well-being of individual shareholders and their families.

For Cecil, a combat Marine veteran from the Korean conflict who received four battle decorations, the Marine motto, "semper fidelis", personified his belief in home and country. Cecil Barnes remained always faithful to his principles.

We extend our deepest sympathy to his wife Anna and to his daughters Nancy Barnes, Carol Barnes, Roxanne Chee and Brenda Curry.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, today, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there are three special orders, in favor of Senator MURKOWSKI, Senator BENTSEN, and Senator BUMPERS. Following that, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

Following routine morning business, the Senate may consider any or all of the following items during the course of the day: S. 215, the bail reform bill; S. 948, the forfeiture bill; and S. 1787, the drug czar bill. The majority leader has announced that rollcall votes are expected today. A long session, however, is not expected. Senators should be on notice that there will be votes today. I think we shall be able to confirm that in a very short order, the time at which they will commence. It is our estimate that they will commence sometime around 11:30 a.m.

We are attempting at this time to confer with my good friend, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the distinguished President pro tempore, to determine the order in which he wishes these bills to be considered. That announcement will be made at the close of morning business today. In order that that may be done, I reserve the remainder of leadership time on this side.

(Mr. D'AMATO assumed the Chair.)

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in response to the suggestion by the able acting majority leader, I believe it is understood that we are going to bail reform as the first bill this morning. That should not take more than probably a few minutes.

Next, we go to the bill on forfeiture and then to the drug czar bill. We hope to finish by 1 or 2 p.m.

Mr STEVENS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished President pro tempore. That is the order in which we hoped they would be taken up. But, of course, under the order, it is his prerogative. We are pleased to have that schedule. It will be noted and the membership will be informed of the schedule.

It is my understanding that a vote is anticipated on the bail reform bill. As the distinguished President pro tempore has stated, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that will take a few minutes, 15 or 20, at the most. The next bill, forfeiture, is also a bill that will take a very short time. We do not anticipate amendments on either of those bills and there has been a request for a rollcall vote on each of them.

Mr. President, in order that Members may be informed of the schedule of special orders, I ask unanimous consent that the special order in favor of my colleague, Mr. MURKOWSKI, be canceled. That will mean Senator BENTSEN will be first on special orders and Senator BUMPERS second. It will also mean that the period for the transaction of routine morning business will occur 15 minutes earlier. We have had a special request for a rollcall in routine morning business, so I wanted to be sure all Members have that information.

Mr. President, I reserve what time I have left.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

ACID RAIN

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, in the Washington Post this morning there is an article under the headline, "Senators Pelt Ruckelshaus With Acid Rain."

Mr. Ruckelshaus apparently was given some rough treatment at the Environment and Public Works Committee yesterday, according to this news story. He testified in support of the administration's position on the so-called acid rain issue. I think he did an admirable job. According to the reports that I have read, he articulated the President's position on this complex matter and he set forth his program—when I say "his program," I am talking about the President's program—for accelerated research, amelioration of the effects of high acidity, and the development of new technology to burn all types of coal cleanly.

Mr. President, I was pleased with the President's statement in reference to this acid rain phenomenon. I now read from the President's address delivered before the joint session just a few days ago.

> On the question of acid rain, which concerns people in many areas of the U.S. and Canada, I am proposing a research program that doubles our current funding and we will take additional action to restore our lakes and develop new technology to reduce pollution that causes acid rain.

Mr. President, I commend President Reagan on the approach that he has taken with respect to the acid rain phenomenon and shall support the President in that approach. I do not find fault with those of an opposite viewpoint. This Senator, who represents a coal-producing State, a State which is both an industrial State and a rural State at the same time, supports the President's position in this matter and I do not propose to let anything on this subject be railroaded through the Senate without adequate debate before it is enacted.

I hope that people will recognize that the position outlined by Mr. Ruckelshaus was set out by the President in his state of the Union speech after careful deliberation. And that position is shared not only by me but also by a number of my colleagues from other States in Appalachia and in the Midwest which would be adversely affected if there were to be rash and hasty judgment with respect to the installation of equipment in power plants and so on, which in the final analysis, after having cost millions of dollars, perhaps would prove to be ineffective in dealing with this problem.

There is a problem. The President recognized that problem. I recognize the problem. But scientists disagree as to what the origins, causes, and effects of so-called acid rain may be. There is a report which has been mandated by the Congress to be submitted by an interagency task force by 1992 which will give Congress more light and perhaps less heat on the subject. I do not think we should act hastily until we know what we are doing. Scientists disagree. There have been remains or residues of so-called acid rain found in ice cores in the Himalayans and in the Arctic Circle which indicate that there was acid precipitation hundreds of years ago. So I hope that we will not rush into a judgment here which could be a very costly judgment, which could be ineffective in the long run, and in the short run would close down industries, close down coal mines, put people out of work, and raise utility bills.

I do not look at this as a partisan issue. I have a substantial bipartisan group of cosponsors, 15 in all, on my own legislation to accelerate the work of the Interagency Task Force on Acid Precipitation, and in the meantime I would support taking action to ameliorate the acidity in lakes and streams in those parts of the country that are affected. I have heard that there is a good deal of acid precipitation in California. If so, that could not be coming from West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Alabama, or Tennessee, so I think we had better make haste slowly and surely before we jump at some kind of quick fix.

I also have legislation that would promote research into the clean burning of high sulfur coal in such a way that it would not injure the environment.

But I take the floor today to defend Mr. Ruckelshaus. After all, he is taking a position which is difficult perhaps for him, but it is a position which reflects the approach chosen by the President of the United States. I hope that we would not be too hard on Mr. Ruckelshaus. I feel that he is well aware that the opinion of the scientific community is important with respect to this issue. Despite the assurances of those favoring new controls on coal use—that scientific agreement exists on this topic—it is clear that no consensus has been reached. In fact, we are just beginning to see evidence of a scientific backlash as research produces new questions that cannot be ignored concerning the complexity of this issue. And besides the scientific data which continue at an intense level, the economic and energy policy effects of controls remain formidable. My State would lose jobs under any control scenario. The only question is, How many jobs and in what part or parts of West Virginia? West Virginia already has the highest unemployment rate in the country—15 percent as of the last report. States in the Midwest and throughout Appalachia would be similary affected.

I hope the legislation I have introduced to seek new ways to burn coal as cleanly as possible will be enacted. It will add to the improvements in air quality that have occurred as a result of the implementation of the Clean Air Act. This is a forward-looking position on which I am joined by a great number of Senators on both sides of the aisle. So I think it should be clear that the position taken by the President and Mr. Ruckelshaus is supported by a bipartisan group of Senators. We have not been too vocal. Perhaps we have been a little too silent, but I suggest that that silence should not be misleading. The position taken by the President and Mr. Ruckelshaus is the position that I have advocated, and Senators should be fully aware of the importance of the outcome of this issue to the future of West Virginia and to the future of the industrial heartland of America.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used his time in the special order.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair. If I had had any time remaining, I was going to yield it to the distinguished Senator from Texas, who is here ready to proceed with his special order.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BENTSEN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. BENTSEN. Thank you Mr. President. I particularly want to thank the distinguished Senator, the minority leader, from West Virginia for his very lucid and comprehensive remarks. I should like to address my comments this morning to problems that we are facing in Lebanon.

BEIRUT

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, the presence of American marines in Beirut is forcing confrontation between Congress and the President.

I sincerely hope it is not too late to prevent that from happening. We can all agree that the Middle East is truly important to our national interests. Diplomacy in the area is notoriously difficult; passions run high and war is an ever-present danger.

If we want to avoid a test of wills and partisan bickering over our role in the region, both Congress and the administration must retain some flexibility in their positions. We must look beyond politics and search for solutions that make sense for America.

That process is not facilitated when the President says he will "not pay any attention" to a congressional resolution pressing for a prompt and orderly withdrawal from Beirut. It does not help the process when the White House accuses Democrats of playing politics on Lebanon or suggests we are aiding and abetting those opposed to peace in the Middle East.

As a Democrat who has supported this administration in some controversial aspects of its foreign policy and has tried to keep partisan politics separate from national security, I would like to suggest that the rhetoric being used by the White House undermines the whole basis for bipartisanship.

Bipartisanship does not mean that everyone must line up behind our President, regardless of the wisdom of the policies he is pursuing. I am one who votes with the President when I think he is right and against him when I think he is wrong. In this instance, I believe the President is wrong—dangerously wrong.

True bipartisanship must be a product of prior consultation and consensus building. We did not see that kind of prior planning and consultation on sending U.S. forces into Lebanon. Democrats were not consulted; there was no pretense of bipartisanship. The decision was the President's alone and was even opposed by many of his military advisers.

The marines should never have been sent to Lebanon in the first place, and they should not be there today. The longer they stay the more difficult it becomes to extricate them. But now that the ox is in the ditch, it is suggested, in the name of bipartisanship, that we should all share responsibility—or at least remain silent and pretend that nothing is wrong.

Mr. President, I do not think there is much of a market for that kind of bipartisanship. I believe President Reagan is making a very serious mistake by doggedly insisting on the continued presence of American marines in Lebanon, and suggesting that those who oppose this unexplained folly are somehow opponents of peace.

There is abundant evidence to suggest that Beirut is a foolhardy place to station 1,600 U.S. marines. We have taken the low ground while our antagonists occupy the high ground. It is impossible to identify either the enemy or the purpose of our presence in Lebanon. Most of the factions in Lebanon see our marines not as a peacekeeping force, but as a force that has chosen sides and is working to impose that choice. It really makes no sense to suggest that we are some sort of benign, neutral presence in the killing ground that is Lebanon.

We have injected ourselves into a quarrel that is not ours; a quarrel that has existed for centuries and will continue whether American marines stay at the airport for another week, or 6 months, or 6 years. We have put our troops—and our prestige—on the line in a part of the world where the Soviets have all the comparative advantages, where their supply lines are overland and only a few hundred miles long while ours extend 7,000 miles over the ocean.

If there must be a confrontation, if there must be a test of wills with our adversaries, let us choose someplace where we have the comparative advantage. Where we occupy the high ground; where we have the short supply lines; and, above all, where our objectives are clear and compelling.

Our marines have been in Beirut since September 1982. During the past 16 months, 259 of them have been killed and 126 have been wounded. That tragic loss of life is compounded by the fact that the American people have yet to hear a convincing explanation of why it is necessary or desirable to offer 1,600 marines as hostages to the random violence and terror endemic to Lebanon.

I have expressed deep misgivings about sending the marines to Lebanon since the day that decision was announced. I stated from the outset that the War Powers Act should apply. I voted against the 18-month extension.

I would prefer at this stage not to have Congress demand a date certain for the withdrawal of the marines; I would like to avoid that kind of confrontation with the White House and handicap for our negotiators. I would, however, ask the President to use his talents to explain precisely what purpose is being served by the Marine presence in Lebanon. The American people are well aware that more than 250 marines have died in Beirut. Now they are asking why that sacrifice is necessary.

The President has been unable to provide a convincing explanation, so I think he should move quickly to have our troops replaced by an international peacekeeping force less attractive to terrorists, radicals, and the armed factions so prevalent in Lebanon.

Our allies in the multinational force appear to be having second thoughts about the future of their commitment in Lebanon. The French have redeployed some of their troops, and the Italians have reduced the size of the contingent while stating their disagreement with our purpose and role in Beirut. The British seem less than enthusiastic about their minimal presence. It is only the President who has become completely enthralled by his own rhetoric and wedded to the notion that we must hold on until the dubious dawn of peace in Lebanon.

Mr. President, our marines have been given an impossible task. They have been asked to be peacekeepers in a land that knows no peace. The complex chemistry of hatred in Lebanon involves more than Christians, Moslems, refugees, Israelis, and Syrians. It creates an environment in which it is impossible to identify the enemy or tell friend from foe.

There are Shia Moslems and Suni Moslems. Some of the Shia's belong to the Amal; some are loyal to Nebih Birri; some have taken up arms against the Israeli presence in the south; others—the truly radical—belong to the Hizballah, look to Iran for political inspiration, and commit hari-kari attacks with truckloads of explosives. There are Nasserite Sunis, Baathist Sunnis, Sunnis loyal to Rashid Karami.

There is the Progressive Socialist Party and the renowned Druze militia led by Walid Jumblatt. The Druze are often described as being under the influence of Syria despite the fact that the Syrians murdered Jumblatt's father. There are Armenians and Greek Orthodox of various political outlooks.

There are the Maronite Christians, with their Phalange, who have been fighting Moslems for generations and profess loyalty to the Gemayel family; there are other Maronites led by the Franjiyah family. There are the Free Lebanon Forces, a Christian militia supported by the Israelis.

There have been PLO forces loyal to Yassir Arafat, and PLO forces opposed to Arafat who fought their own brand of civil war in the streets of Tripoli until the Arafat forces were finally evacuated on Greek ships. There are anti-Syrian Moslem fundamentalist militiamen and there are pro-Syrian Alawite militia forces.

Mr. President, there are more than 50,000 Syrian troops in Lebanon. There are 12,000 Israeli troops in the south. There are perhaps 25,000 soldiers in the Lebanese Army whose future effectiveness depends to a large degree on the loyalty of Shia recruits.

These factions, armies, and militias—and others too numerous to mention—are all armed to the teeth. They have no compunctions about taking pot shots at one another, nor do they shy away from turning their guns or their terror on the Marine contingent when the mood strikes them or when it is determined that U.S. casualties serve their interests.

Mr. President, an orderly withdrawal from Beirut would not imply that we are backing down, losing face, or knuckling under to terrorism. We did not send the marines to Lebanon to fight Syrians or Shias or pro-Iranian fanatics. We sent them to keep the peace. But it defies all logic to suggest that 1,600 marines at the Beirut airport can bring peace to the kaleidoscope of violence and distrust that is Lebanon.

For the President to remain adamant and for his spokesman to insist that he "wants to stay in Lebanon until there is stability and until there is a plan for the withdrawal of foreign forces" places a heavy strain on the notion of bipartisanship in foreign policy.

Perhaps we could make more sense of the American presence in Beirut if we lay aside the pretense of "peacekeeping" and openly acknowledge that our marines are there as a symbol of support for President Amin Gemayel and as a tacit warning that we will not permit Syria to overrun all of Lebanon.

Those are both serious foreign policy objectives. However, it is not clear to me that the Marine presence is an indispensable aspect of a strategy designed to achieve them.

The prospects for President Gemayel's expanding his authority and area of control are problematic at best. Recent hints that we might assist him in this effort by redeploying the marines were not enthusiastically received. That does not mean, however, that we and our allies in the MNF have abandoned support for the Gemayel government. That support will continue regardless of whether we have 1,600 marines stationed at the airport.

We can—and we will—continue to provide President Gemayel with important diplomatic support. We can—and we will—continue to provide military and economic assistance to Lebanon. We can—and we should—continue to keep elements of the 6th Fleet, including aircraft carriers and the New Jersey, off the coast of Lebanon as evidence of our determination not to see that country gobbled up by Syria or subverted by the Soviets.

My point, Mr. President, is that we can demonstrate our resolve to Syria and our support to President Gemayel without exposing 1,600 American marines to constant danger. To the extent that there is a legitimate peacekeeping function to be performed in the Beirut area, it can be performed by volunteers from other nations who are not perceived as being committed to one side or the other in the Lebanese tug of war.

The conventional wisdom is that President Reagan will soon find an honorable way to extract the marines from Beirut. In this instance, I hope the conventional wisdom is correct, because a withdrawal of the marines would not harm our national interests in the Middle East. It would, however, remove a contentious, emotional issue that divides America without paying any national security dividends. I, for one, do not believe it would be an indication of weakness to have the marines replaced by an international peacekeeping force. I think it would be a sign of reason and enlightenment that could actually enhance prospects for peace and stability in Lebanon.

Mr. President, I make these points and this appeal not in the spirit of partisanship, but in an honest effort to convince the administration that there is still time, there is still an opportunity, for all of us to work together and avert confrontation on the Marine presence.

My position on this issue is straightforward. I have not yet heard a convincing explanation of why we are in Beirut. If that case can be made, I am ready to listen. If it can not be made, let us move as quickly as possible to replace our marines with an international peacekeeping force. Such a move would not imply any change in policy, or diminished resolve. It would simply be a signal that we are not prepared to offer 1,600 U.S. marines as hostage to terror and anarchy in Beirut.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me briefly?

Mr. BENTSEN. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Texas highly for a very fine presentation in a difficult field, a difficult subject where there is no quick answer of any kind.

The Senator from Texas was never given to idle talk. I think he has actually done good in his presentation here. I have been trying to dig into that subject myself, and I know enough about it to know it is an unanswerable matter almost. But he has hit upon a constructive idea here, and I support the idea of the international peace group.

I certainly do not favor us continuing our present role, and we must find an honorable way out.

Mr. BENTSEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Mississippi.

As the distinguished Senator knows, I have supported this administration on some very contentious foreign policy issues. But in this one I just think they are dangerously wrong and that the longer we stay the more difficult it will be to extricate ourselves.

Mr. STENNIS. I salute the Senator.

VIOLATIONS IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE FmHA ECONOMIC EMERGENCY LOAN PROGRAM—SENATE RESOLUTION 333

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am today submitting a resolution on behalf of myself, Senators EAGLETON, HEFLIN, STENNIS, BOREN, PRYOR, and HUDDLESTON.

The resolution deals with what I believe is the flagrant violation by the Department of Agriculture, specifically the Farmers Home Administration, of the law in the administration of the economic emergency loan program.

On October 5, in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, Judge Thomas Flannery ruled that Secretary Block had acted in an arbitrary and capricious manner and abused his discretion by withholding these economic emergency loans in 1982.

Later, Judge Flannery ordered the Farmers Home Administration to open this program on December 22, 1983, and to leave it open until September 30, 1984, or until all the $600 million in loan funds that had been appropriated by Congress was obligated.

Mr. President, this program was established with the Agriculture Credit Act of 1978 and was reauthorized in 1981. It is a program that has been available to all farmers and ranchers, not just traditional Farmers Home borrowers who are in economic distress and cannot get sufficient credit from other sources and who need credit to remain viable.

The Secretary can designate the entire Nation as under economic distress or he can designate individual regions, and there is a $400,000 loan limit on any one loan to a farmer.

This program is composed of two types of loans that complement each other. One is insured, and this is a direct loan where the farmer goes to the Farmers Home Administration and FmHA loans the money directly. The other is the guaranteed loan program, where the farmer finds a banker or some other financial institution that will loan money and the Government will guarantee 90 percent of the loan.

The regulations state that borrowers should seek guaranteed loans first but if they cannot get one, then they are entitled to an insured loan if they qualify.

As a matter of practice, most all borrowers go directly to the Farmers Home Administration and try to get a direct loan.

On December 22, in response to Judge Flannery's order, the Farmers Home Administration opened the economic emergency program but no direction was given to the States on what kinds of loans to make and, of course, the Farmers Home Administration in my State—and I feel sure I am speaking for all agricultural States—when Arkansas reopened its program it began to take applications for and, as a matter of fact, commit itself to these direct loans. We have never had much of an insured loan program in our State. They have almost been guaranteed loans. Even at the height of the use of the economic emergency loans in 1980, following the worst drought in the history of my State and several other States, only five guaranteed loans were made in Arkansas.

From 1978, when the program was formed, until 1981, when it was reauthorized, the Farmers Home Administration nationally loaned 95 percent of $6.6 billion in direct insured loans and only $328 million or little under 5 percent in guaranteed loans.

But after we reopened the program in December 1983 and began taking applications and obligating funds, on January 20 the Arkansas office was notified that the Farmers Home Administration would no longer accept insured loans and, in fact, only those loans that had been committed, that is, the direct insured loans that had been processed and approved prior to January 13 were allowed to be funded.

OMB has directed that only $50 million of the $600 million appropriation could be used for these insured direct loans and the balance of $550 million is to be used in guaranteed loans.

Until our program in Arkansas was terminated we had obligated between $2 million and $3 million in insured loans, and so we had 157 farmers caught in the pipeline when the change was announced and countless others denied the opportunity to even apply. And $11 million which was allocated to Arkansas cannot be used.

So what the Farmers Home Administration has done is flagrantly to violate the intent of Congress, probably in violation of the court order, and effectively shut the program down in most parts of the country. Certainly they have shut it down in my State. They are changing all precedents of this program, going from favoring insured loans by a ratio of 19-to-1 to mandating guaranteed loans by a ratio of 11-to-1.

What a dramatic change and what a dramatic hardship on the farmers of this country who have suffered terrible economic catastrophes.

Mr. President, OMB has not even disguised its effort to torpedo this program which Congress has specifically authorized and appropriated the money for to keep alive, and OMB is thwarting the intent of Congress.

I am offering this resolution today asking Congress to go on record saying to Secretary Block and the Department of Agriculture and OMB, that you are violating what we intended for you to do, and the resolution states the sense of the Senate that FmHA should start making those direct loans immediately until the funds are exhausted or until September 30, 1984.

I hope that all of my colleagues will cosponsor this. I certainly hope that at least all those Senators from agricultural States who are similarly afflicted will join as cosponsors of this Senate resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. RES. 333

Whereas Congress, with the passage of the Agricultural Credit Act in 1978 established the Economic Emergency (EE) loan program to be administered by the Farmers Home Administration for the purpose of providing temporary credit assistance to farmers and ranchers who would not be able otherwise to maintain a viable agricultural enterprise and who would be unable to obtain credit from normal sources because of national economic stress; and

Whereas, it was and is the intent of Congress that the Economic Emergency loan program should be implemented by FmHA in the fairest and most effective manner possible; and

Whereas, it was and is the intent of Congress that the Economic Emergency loan program be composed of complementary insured and guaranteed loan components, in which farmers and ranchers unable to arrange for guaranteed loans would be allowed under reasonable terms and procedures to seek an insured loan; and

Whereas, it was and is the intent of Congress that neither the guaranteed nor insured component be terminated, but that both should remain viable programs to meet farmers' and ranchers' needs; and

Whereas, for the years 1978 through 1981, the Farmers Home Administration made Economic Emergency loans totaling $6,628,618,000, of which 95.04 percent or $6,299,738,000 were insured loans and only 4.9 percent or $328,880,000 were guaranteed loans; and

Whereas, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia in the case of Kjeldahl v. Block ordered the Secretary of Agriculture to reopen the Economic Emergency loan program for the period December 22, 1983, through September 30, 1984, because of the failure of the Secretary to continue the program in 1982 when dire economic conditions warranted such a continuance; and

Whereas, the Farmers Home Administration reopened a $600,000,000 Economic Emergency loan program on December 22, 1983, with no directions to states about how the money should be obligated, and

Whereas, on January 13, 1984, at the insistence of the Office of Management and Budget, the Farmers Home Administration capped and thereby effectively terminated the insured loan component of the Economic Emergency loan program, thereby effectively shutting down the whole program and causing untold delay and misery for thousands of farmers and ranchers who had applied for loans; be it therefore

Resolved, it is the sense of the Senate that:

(1) The insured loan component of the Economic Emergency loan program is of critical importance to farmers and ranchers, and should remain viable;

(2) The severe limitation and effective termination of the insured loan component of the Economic Emergency loan program violated the intent of Congress in the establishment of this program;

(3) The Farmers Home Administration should immediately begin the obligation of insured Economic Emergency loan funds in a fair and effective manner consistent with Congressional intent, and should continue to obligate such funds until the funds are exhausted or until September 30, 1984.

THE ECONOMIC EMERGENCY LOAN PROGRAM

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor the sense of the Senate resolution being introduced today by my distinguished colleague from Arkansas, Mr. BUMPERS, in regard to the economic emergency loan program.

This program was established in 1978, Mr. President, and for several years, during times of economic difficulty, it served the farmers of this country well. Farmers could use this program to finance their operations when economic conditions were bleak, and it gave many of them a chance to stay in business. As we all know, the farmers of this country have seen their incomes continue to drop to the point where many of them have either quit voluntarily, or are seriously contemplating it. It is indeed unfortunate, Mr. President, that a program established by Congress, specifically to help farmers in a difficult economic period has been effectively shut down by the administration.

As most Members of the Senate will recall, although we appropriated $600 million for this program, the administration refused to start the program and allow farmers to file applications for benefits under the EE program. Because of that, some farmers filed a suit in the District of Columbia, and a court order was subsequently entered which directed the Farmers Home Administration to use the program. Therefore, in December of last year, the Secretary announced that FmHA offices would begin taking applications. This was very good news to many of us, and I spoke with many farmers during the recess who were in the process of filling out applications for these loans.

On January 13, 1984, however, the program was changed, and no new applications were being taken, and also, only $50 million of the $600 million would be used for insured loans. This meant that the remaining $550 million would be used for loan guarantees.

Mr. President, this has created serious problems in many parts of the country. Farmers who filed their applications and got under the January 13, 1984, deadline had a chance for loan approval. However, even some of them have been turned down. Others, who had already filled out applications under the assumption that they would be eligible, are now being told that even if they are approved for an EE loan, it will be a guaranteed loan, which will probably mean they will receive no assistance under the program.

It is my understanding, Mr. President, that a House Agriculture Subcommittee held a hearing on the program yesterday, and tht FmHA officials declined to reverse the decisions that have been made. I sincerely hope they will reconsider this position, and I hope the Senate will approve this resolution stating our intent that the program be conducted in a fair, effective manner. The failure to do so, Mr. President, would represent a breach of faith with the farmers of this country. I urge my colleagues to carefully consider this resolution and I urge its adoption by the full Senate.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRIBLE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there is no order for morning business yet, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE NATIONAL EYE CARE PROJECT

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it is important that Congress be aware and supportive of private sector efforts to prevent and treat disease. Few such efforts have been as ambitious as the American Academy of Ophthalmology's national eye care project. Last spring, in announcing the kickoff of the pilot phase of this soon to be nationwide program, President Reagan hailed it as "fine example of what can be accomplished when Americans volunteer to help one another." As chairman of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee, I would like to add my praise.

The national eye care project is an effort by the American Academy of Ophthalmology, representing 13,000 physicians across the country, to alert our Nation's most vulnerable citizens, the elderly, to the need for regular medical eye care and to direct them to a nearby ophthalmologist who will provide them with whatever medical or surgical eye care is needed—regardless of ability to pay. The project is especially important in light of the fact that 55 percent of the new cases of blindness each year occur in those over 65 years of age, and yet fully 50 percent of persons are losing their eyesight unnecessarily. The cost to our Nation in dollars and in lost human potential is enormous.

In the spring of 1983, the American Academy of Ophthalmology launched a 10-week trial program in three States: Michigan, Washington, and West Virginia. Public service announcements appeared on television and in the newspapers advising the elderly to call a special toll-free helpline if they had no regular source of eye care. More than 2,400 elderly individuals responded to this campaign, and nearly 1,800 were referred to an ophthalmologist in their area. Of the elderly patients examined, 59.3 percent were found to need surgery or follow-up care for cataracts; nearly 7 percent had glaucoma; over 18 percent had macular degeneration; and 3.2 percent had diabetic care disease. Chances are that without the impetus provided by the national eye care project, these elderly patients would not have had their eye diseases detected and might have lost their ability to see clearly and remain independent.

In each State a majority of the practicing ophthalmologists volunteered to see patients referred to them by the national eye care project helpline. The physician's enthusiasm for the pilot program and its success in reaching and improving access to medical care for the elderly convinced the American Academy that its program was needed by a substantial number of elderly persons across the country. Therefore, the academy made a commitment to take its program nationwide, contributing a half million dollars of its own funds. Next fall, the academy will begin a phased in coast-to-coast national eye care project.

As one who has long believed that the private sector has the potential, commitment, and compassion to aid our Nation's senior citizens, I am extremely proud of the American Academy of Ophthalmology's effort to help combat debilitating eye disease in the elderly. Preservation of sight and the potential eradication of treatable eye disease will help our Nation's elderly remain as functional, productive members of our society.

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY NEARS

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, 60 years ago this month, the independence of the Republic of Lithuania was proclaimed. Eighteen days from today, on February 21, I will lead the Senate's annual commemoration of Lithuanian Independence Day, and I invite my colleagues to join in making their own statements at that time.

As I have done each year for more than a decade, I will welcome my friends from the Lithuanian community to join this commemoration by coming to Washington to observe the commemoration on the floor of the Senate. Americans of Lithuanian descent have been instrumental in keeping the plight of their friends and relatives in the homeland very much in our national awareness. And despite the restrictions placed on their freedom by the Soviet regime, Lithuanians in the homeland continue to affirm their national identity and their pride in their traditions.

I will have more to say on this matter during the morning hour on February 21.

A MINDLESS CAMPAIGN AGAINST THE SEA GRANT COLLEGE PROGRAM

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the administration has made known, with the release of its budget proposal, that it is continuing its mindless, heedless campaign to destroy the national sea grant college program.

For the third consecutive year the administration has proposed termination of the program, requesting zero funding for it. I must say I find the administration's proposal amazing and exasperating. The proposal to eliminate this program is wrong, it is contrary to the repeated policy directions of the Congress, and it is contrary to the national interest.

The national sea grant college program has a proven record of outstanding accomplishment. The program has strong and broad support from the scientific and academic community, from the business community including fishermen and marine resource industries, from State governments and from educators. The sea grant program also has had strong bipartisan support in both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The sea grant program even has a ringing endorsement from the Heritage Foundation, the conservative think-tank that this week proposed slashing Federal Government spending by $119 billion in the coming fiscal year. The Heritage Foundation, in its comprehensive policy recommendations at the outset of this administration said the sea grant program has "an impressive record of success," and recommended that its budget be increased by 10 percent per year for 5 years.

As far as I can determine, the program also is supported by the Commerce Department and its National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration in internal administration budget requests.

Who then wants to destroy this modest, well-managed, and effective program? No one, it appears, except for nameless gnomes in the President's Office of Management and Budget. There are, I am convinced, people in this administration who are so profoundly opposed to government activity in any area that they cannot tolerate the sight of a government program, like sea grant, that really works and works well.

The national sea grant college program has an appropriation of $36.5 million for the current fiscal year. That money is being invested, on a matching partnership basis with universities, colleges, and other nonprofit institutions, in programs of applied research, education, and extension services to improve our Nation's use of ocean resources. Repeated studies have shown that the program produces measureable dollar benefits many times the cost of the public investment.

For comparison, consider the fact that the administration is proposing to spend more than $1 billion in the 1985 fiscal year on dryland agricultural research and services. And, yet, it is battling to scrap a modest $36 million program of research and extension services for fisheries and marine resources.

It is simply incomprehensible.

Mr. President, I may not succeed, but I intend to do all I can, once again, to continue the national sea grant college program and its contributions to our economic, scientific, and educational advancement. I hope that my colleagues in the Senate, who have given the program strong bipartisan support in the past will continue to do so.

I urge the administration to pause and give renewed, open and objective consideration to adequate funding for the national sea grant college program.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 1:17 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the following bill and joint resolution, each with an amendment, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 3391. An act to improve worker training under the Trade Act of 1974, and for other purposes; and

H.J. Res. 290. Joint resolution to permit free entry into the United States of the personal effects, equipment, and other related articles of foreign participants, officials, and other accredited members of delegations involved in the games of the XXIII Olympia to be held in the United States in 1984.

The message also announced that pursuant to the provisions of section 9355(a) of title 10, United States Code, the Speaker appoints as members of the Board of visitors to the U.S. Air Force Academy the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. FOLEY, Mr. DICKS, Mr. KRAMER, and Mr. LEWIS of California.

The message further announced, that pursuant to the provisions of section 6968(a) of title 10, United States Code, the Speaker appoints as members of the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Naval Academy the following Members, on the part of the House: Mr. LONG of Maryland, Mr. MURTHA, Mrs. HOLT, and Mr. SPENCE.

The message also announced, that pursuant to the provisions of section 2 of Public Law 96-453, as amended, the Speaker appoints Ms. FERRARO and Mr. CARNEY, on the part of the House, as members of the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy.

The message further announced that pursuant to the provisions of section 4355(a) of title 10, United States Code, the Speaker appoints as members of the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Military Academy the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. DIXON, Mr. HEFNER, Mr. ROTH, and Mr. FISH.

The message further announced that pursuant to the provisions of section 194(a) of title 14 of the United States Code, the Speaker appoints Mr. GEJDENSON and Mr. MCKINNEY, on the part of the House, as members of the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Coast Guard Academy.

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS

The following communications were laid before the Senate, together with accompanying papers, reports, and documents, which were referred as indicated:

EC-2469. A communication from the Director of the Defense Security Assistance Agency transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on a foreign military assistance sale to Australia; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2470. A communication from the Director of the Defense Security Assistance Agency transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on a foreign military assistance sale to Italy; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2471. A communication from the Director of the Defense Security Assistance Agency transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on a foreign military assistance sale to Egypt; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2472. A communication from the Director of the Defense Security Assistance Agency transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on a foreign military assistance sale to Saudi Arabia; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-2473. A communication from the Comptroller General of the United States transmitting, pursuant to law, a report entitled "WIC Evaluations Provide Some Favorable But No Conclusive Evidence on the Effects Expected for the Special Supplemental Program for Women, Infants, and Children"; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

EC-2474. A communication from the Secretary of Energy transmitting, pursuant to law, the Department's annual report on its program for developing improvements in the safety of nuclear powerplants; jointly, pursuant to law, to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources and the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

EC-2475. A communication from the Secretary of Transportation transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the use of lifecycle cost factors in rolling stock procurements for mass transit programs; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

EC-2476. A communication from the Secretary of Energy transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of DOE relative to electric and hybrid vehicle research; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

EC-2477. A communication from the Secretary of Commerce transmitting, pursuant to law, the 12th annual report of the National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

EC-2478. A communication from the Chairman of the Board of the U.S. Synthetic Fuels Corp., transmitting, pursuant to law, the 1983 Annual Report of the Corporation; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EC-2479. A communication from the Chairman of the International Trade Commission, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide authorization of appropriations for the U.S. International Trade Commission for fiscal year 1985; to the Committee on Finance.

EC-2480. A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, the Treasury combined statement of the receipts, expenditures, and balances of the U.S. Government for the fiscal year ended September 30, 1983; to the Committee on Finance.

EC-2481. A communication from the Director of the Defense Security Assistance Agency, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the status of contracts, guarantees, and insurances for defense articles; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EC-2482. A communication from the Assistant Legal Advisor for Treaty Affairs, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on international agreements, other than treaties, entered into by the United States for the 60-day period prior to January 26, 1984; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EC-2483. A communication from the Secretary of Health and Human Services, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on surplus real property transferred in fiscal year 1983 for public health purposes; to the Committee on Government Affairs.

EC-2484. A communication from the Secretary of the Mississippi River Commission, Department of the Army, transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of the Commission under the Government in the Sunshine Act for calendar year 1983; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-2485. A communication from Judge Brister, of the northern district of Texas, transmitting, pursuant to law, acceptance of his appointment as a judge of the Bankruptcy Court; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EC-2486. A communication from Judge Wilhardt, of the District of Oregon, transmitting, pursuant to law, acceptance of her appointment as a judge of the Bankruptcy Court; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EC-2487. A communication from the Secretary of Education, transmitting, pursuant to law, the sixtieth annual report on the implementation of the Education for All Handicapped Children Act; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

EC-2488. A communication from the Secretary to the Railroad Retirement Board, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on a new Privacy Act system of records; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Governmental Affairs, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and an amendment to the title:

S. 958. A bill to amend chapter 54 of title 5, United States Code, to reform the merit pay system (Rept. No. 98-351).

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. GORTON (for himself and Mr. ZORINSKY):

S. 2254. A bill to promote the use of food irradiation as a postharvest treatment for agricultural commodities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

By Mr. TRIBLE:

S. 2255. A bill to provide for payments in lieu of taxes to be made by the United States to local governments for property exempt from property taxation under Federal law which is located within the jurisdiction of the local government and owned by the United States; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. HUDDLESTON (for himself and Mr. BOREN):

S. 2256. A bill to exempt restaurant central kitchens from Federal inspection requirements; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were read, and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. BUMPERS (for himself, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. BOREN, Mr. PRYOR, and Mr. HUDDLESTON):

S. Res. 333. Resolution to reinstate the Farmers Home Administration economic emergency loan program; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

By Mr. BAKER (for himself and Mr. BYRD):

S. Res. 334. Resolution authorizing testimony and representation of Galen Reser in the case of Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Company against George P. Schultz, et al., Civil Action No. 83-3819; considered and agreed to.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. Res. 335. Resolution calling on the Office of Management and Budget to withdraw its proposed revisions to Circular A-122; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. BOREN, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. EVANS, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. NUNN, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. STENNIS, and Mr. TOWER):

S. Res. 336. Resolution to proclaim "Circle K International Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. GORTON (for himself and Mr. ZORINSKY):

S. 2254. A bill to promote the use of food irradiation as a postharvest treatment for agricultural commodities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

FOOD IRRADIATION AS A POSTHARVEST TREATMENT

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, today, along with Senator ZORINSKY, I am introducing legislation to promote the use of food irradiation as a postharvest treatment for agricultural commodities. This bill is identical to H.R. 4454, introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman MORRISON and 20 cosponsors on November 18.

Currently, irradiation is defined by a statute as a food additive. In addition to being illogical, this definition means that irradiated food is considered adulterated unless the irradiation process conforms to complex and burdensome Federal regulations. This legislation would exempt sources of radiation from the definition of food additive, and instead subject food irradiation to the same regulations which are applied to pesticide chemicals used on raw agricultural commodities.

Irradiation represents an exciting innovation in food processing. It was developed 30 years ago by the Army Research Laboratory in Natick, Mass. Irradiation has now been approved for various foods by approximately 28 countries. Japan, India, and the Netherlands make extensive use of the process. Canada recently decided to treat irradiation as a food process rather than a food additive, which is the approach taken by this bill.

Food irradiation means exposing fruits, vegetables, meats, and other foodstuffs to low doses of gamma-, beta-, and X-rays. The dosages are so small that they leave no residue in the food. Irradiation delays spoilage of fruits and vegetables, disinfects cereals, fruits, and vegetables of all insects, insect eggs, and fungi, tenderizes meat, and inhibits the natural sprouting of potatoes and onions. It can kill the trichina larvae in pork and can replace the use of ethyl dibromide (EDB) as a post-harvest treatment.

The Food and Drug Administration is considering issuing a regulation permitting irradiation of any food at doses not to exceed 100 kilorads. Two international organizations, the Joint FAO/IAEA/WHO Expert Committee and the Codex Alimentarius Commission, have recommended the use of irradiation on food up to doses 10 times higher than FDA is considering. I believe it is time to ease the heavy restrictions on food irradiation, especially if the use of EDB is prohibited.

I hope this legislation will encourage greater public awareness and discussion of this promising technology. The application of irradiation and this legislation on processed foods is one of many areas that should be addressed.

I ask unanimous consent that an article on food irradiation from the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREATING FOOD WITH IRRADIATION: FDA CAUTIOUS ABOUT APPROVAL OF PROCESS

(By Patricia Picone Mitchell)

You reach for a product on your supermarket shelf and see the words "treated with ionizing radiation" printed prominently on the label. Will you put it back? Consumers may encounter such products sometime in the next two years, once the Food and Drug Administration completes consideration of a regulation to allow foods to be disinfected, pasteurized and preserved with low doses of gamma-, beta- and X-rays.

Food irradiation, as the process is called, has been feasible for more than 30 years, but it is only now that FDA has considered permitting its use in the United States on a widescale basis. In contrast, countries such as the Netherlands have already approved irradiation for many foods among them shrimp, chicken, frog legs and bread. About 50 irradiation-processed foods have been approved by health authorities in approximately 28 countries, including Japan, where 15,000 tons of potatoes are irradiated each year to inhibit sprouting. Excluding Japan's potatoes, it is estimated that total world output of irradiated foods is 2,000 tons per year.

In fact, some Americans have been eating irradiated food on a regular basis. The astronauts have dined in space on irradiated corned beef, smoked turkey and steak. Irradiated foods have also been used for hospital patients who need the sterilized products because of immune deficiencies. The U.S. military has been interested in purchasing such sterilized foods, which it is claimed can be safely eaten years after they are processed, if properly packaged.

The FDA has been reluctant to give widespread approval for irradiation, although it has recently approved its use for spices and permits very low doses for sprout inhibition of potatoes and as a disinfectant for wheat and wheat flour. "It's a hard thing—how do you determine the safety of any process?" asks Clyde Takeguchi of FDA's Division of Food and Color Additives in the Bureau of Foods. The big question that stumped FDA staffers for years, he says, was how to conduct safety studies of food irradiation—especially in an environment where the regulatory science was rapidly changing.

Consumer groups have kept relatively silent on the food irradiation issue, aware that the process could offer significant benefits by replacing the use of dangerous chemicals, but also concerned about still lingering safety questions. Thomas Smith of the Washington-based Public Voice for Food and Health Policy says his group has taken no formal position about the safety of the technology, but adds that he is "glad" that FDA has moved cautiously in permitting expansion of irradiation. "There are still questions that remain about the technology," says Smith, echoing the view of other consumer activists.

Concerns of a different nature have been voiced by other groups, however. The Environmental Policy Institute fears that widespread commercialization of food irradiation will lead to the transport of highly radioactive materials to food irradiation facilities located in America's neighborhoods.

Robert Alvarez, spokesman for EPI, says the federal program in which states agree with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to regulate such facilities is in "a shambles." Calling irradiation "a high technology that's fairly dangerous," Alvarez says "the jury is still out in terms of its utility." He says his group will seek a legislative remedy to block FDA's approval of the process until a more effective system for regulating irradiation facilities is in place.

The technology could be a boon for both consumers and the food industry, as long as consumers are not scared off by the fear that the foods they are eating will glow in the dark, or worse. Actually, according to researchers and proponents of the process, irradiated foods are treated with beams of radiation that are too small to allow any residual radioactivity to remain in the products. What do get "zapped" are insects, bacteria, molds, fungus and other microorganisms that each year spoil one quarter of the world's food supply. At varying dose levels, irradition has the potential to:

Clean up spices and garlic and onion powder, replacing chemical treatments currently used, such as ethylene oxide, the safety of which has been questioned. (Spices are often contaminated with dirt and insects and conventional heat disinfecting destroys their flavors.) This irradiation use was approved by FDA last summer and is being practiced commercially by Radiation Technology Inc. of Rockaway, N.J.

Control insect infestation in cereals, flours, fresh and dried fruit. Irradiation could replace the use of the chemical fumigant ethylene dibromide or EDB, which the Environmental Protection Agency is considering banning because of tests showing its carcinogenicity.

Control pathogenic bacteria that cause public health problems. Irradiation could kill off the parasites that cause trichinosis, making possible the serving of rarer pork and opening up export markets to countries that don't accept U.S. pork because of the trichinosis problem. Irradiated poultry would be free of salmonella, a pathogen thought to contaminate at least one-third of all the fresh poultry sold in the U.S. and estimated to cause up to one million cases of gastroenteritis each year according to a 1983 Commerce Department report.

Extend the refrigerated shelf life, through its pasteurizing effect, of products that spoil quickly (ground beef, fresh fish and seafood, and such produce as blueberries and strawberries) from several days to several weeks.

Reduce or replace the use of sodium nitrite and nitrate in cured meat products, since meats irradiated at high enough doses would be sterilized and protected from clostridium botulinum, one of the major reasons nitrite is used.

The major underlying safety concern of irradiated food centers on the fact that chemical substances, called radiolytic products, are formed in irradiated foods at very low levels. Such reaction products are also a byproduct of other cooking and preserving methods, but researchers are seeking to find out whether the radiolytic products in irradiated foods are unique and/or harmful. Eugen Wierbicki, of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Eastern Regional Research Center in Philadelphia, who has researched irradiation for over 20 years, says radiolytic products occur very regularly and can be predicted by computer analysis, based on dose and temperature of the product during irradiation. He points out that canned foods contain three times as many reaction products as irradiated products. "They are not unique because they are present in other foods and are all natural compounds," he says.

However, according to FDA's Takeguchi, radiolytic products occur in such small quantities they are often difficult to detect. And it's also difficult to determine if they are unique since a multitude of reaction products that occur in conventionally processed foods have never been identified.

Another controversial issue facing FDA is labeling. Under current FDA regulations, irradiated foods must be labeled with the words "treated with ionizing radiation." (Products not irradiated but which contain irradiated ingredients—like spices—require no special labeling.) Martin Welt, president of Radiation Technology, says such labeling "can only mislead people," and notes that currently there is no requirement for labeling of foods treated with chemical fumigants, even though residues of such chemicals often remain in the food. Several other countries, including Holland, Belgium and South Africa, require labeling along with a small graphic symbol, on directly irradiated foods.

FDA in its upcoming proposal will have to decide whether to continue the current requirement for labeling and if so, in what form. A recent report by the Congressional Research Service noted that alternate names have been suggested for the technology such as "cosmic processing," "picowave processing," or "processed with ionizing energy," which some believe may avoid the public's association of irradiation with "radioactive."

"There's nothing really magic about irradition—it's just another form of energy," says Philip E. Lewis of the U.S. Department of Commerce's Bureau of Industrial Economics, who recently authored a report on the subject. Once the energy source is removed from the food, the food itself emits no energy. Microwaves are another form of radiation, but with a different effect—exciting the molecules and heating up the food. Gamma rays, on the other hand, disrupt the chemical bonds of living things, killing off microorganisms and insects but causing only a slight temperature rise in the food. Therein lies the advantage of food irradiation over conventional food preservation methods such as canning. Without the need for heat, there are fewer flavor and odor changes and nutrient losses, and the foods more closely resemble their raw state.

The source of the gamma rays, most common of the rays used in food irradiation facilities, is cobalt-60, a byproduct of the nuclear industry. In a food irradiation facility, the food is placed on a conveyor belt and passed through a shielded chamber, where it is exposed to the rays emitted by the radioactive metal.

FDA's forthcoming regulation will permit a relatively low radiation dose of 100 kilorads, which is one-tenth that allowed by a host of foreign countries. Canada, for example, strongly motivated by a desire to control salmonella in poultry, has just proposed permitting foods to be irradiated with up to one megarad (1,000 kilorads), the dose advocated by several international organizations, including the Codex Alimentarius Commission, a United Nations food standards setting group operating under the auspices of the World Health Organization and the Food and Agriculture Organization.

For approval of foods irradiated at doses larger than 100 kilorads, the FDA proposal would require studies in which the food is tested on animals.

One reason FDA staffers have been so cautious in conferring their blessing on the process is that the potential for use of irradiation is so great. "The agency is going to be more cautious in approving a process that could eventually be used for a substantial part of the nation's diet than it would be in approving a new food additive that may represent only a minor fraction," says Lewis in his report. Lewis also points out that once large-scale irradation facilities become available, "there would be tremendous pressure to continue their use even if their safety later came into debate."

FDA has in part been stymied by a 1958 amendment to the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act that says food irradiation must be regulated not as a process like canning or fumigation but as a food additive, requiring premarket approval with stringent safety testing.

Rep. Sid Morrison (R-Wash.), an apple farmer from the Yakima Valley, recently introduced legislation to reverse irradiation's legal status proposing to define it as a postharvest treatment. Currently Washington apples and cherries must be fumigated with suspect chemicals to rid them of coddling moths before they can be exported. An aide to Morrison says the bill has been gaining support among other sectors of the farm industry, including papaya and mango growers in Hawaii, whose produce could travel longer distances if irradiated first.

Even if FDA were to permit irradiation unconditionally, Lewis believes the process "won't take off tremendously." For one thing, he says, food companies already enjoy the advantages of an efficient food production and distribution system and may not see a tremendous opportunity for creating new products with high profit-making potential.

The food industry is also concerned with how consumers will accept the process. Lewis notes in his report, however, that a recent Canadian study suggests that when properly informed, "the public may accept irradiated food more readily than food companies believe." He says Japanese consumers, "naturally sensitive to the issue of radiation," have accepted irradiated potatoes.

While irradiation has been touted by proponents as a cost- and energy-saving preservation process, this may not always be the case. There are the logistical problems and costs of transporting foods to a central irradiation facility. Irradiation, according to Lewis, is currently more expensive for sprout inhibition of potatoes than chemical treatment. It has other drawbacks as well: Some fresh fruits can be successfully irradiated, while others tend to soften and undergo flavor and color changes. Milk products undergo changes in taste when irradiated. Wierbicki believes, however, that further research will overcome these problems.

The potential for widespread use of high-dose irradiation may also be limited. USDA is currently completing a wholesomeness evaluation of high-dose sterilized precooked poultry, and is expected to submit a petition to FDA for approval within a year. Because high-dose radiation requires the food to be precooked and then frozen before it is irradiated, energy savings over freezing or canning may be minimal. Such products may have considerable export potential, however, especially to countries with hot climates and poor refrigeration.

Whatever the benefits or drawbacks of the process, the extent to which food irradiation takes off will ultimately depend on FDA. And while the FDA proposal would expand the uses of this technology, it would not permit doses high enough to take advantage of all the possibilities. The day when consumers routinely store their pouches of chicken in the pantry is years or even decades away.

By Mr. TRIBLE:

S. 2255. A bill to provide for payments in lieu of taxes to be made by the United States to local governments for property exempt from property taxation under Federal law which is loacted within the jurisdiction of the local government and owned by the United States; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

PAYMENT IN LIEU OF TAX ACT OF 1984

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, each year, localities are deprived of billions of dollars of property tax revenue because of the presence within their borders of untaxed Federal property. In fact, the Federal Government claims a tax exemption for nearly all of its $280 billion in real property holdings.

As a result, some localities suffer a disproportionate erosion in their property tax bases and revenue due to the very large size and uneven distribution of untaxed Federal property.

The Congress has long recognized the seriousness of the problem and has accepted in principle the need for appropriate compensation to localities. In a few cases, the Congress has actually agreed to subject Federal property to local taxation. It has also created a host of programs to compensate localities for their lost property tax revenues through a variety of revenue and receipts sharing arrangements, grants, and special programs of payments in lieu of tax. In fact, a 1978 study by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (ACIR) found there were at least 57 different Federal programs, providing 64 different compensation payments.

Extensive as they are, these schemes have no guiding principle, and the ACIR found that "the result has been * * * a patchwork of uncoordinated and ad hoc special payment programs."

Lacking any guiding principle, Federal compensation is provided unevenly and unfairly. For example, open space Federal properties—such as grazing, forest and park lands—are compensated for under existing programs. But the ACIR was able to identify a huge class of Federal tax exempt properties—so called non-open-space Federal properties—for which little or no compensation was provided. In fact, ACIR estimates that $210 billion of Federal non-open-space properties are locally tax exempt, depriving affected localities of $3.7 billion in annual revenue, and that the losses are largely uncompensated by other Federal programs.

Clearly, this inequity needs to be addressed.

There is another unfair aspect of the current system which also needs attention. When the Federal Government leases taxable property, the rental payments include compensation to the owner for the local property taxes the owner pays. In leasing real property, the Federal Government indirectly pays local property taxes. Yet if the Government owns the property, and conducts the same activity on it, it pays no property taxes by virtue of its tax immunity.

The net result is a situation in which the Federal Government's local taxes depend capriciously on whether the Government chooses to lease or own property.

Today, I am introducing legislation to lessen the inequities and anomalies in the current system.

My "Payment in Lieu of Tax Act of 1984" closely follows the recommendations of the Advisory Commission on Inter-Governmental Relations in its comprehensive 1981 report titled "Payments in Lieu of Taxes on Federal Real Property."

My bill creates a system of modest payments in lieu of tax which would partially compensate localities for their loss of revenues. Payments would begin in fiscal year 1985 and would include non-open-space Federal properties. Specifically, localities would receive a payment equal to 10 percent of the property tax revenues they would collect on such non-open-space properties if the properties were not tax-exempt. Such a system of payments in lieu of tax—PILOT's—would cost approximately $370 million per year.

The basic principle of PILOT's is simple: When the Federal Government acquires real property it also acquires the same taxpaying responsibility as any other property owner. All property owners should pay property taxes. My bill moves us toward that principle.

Because tax exemption for Federal properties is poor policy, it should be eliminated. Therefore, my bill also asks the General Accounting Office to study the feasibility, desirability, and constitutionality of congressional consent to full local property taxation of Federal properties. In the meantime, partial PILOT's can lessen the unfairness inherent in the current situation.

Non-open-space PILOT's will strengthen fiscal federalism by providing localities with funds that they can use for better schools, improved police and fire protection, food and shelter for the hungry and homeless, or for other purposes. This program will offset in part the real reduction in Federal aid to localities which has taken place in recent years, or could provide an opportunity for overdue local property tax relief. It would complement, not threaten, existing compensatory payment schemes.

Mr. President, I believe that my bill is fair. It builds upon principles of compensation which Congress already recognizes, but applies unevenly. It would lessen the arbitrary tax consequences of Government "lease" versus "buy" decisions as those decisions affect the Government's tax bill. And it insists that Government "pay its due" like any other property owner. If we are going to insist that taxpayer bear their "fair share" of the tax burden, we can ask no less of the Federal Government.

For all these reasons, I urge my colleagues to work with me to secure swift passage of the Payments in Lieu of Tax Act of 1984.

By Mr. HUDDLESTON (for himself and Mr. BOREN):

S. 2256. A bill to exempt restaurant central kitchens from Federal inspection requirements; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

FEDERAL INSPECTION OF CENTRAL KITCHEN FACILITIES

● Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that would provide an exemption from Federal inspection requirements for restaurant central kitchens that prepare meat and poultry products for sale to individual consumers at restaurants owned or operated by those owning the restaurant central kitchen. I believe that the requirement for Federal inspection of these restaurant cental kitchens is onerous and unnecessary.

Restaurants per se are exempt from Federal inspection under the Federal Meat Inspection Act and the Poultry Products Inspection Act. Under the bill I am introducing, operations conducted at a restaurant central kitchen facility would be considered as being conducted at a restaurant if the restaurant central kitchen prepares food products that are ready to eat when they leave such facility and served only to customers at restaurants owned or operated by the person owning or operating such facility.

In March 1983, the Food Safety and Inspection Service of the Department of Agriculture released a study stating that its current policy on restaurant central kitchens that supply prepared food to their own restaurants is probably burdensome because it first, requires them to have Federal inspection when they are already under some degree of regulatory scrutiny by State, city, or county health authorities; second, requires them to have prior agency approval of labels and formulas, which prevents them from taking advantage of the price differences for seasonal ingredients; and third, may prevent some central kitchens from expanding their operations, which could result in decreasing competition. In addition, the Department has estimated that spending under current policy requirements for inspection amounts to about $397,000 annually.

Mr. President, it had been my hope that this matter could have been resolved administratively. However, it was the opinion of the Office of General Counsel of the U.S. Department of Agriculture that an exemption for restaurant central kitchens could be accomplished only through legislation.

My legislation will eliminate an unnecessary burden placed on small businessmen. I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring my bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill, correspondence with the Department of Agriculture on this matter, and the legal opinion of the Office of General Counsel be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2256

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 301(c)(2) of the Federal Meat Inspection Act 21 U.S.C. 661(c)(2)) is amended by adding the following sentence at the end thereof: "For the purposes of this subparagraph, operations conducted at a restaurant central kitchen facility shall be considered as being conducted at a restaurant if the restaurant central kitchen prepares food products that are ready to eat when they leave such facility and served only to customers at restaurants owned or operated by the person, firm, or corporation owning or operating such facility.".

SEC. 2. Section 5(c)(2) of the Poultry Products Inspection Act (21 U.S.C. 454(c)(2)) is amended by adding the following sentence at the end thereof: "For the purposes of this subparagraph, operations conducted at a restaurant central kitchen facility shall be considered as being conducted at a restaurant if the restaurant central kitchen prepares food products that are ready to eat when they leave such facility and served only to customers at restaurants owned or operated by the person owning or operating such facility.".

SENATE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY,
Washington, D.C., May 10, 1983.

Hon. JOHN R. BLOCK,
Secretary of Agriculture,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: We urge you to issue regulations that would provide an exemption from Federal inspection for central kitchens distributing meat and poultry products to their own restaurants. In our opinion, the requirement for Federal inspection of these central kitchens is onerous and unnecessary.

The March 1983 Food Safety and Inspection Service study indicates that the current policy on those central kitchens that supply food products to their own restaurants may be burdensome because it—(1) requires them to have Federal inspection when they are already under some degree of regulatory scrutiny by State, city, or county health authorities; (2) requires them to have prior agency approval of labels and formulas, which prevents them from taking advantage of the price differences for seasonal ingredients; and (3) may prevent some central kitchens from expanding their operations, which could result in decreasing competition. In addition, the Department has estimated that spending under current policy requirements for inspection amounts to about $397,000 annually.

Although legislation has been introduced in the past to alleviate this burden, we believe that such an exemption could be accomplished administratively. In addition, we understand from testimony by officials of the Department and from the March 1983 FSIS study that the Department believes that this could be done by regulation.

We, therefore, urge you to issue the regulations providing the exemption as soon as practicable.

Sincerely,

JESSE HELMS.
WALTER D. HUDDLESTON.
DAVID L. BOREN.

SENATE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY,
Washington, D.C., May 24, 1983.

Hon. A. JAMES BARNES,
General Counsel, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BARNES: On May 10, 1983, I wrote Secretary Block urging him to provide an exemption from Federal inspection for central kitchens distributing meat and poultry products to their own restaurants. The Food Safety and Inspection Service's March 1983 study states that such an exemption could be accomplished administratively.

Although I have not received a formal reply to my May 10 letter, I understand that the Office of the Central Counsel did not review the FSIS March 1983 study for legal sufficiency. I, therefore, would appreciate having your legal opinion on this matter as soon as possible.

Sincerely,

WALTER D. HUDDLESTON.

U.S., DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF GENERAL COUNSEL,
Washington, D.C. May 31, 1983.

Hon. WALTER D. HUDDLESTON,
Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HUDDLESTON: This is in response to your letter dated May 24, 1983, requesting a legal opinion from our office on the applicability of the routine inspection requirements of the Federal Meat Inspection Act (21 U.S.C. 601 et seq.) and the Poultry Products Inspection Act (21 U.S.C. 451 et seq.) to the preparation of meat or poultry products at central kitchen facilities by restaurant chains for distributions to their restaurants.

In your letter to Secretary Block of May 10, 1983, you urged that he issue regulations that would provide an exemption from the routine Federal inspection requirements for central kitchens distributing meat and poultry products to their own restaurants. In our view, such an exemption can be accomplished only through statutory amendments. In this regard, we do not agree with the drafters of the Food Safety and Inspection Service's March 1983 study.

On May 23, 1983, we submitted a legal memorandum to Donald L. Houston, the Administrator of the Food Safety and Inspection Service, setting forth our rationale in support of our legal position. We are enclosing a copy of this memorandum for your information. Please contact us if you have any questions on this opinion.

Sincerely,

JOHN E. NOAKES,
Acting General Counsel.

Enclosure.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF GENERAL COUNSEL,
Washington, D.C., May 23, 1983.

To: Donald L. Houston, Administrator, FSIS.

From: Ronald D. Cipolla, Assistant General Counsel, Regulatory Division.

Subject: Central Kitchens:

This has reference to your request for an opinion concerning the applicability of routine inspection requirements of the Federal Meat Inspection Act (21 U.S.C. 601 et seq.) and the Poultry Products Inspection Act (21 U.S.C. 451 et seq.) to the preparation of meat or poultry products at central kitchen facilities by restaurant chains for distributions to their restaurants.

In March of this year, your agency published an analysis of the exemption provisions of the Federal Meat and Poultry Inspection laws. The final chapter of that study (pages 36-40) deals with the issue of inspection of central kitchens. The drafters of the study conclude that an exemption from inspection for central kitchens which prepare meat and poultry products for sale to individual consumers at restaurants owned or operated by those owning the central kitchen could be accomplished by modifications to the regulations under the Federal Meat and Poultry Products Inspection Acts.

As you know, our office did not review the exemption study prior to its publication. As Mr. Reuben and I advised you at a recent meeting, we support most of the findings contained in the study, but we do not concur in the conclusion that an exemption from inspection for central kitchens can be accomplished merely by changes in the current regulations. To the contrary, we believe that the recommended exemptions relating to central kitchens can be accomplished, in general, only through statutory amendments.

The necessity for statutory amendments to exempt central kitchens from the routine inspection requirements is a position consistently advanced by this office for many years. More importantly, this position has been communicated to members of Congress and their staffs, orally and in writing, by attorneys in this office and representatives of your agency. Additionally, attorneys in this office and representatives of your agency participated last year in a task force involved in the drafting of proposed legislation which, among other things, would have exempted certain central kitchen operations from the routine inspection requirements. Similarly, our office and your agency jointly drafted proposed amendments to the 1981 Farm Bill which would have authorized certain exemptions for central kitchens.

Our position that exemption from routine inspection for central kitchen facilities can be accomplished, in general, only through legislative changes is well-supported by a review of the current statutory provisions and applicable regulations.

The Federal Meat Inspection Act provides that meat or meat food products prepared for commerce in any "slaughtering, meat-canning, salting, packing, rendering, or similar establishment" are required to be derived from livestock (i.e., cattle, sheep, swine, goats, horses, mules or other equines) that receive federal ante-mortem and post-mortem inspection and the articles must be prepared under federal inspection, unless the operations of the establishment are exempted from federal inspection (See sections 3, 4, 6, 10 and 23 of the Act (21 U.S.C. 603, 604, 606, 610 and 623)). Section 301(c)(1) and (3) of the Act (21 U.S.C. 661(c)(1) and (3)) provides, in relevant part, that the Secretary of Agriculture shall designate any state which does not have, or is not effectively enforcing, requirements at least equal to those imposed under titles I and IV of the Act. If a state is so designated, titles I and IV of the Act become applicable to wholly intrastate, as well as interstate, operations and transactions and persons engaged therein in the state. Section 301(c)(2) of the Act (21 U.S.C. 661(c)(2)) provides, in relevant part, that the provisions of said Act requiring inspection of carcasses, parts thereof, meat and meat food products, do not apply to operations of types traditionally and usually conducted at restaurants in any state when conducted at any restaurant for sale in normal retail quantities or service of such articles to consumers at such establishments. This exemption is applicable only to operations of restaurants in intrastate commerce in designated states, and the Act does not require states to provide routine inspection with respect to such establishments. A similar exclusion from routine inspection requirements is applicable to operations of restaurants in interstate commerce in all states based upon this Department's construction of the above-cited provisions of the Act in conjunction with the Opinion of the Attorney General of August 17, 1972 (Vol. 42, Op No. 44).

There is no definition in the Act of the term "restaurant". However, this term is specifically defined in section 303.1(d)(2)(iv) of the federal meat inspection regulations (9 CFR 303.1(d)(2)(iv)). The definition of "restaurant" in the regulations includes "a caterer which delivers or serves product in meals, or as entrees, only to individual consumers and otherwise meets the requirements of this paragraph". The regulations do not otherwise define "caterer", but the intent in this regard was to limit the term "caterer" to one who provides food or service for a social affair (e.g., a banquet or wedding) pursuant to sales made (over the telephone or in person) to individual consumers at the catering establishment. This interpretation of the term "caterer" is consistent with the provisions of the Act and the dictionary definition of the word "caterer". (See, Webster's New International Dictionary (3d Ed.) and Webster's Seventh New Collegiate Dictionary.)

The definition of a "restaurant", in section 303.1(d)(2)(iv) of the federal meat inspection regulations, includes "any establishment where product is prepared only for sale or service, in meals, or as entrees, directly to individual consumers at such establishment". The preparation of meat food products at central kitchens by restaurant chains for distribution to their restaurants for sale would not, in our view, be exempt from inspection under section 301(c) of the Act. These operations are analogous to those performed at centralized facilities by chain stores, e.g., Safeway Stores, Inc., and A & P, for distribution to their stores for retail sale. These activities are such as to make the chain stores, with respect to their central facilities, "packers" within the meaning of the Packers and Stockyards Act. (See, Safeway Stores, Inc., et al. v. Freeman, 369 F. 2d 952 (D.C. Cir. 1966)). Such central facilities have received federal meat inspection service for many years, and, in our view, "at least equal" state inspection service is required under the Act with respect to any such central facilities which distribute products only in intrastate commerce in non-designated states.

The Poultry Products Inspection Act has similar inspection and exemption provisions with respect to the slaughter and preparation of poultry and poultry products by restaurants (See sections 5, 6, 9 and 10 of the Act (21 U.S.C. 454, 455, 458 and 459)). There are, however, additional exemption provisions for small poultry producers in section 15 of the Act (21 U.S.C. 464). Under paragraph (c)(1)(D) of that section, the Secretary could, by regulation, exempt from the inspection requirements the processing of poultry products by a poultry producer or other person solely for intrastate distribution by him "directly to household consumers, restaurants, hotels, and boarding houses, for use in their own dining rooms, or in the preparation of meals for sales direct to consumers" (21 U.S.C. 464(c)(1)(D)). Under paragraph (c)(3) of that section, the above-exemption is limited to those processing no more than 20,000 turkeys or other poultry during a calendar year (21 U.S.C. 464(c)(3)).

In our view, the exemption provisions contained in section 15(c)(1)(D) of the Act appear to be limited to any person preparing products for sale by him wholly intrastate to other persons, e.g. persons operating restaurants, for use in their dining rooms or in the preparation of meals for sales direct to consumers. The legislative history of the Wholesome Poultry Products Inspection Act indicates that the Congress intended to so limit the provisions (Cong. Rec., July 29, 1968, pp. S23980-23982). However, even if the provisions were construed to apply to distributions by the producer to restaurants owned or operated by him, the provisions would be very limited in their application to the central kitchen situation. Most central kitchen facilities preparing poultry or poultry products would involve operations apparently too large to qualify for that exemption.

In any event, we assume that your agency would prefer adopting a uniform position with respect to the exemption of central kitchens from both meat and poultry inspection. Accordingly, we believe that the exemption of central kitchens from inspection requirements under the Federal Meat Inspection Act and the Poultry Products Inspection Act should be accomplished through statutory amendments.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 335—RESOLUTION DISAPPROVING LATEST REVISIONS TO OMB CIRCULAR A-122

Mr. MOYNIHAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Governmental Affairs:

S. RES. 335

Whereas the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) has promulgated regulations relative to "lobbying and related activities" by non-profit grantees and contractors of the Federal government, without specific statutory authority from Congress; and

Whereas the receipt of Federal assistance cannot and ought not result in the loss of fundamental Constitutional rights of free speech, petition, and association; and

Whereas the unimpeded exchange of views and information between the Federal Government and non-profit organizations receiving Federal funds helps ensure the effective operation of those programs and facilitates Congressional oversight; and

Whereas the application of the regulations proposed by the Office of Management and Budget in OMB Circular A-122 could have an arbitrary and capricious chilling effect on the First Amendment rights of those affiliated with non-profit organizations, could prove coercive, and could inhibit the flow of information between those organizations and Congress and the executive branch: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Office of Management and Budget should immediately withdraw its proposed revisions to Circular A-122 and refrain from promulgating this or any other rule or regulation that would have similar effects on the recipients of Federal grants or contracts or on the private donors to these non-profit organizations.

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, on March 8, 1983, I submitted a Senate resolution (S. Res. 85) requesting the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) to withdraw its ill-contrived revisions to Circular A-122, a regulation entitled "Cost Principles for Nonprofit Organizations." OMB had proposed these revisions in an effort to restrict the political activities of nonprofit organizations receiving Federal grants and funds. The next day, OMB did in fact withdraw the proposed changes pending further evaluation. This evaluation resulted in the promulgation of additional revisions which were published in the Federal Register on November 3, 1983. The period for public comment on these revisions ended last month, on January 17. I understand that OMB is reviewing correspondence from over 100,000 individuals and groups.

I rise today to offer a second Senate resolution strongly disapproving the most recent revisions to Circular A-122 proposed by OMB. I invite my colleagues to join me in opposing these new regulations, regulations that have no statutory basis and bear little relation to OMB's stated purpose of promoting Government efficiency.

The primary, and most ominous, effect of OMB's proposed revision would be to curtail significantly the political activities of all nonprofit organizations receving Federal support. To date, OMB has failed to demonstrate a need for such far-reaching regulation of the Nation's nonprofit organizations or, further, why its revisions should apply to private citizens who choose to contribute to nonprofit organizations that receive Federal funds.

In my view, OMB does not have the authority to formulate regulations of this scope and specificity without a direct grant of authority to do so from Congress. The Constitution designates Congress, not the executive branch, the broad authority over Federal spending. Certainly, executive agencies, with the consent of Congress properly may regulate the use of Federal funds by public, State, and local agencies. But we must question the propriety of an executive agency—OMB or any other—deciding how a private nonprofit organization shall allocate its resources including those received from the Federal Government and the effect of such regulation on Government efficiency.

Further regulation of nonprofit organizations is unnecessary and duplicative. Current law already regulates the use of Federal moneys by these organizations for political purposes. Nonprofit groups presently must comply with the strict reporting standards of the Internal Revenue Code, which requires detailed records on lobbying activities. The revisions to Circular A-122 would impose additional, burdensome recordkeeping requirements on both nonprofit organizations and the Government, at a time when both Congress and the administration concur that unnecessary regulations and paperwork must be reduced.

Moreover, the proposed regulations raise important constitutional concerns which have not been addressed adequately by OMB. Members of nonprofit organizations would find their first amendment rights of speech, petition and association unduly restricted without compelling reason. The regulations also would attenuate the fourth amendment right of individual contributors to nonprofit organizations who have gifts reported to the Federal Government, even if their donations are not directly or indirectly for what the revised circular deems "lobbying or related activities." This requirement exceeds the stated purpose of monitoring the use of Federal funds by nonprofit organizations, and would result in an impermissible and unconstitutional invasion of the privacy of individual contributors.

Under Circular A-122, the definition of lobbying and related activities could well be interpreted to prevent grassroots efforts from influencing Federal and State legislation, or to discourage citizen groups from participating in public education campaigns such as letter writing or fund raising associated with pending legislation. The circular deems this activity as "concerted public action," within the realm of "lobbying and related activities." This is a significantly more narrow definition than the corresponding one in the Internal Revenue Code. The provision to consider as unallowable expenses the costs of referenda or initiative campaigns, properly public education activities, raises significant first amendment questions. Such public education campaigns are a traditional means of civic involvement, and an executive agency ought not curtail them.

Under the revised circular, if a covered recipient signed a quarterly report and expense statement, this would be considered to constitute his or her binding acceptance of all conditions of the circular. These documents are submitted routinely, as part of the periodic payment process for previously awarded grants or contracts. To secure binding acceptance in this manner is of questionable propriety and almost certainly will be challenged in the courts.

The U.S. Congress, not OMB, has the authority to determine legislative guidelines for issuing regulations by the executive branch. The proposed revisions for Circular A-122 go substantially beyond any current statutory or appropriations restrictions placed on the methods by which grantees can seek to meet the objectives of a grant program. OMB lacks the authority to legislate by administrative action such wide-ranging restrictions and policies, absent a specific delegation of authority from Congress to do so. Congress has not done so.

When the Office of Management and Budget first published Circular A-122 in January 1983, thousands of negative comments followed, from both the public and Federal agencies. At that point, I would have thought, the OMB would have had the good sense to recognize the objections and withdraw this highly suspect proposal. The restrictions of Circular A-122 on the political expression of nonprofit organizations receiving Federal funds would be especially ill-advised at this time, when the millions of Americans represented by these groups feel themselves to be the target of Federal budget cuts. Surely, it is not unwise to restrict the avenues by which they seek to communicate their concerns to the Federal Government. The United States has always prided itself on its special freedoms to insure the exchange of views and information between Government and citizens. Any policy which would restrict or diminish this flow of information and ideas bears a heavy burden of proof. OMB has not offered such proof; the case has not been made.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 336—TO PROCLAIM CIRCLE K INTERNATIONAL WEEK

Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. BOREN, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. EVANS, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. NUNN, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. STENNIS, and Mr. TOWER) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 336

Whereas Circle K International is an organization of college students sponsored by Kiwanis International that provides a means for responsible community action by students;

Whereas Circle K International emphasizes the advantages the democratic way of life and provides the opportunity for leadership training in service;

Whereas Circle K International encourages the adoption and the application of high social, business, and professional standards;

Whereas Circle K International promotes the creation and maintenance of righteousness, justice, patriotism, and good will; and

Whereas the members of Circle K International are presently involved in service projects to help families in need of support under the theme, "Achieve Unity Through Service"; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the week of February 5, 1984, through February 11, 1984, be proclaimed as "Circle K International Week."

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas is today submitting a resolution to proclaim the week of February 5 through February 11, 1984, "Circle K International Week."

Circle K International began as a university fraternity in 1936 with the sponsorship of the Pullman, Wash., Kiwanis Club. The organization became international in 1955, under the sponsorship of Kiwanis International. Today, with more than 6,000 members of nearly 800 clubs in 6 countries, it is the world's largest collegiate service organization and still growing.

For nearly half a century, Circle K International has given college students an opportunity to help those in need, and renders a valuable service to our society. The goals of these young people are admirable, and their actions are commendable. Whether working on behalf of Older Americans, teenagers, families, or handicapped citizens in need of assistance, this organization has its heart and soul in the right place—wherever help is needed.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas introduced similar resolutions last year and 2 years previous. It is my hope that my colleagues will again join in this worthy effort, and proclaim the week of February 5, "Circle K International Week."

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

BAIL REFORM ACT

THURMOND AMENDMENT NO. 2694

Mr. THURMOND proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 215) to amend the Bail Reform Act of 1966 to permit consideration of danger to the community in setting pretrial release conditions, to expand the list of statutory release conditions, to establish a more appropriate basis for deciding on postconviction release, and for other purposes; as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Bail Reform Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) Sections 3141 through 3151 of title 18, Unitd States Code, are repealed and the following new sections are inserted in lieu thereof:

"§ 3141. Release and detention authority generally

"(a) PENDING TRIAL.—A judicial officer who is authorized to order the arrest of a person pursuant to section 3041 of this title shall order that an arrested person who is brought before him be released or detained, pending judicial proceedings, pursuant to the provisions of this chapter.

"(b) PENDING SENTENCE OR APPEAL.—A judicial officer of a court of original jurisdiction over an offense, or a judicial officer of a Federal appellate court, shall order that, pending imposition or execution of sentence, or pending appeal of conviction or sentence, a person be released or detained pursuant to the provisions of this chapter.

"§ 3142. Release or detention of a defendant pending trial

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Upon the appearance before a judicial officer of a person charged with an offense, the judicial officer shall issue an order that, pending trial, the person be—

"(1) released on his personal recognizance or upon execution of an unsecured appearance bond, pursuant to the provisions of subsection (b);

"(2) released on a condition or combination of conditions pursuant to the provisions of subsection (c);

"(3) temporarily detained to permit revocation of conditional release, deportation, or exclusion pursuant to the provisions of subsection (d); or

"(4) detained pursuant to the provisions of subsection (e).

"(b) RELEASE ON PERSONAL RECOGNIZANCE OR UNSECURED APPEARANCE BOND.—The judicial officer shall order the pretrial release of the person on his personal recognizance, or upon execution of an unsecured appearance bond in an amount specified by the court, subject to the condition that the person not commit a Federal, State, or local crime during the period of his release, unless the judicial officer determines that such release will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required or will endanger the safety of any other person or the community.

"(c) RELEASE ON CONDITIONS.—If the judicial officer determines that the release described in subsection (b) will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required or will endanger the safety of any other person or the community, he shall order the pretrail release of the person—

"(1) subject to the condition that the person not commit a Federal, State, or local crime during the period of release; and

"(2) subject to the least restrictive further condition, or combination of conditions, that he determines will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community, which may include the condition that the person—

"(A) remain in the custody of a designated person, who agrees to supervise him and to report any violation of a release condition to the court, if the designated person is able reasonably to assure the judicial officer that the person will appear as required and will not pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community;

"(B) maintain employment, or, if unemployed, actively seek employment;

"(C) maintain or commence an educational program;

"(D) abide by specified restrictions on his personal associations, place of abode, or travel;

"(E) avoid all contact with an alleged victim of the crime and with a potential witness who may testify concerning the offense;

"(F) report on a regular basis to a designated law enforcement agency, pretrial services agency, or other agency;

"(G) comply with a specified curfew;

"(H) refrain from possessing a firearm, destructive device, or other dangerous weapon;

"(I) refrain from excessive use of alcohol, or any use of a narcotic drug or other controlled substance, as defined in section 102 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 802), without a prescription by a licensed medical practitioner;

"(J) undergo available medical or psychiatric treatment, including treatment for drug or alcohol dependency, and remain in a specified institution if required for that purpose;

"(K) execute an agreement to forfeit upon failing to appear as required, such designated property, including money, as is reasonably necessary to assure the appearance of the person as required, and post with the court such indicia of ownership of the property or such percentage of the money as the judicial officer may specify;

"(L) execute a bail bond with solvent sureties in such amount as is reasonably necessary to assure the appearance of the person as required;

"(M) return to custody for specified hours following release for employment, schooling, or other limited purposes; and

"(N) satisfy any other condition that is reasonably necessary to assure the appearance of the person as required and to assure the safety of any other person and the community.

The judicial officer may not impose a financial condition that results in the pretrial detention of the person. The judicial officer may at any time amend his order to impose additional or different conditions of release.

"(d) TEMPORARY DETENTION TO PERMIT REVOCATION OF CONDITIONAL RELEASE, DEPORTATION, OR EXCLUSION.—If the judicial officer determines that—

"(1) the person—

"(A) is, and was at the time the offense was committed, on—

"(i) release pending trial for a felony under Federal, State, or local law;

"(ii) release pending imposition or execution of sentence, appeal of sentence or conviction, or completion of sentence, for any offense under Federal, State, or local law; or

"(iii) probation or parole for any offense under Federal, State, or local law; or

"(B) is not a citizen of the United States or lawfully admitted for permanent residence, as defined in section 101(a)(20) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(20)); and

"(2) the person may flee or pose a danger to any other person or the community;

he shall order the detention of the person, for a period of not more than ten days, excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays, and direct the attorney for the Government to notify the appropriate court, probation or parole official, or State or local law enforcement official, or the appropriate official of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. If the official fails or declines to take the person into custody during that period, the person shall be treated in accordance with the other provisions of this section, notwithstanding the applicability of other provisions of law governing release pending trial or deportation or exclusion proceedings. If temporary detention is sought under paragraph (1)(B), the person has the burden of proving to the court that he is a citizen of the United States or is lawfully admitted for permanent residence.

"(e) DETENTION.—If, after a hearing pursuant to the provisions of subsection (f), the judicial officer finds that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community, he shall order the detention of the person prior to trial. In a case described in (f)(1), a rebuttable presumption arises that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the safety of any other person and the community if the judge finds that—

"(1) the person has been convicted of a Federal offense that is described in subsection (f)(1), or of a State or local offense that would have been an offense described in subsection (f)(1) if a circumstance giving rise to Federal jurisdiction had existed;

"(2) the offense described in paragraph (1) was committed while the person was on release pending trial for a Federal, State, or local offense; and

"(3) a period of not more than five years has elapsed since the date of conviction, or the release of the person from imprisonment, for the offense described in paragraph (1), whichever is later.

Subject to rebuttal by the person, it shall be presumed that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of the community if the judicial officer finds that there is probable cause to believe that the person committed an offense for which a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years or more is prescribed in the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 801 et seq.), the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 951 et seq.), section 1 of the Act of September 15, 1980 (21 U.S.C. 955a), or an offense under section 924(c) of title 18 of the United States Code.

"(f) DETENTION HEARING.—The judicial officer shall hold a hearing to determine whether any condition or combination of conditions set forth in subsection (c) will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community in a case—

"(1) upon motion of the attorney for the Government, that involves—

"(A) a crime of violence;

"(B) an offense for which the maximum sentence is life imprisonment or death;

"(C) an offense for which a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years or more is prescribed in the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 801 et seq.), the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 951 et seq.), or section 1 of the Act of September 15, 1980 (21 U.S.C. 955a); or

"(D) any felony committed after the person had been convicted of two or more prior offenses described in subparagraphs (A) through (C), or two or more State or local offenses that would have been offenses described in subparagraphs (A) through (C) if a circumstance giving rise to Federal jurisdiction had existed; or

"(2) Upon motion of the attorney for the Government or upon the judicial officer's own motion, that involves—

"(A) a serious risk that the person will flee;

"(B) a serious risk that the person will obstruct or attempt to obstruct justice, or threaten, injure, or intimidate, or attempt to threaten, injure, or intimidate, a prospective witness or juror.

The hearing shall be held immediately upon the person's first appearance before the judicial officer unless that person, or the attorney for the Government, seeks a continuance. Except for good cause, a continuance on motion of the person may not exceed five days, and a continuance on motion of the attorney for the Government may not exceed three days. During a continuance, the person shall be detained, and the judicial officer, on motion of the attorney for the Government or on his own motion, may order that, while in custody, a person who appears to be a narcotics addict receive a medical examination to determine whether he is an addict. At the hearing, the person has the right to be represented by counsel, and, if he is financially unable to obtain adequate representation, to have counsel appointed for him. The person shall be afforded an opportunity to testify, to present witnesses on his own behalf, to cross-examine witnesses who appear at the hearing, and to present information by proffer or otherwise. The rules concerning admissibility of evidence in criminal trials do not apply to the presentation and consideration of information at the hearing. The facts the judicial officer uses to support a finding pursuant to subsection (e) that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the safety of any other person and the community shall be supported by clear and convincing evidence. The person may be detained pending completion of the hearing.

"(g) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED.—The judicial officer shall, in determining whether there are conditions of release that will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community, take into account the available information concerning—

"(1) the nature and circumstances of the offense charged, including whether the offense is a crime of violence or involves a narcotic drug;

"(2) the weight of the evidence against the person;

"(3) the history and characteristics of the person, including—

"(A) his character, physical and mental condition, family ties, employment, financial resources, length of residence in the community, community ties, past conduct, history relating to drug or alcohol abuse, criminal history, and record concerning appearance at court proceedings; and

"(B) whether, at the time of the current offense or arrest, he was on probation, on parole, or on other release pending trial, sentencing, appeal, or completion of sentence for an offense under Federal, State, or local law; and

"(4) the nature and seriousness of the danger to any person or the community that would be posed by the person's release. In considering the conditions of release described in subsection (c)(2)(K) or (c)(2)(L), the judicial officer may upon his own motion, or shall upon the motion of the Government, conduct an inquiry into the source of the property to be designated for potential forfeiture or offered as collateral to secure a bond, and shall decline to accept the designation, or the use as collateral, of property that, because of its source, will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required.

"(h) CONTENTS OF RELEASE ORDER.—In a release order issued pursuant to the provisions of subsection (b) or (c), the judicial officer shall—

"(1) include a written statement that sets forth all the conditions to which the release is subject, in a manner sufficiently clear and specific to serve as a guide for the person's conduct; and

"(2) advise the person of—

"(A) the penalties for violating a condition of release, including the penalties for committing an offense while on pretrial release;

"(B) the consequences of violating a condition of release, including the immediate issuance of a warrant for the person's arrest; and

"(C) the provisions of sections 1503 of this title (relating to intimidation of witnesses, jurors, and officers of the court), 1510 (relating to obstruction of criminal investigations), 1512 (tampering with a witness, victim, or an informant), and 1513 (retaliating against a witness, victim, or an informant).

"(i) CONTENTS OF DETENTION ORDER.—In a detention order issued pursuant to the provisions of subsection (e), the judicial officer shall—

"(1) include written findings of fact and a written statement of the reasons for the detention;

"(2) direct that the person be committed to the custody of the Attorney General for confinement in a corrections facility separate, to the extent practicable, from persons awaiting or serving sentences or being held in custody pending appeal;

"(4) direct that the person be afforded reasonable opportunity for private consultation with his counsel; and

"(3) direct that, on order of a court of the United States or on request of an attorney for the Government, the person in charge of the corrections facility in which the person is confined deliver the person to a United States marshal for the purpose of an appearance in connection with a court proceeding.

The judicial officer may, by subsequent order, permit the temporary release of the person, in the custody of a United States marshal or another appropriate person, to the extent that the judicial officer determines such release to be necessary for preparation of the person's defense or for another compelling reason.

"(j) PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE.—Nothing in this section shall be construed as modifying or limiting the presumption of innocence.

"§ 3143. Release or detention of a defendant pending sentence or appeal

"(a) RELEASE OR DETENTION PENDING SENTENCE.—The judicial officer shall order that a person who has been found guilty of an offense and who is waiting imposition or execution of sentence, be detained, unless the judicial officer finds by clear and convincing evidence that the person is not likely to flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community if released pursuant to section 3142 (b) or (c). If the judicial officer makes such a finding, he shall order the release of the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142 (b) or (c).

"(b) RELEASE OR DETENTION PENDING APPEAL BY THE DEFENDANT.—The judicial officer shall order that a person who has been found guilty of an offense and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, and who has filed an appeal or a petition for a writ of certiorari, be detained, unless the judicial officer finds—

"(1) by clear and convincing evidence that the person is not likely to flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community if released pursuant to section 3142 (b) or (c); and

"(2) that the appeal is not for purpose of delay and raises a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in reversal or an order for a new trial.

If the judicial officer makes such findings, he shall order the release of the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142(b) or (c).

"(c) RELEASE OR DETENTION PENDING APPEAL BY THE GOVERNMENT.—The judicial officer shall treat a defendant in a case in which an appeal has been taken by the United States pursuant to the provisions of section 3731 of this title, in accordance with the provisions of section 3142, unless the defendant is otherwise subject to a release or detention order.

"§ 3144. Release or detention of a material witness

"If it appears from an affidavit filed by a party that the testimony of a person is material in a criminal proceeding, and if it is shown that it may become impracticable to secure the presence of the person by subpena, a judicial officer may order the arrest of the person and treat the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142. No material witness may be detained because of inability to comply with any condition of release if the testimony of such witness can adequately be secured by deposition, and if further detention is not necessary to prevent a failure of justice. Release of a material witness may be delayed for a reasonable period of time until the deposition of the witness can be taken pursuant to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

"§ 3145. Review and appeal of a release or detention order

"(a) REVIEW OF A RELEASE ORDER.—If a person is ordered released by a magistrate, or by a person other than a judge of a court having original jurisdiction over the offense and other than a Federal appellate court—

"(1) the attorney for the Government may file, with the court having original jurisdiction over the offense, a motion for revocation of the order or amendment of the conditions of release; and

"(2) the person may file, with the court having original jurisdiction over the offense, a motion for amendment of the conditions of release.

The motion shall be determined promptly.

"(b) REVIEW OF A DETENTION ORDER.—If a person is ordered detained by a magistrate, or by a person other than a judge of a court having original jurisdiction over the offense and other than a Federal appellate court, the person may file, with the court having original jurisdiction over the offense, a motion for revocation or amendment of the order. The motion shall be determined promptly.

"(c) APPEAL FROM A RELEASE OR DETENTION ORDER.—An appeal from a release or detention order, or from a decision denying revocation or amendment of such an order, is governed by the provisions of section 1291 of title 28 and section 3731 of this title. The appeal shall be determined promptly.

"§ 3146. Penalty for failure to appear

"(a) OFFENSE.—A person commits an offense if, after having been released pursuant to this chapter—

"(1) he knowingly fails to appear before a court as required by the conditions of his release; or

"(2) he knowingly fails to surrender for service of sentence pursuant to a court order.

"(b) GRADING.—If the person was released—

"(1) in connection with a charge of, or while awaiting sentence, surrender for service of sentence, or appeal or certiorari after conviction, for—

"(A) an offense punishable by death, life imprisonment, or imprisonment for a term of fifteen years or more, he shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned for not more than ten years, or both;

"(B) an offense punishable by imprisonment for a term of five or more years, but less than fifteen years, he shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both;

"(C) any other felony, he shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; or

"(D) a misdemeanor, he shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both; or

"(2) for appearance as a material witness, he shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

A term of imprisonment imposed pursuant to this section shall be consecutive to the sentence of imprisonment for any other offense.

"(c) AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE.—It is an affirmative defense to a prosecution under this section that uncontrollable circumstances prevented the person from appearing or surrendering, and that the person did not contribute to the creation of such circumstances in reckless disregard of the requirement that he appear or surrender, and that he appeared or surrendered as soon as such circumstances ceased to exist.

"(d) DECLARATION OF FORFEITURE.—If a person fails to appear before a court as required, and the person executed an appearance bond pursuant to section 3142(b) or is subject to the release condition set forth in section 3142(c)(2)(K), or (c)(2)(L), the judicial officer may, regardless of whether the person has been charged with an offense under this section, declare any property designated pursuant to that section to be forfeited to the United States.

"§ 3147. Penalty for an offense committed while on release

"A person convicted of an offense committed while released pursuant to this chapter shall be sentenced, in addition to the sentence prescribed for the offense to—

"(1) a term of imprisonment of not less than two years and not more than ten years if the offense is a felony; or

"(2) a term of imprisonment of not less than ninety days and not more than one year if the offense is a misdemeanor.

A term of imprisonment imposed pursuant to this section shall be consecutive to any other sentence of imprisonment.

"§ 3148. Sanctions for violation of a release condition

"(a) AVAILABLE SANCTIONS.—A person who has been released pursuant to the provisions of section 3142, and who has violated a condition of his release, is subject to a revocation of release, an order of detention, and a prosecution for contempt of court.

"(b) REVOCATION OF RELEASE.—The attorney for the Government may initiate a proceeding for revocation of an order of release by filing a motion with the district court. A judicial officer may issue a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with violating a condition of release, and the person shall be brought before a judicial officer in the district in which his arrest was ordered for a proceeding in accordance with this section. To the extent practicable, a person charged with violating the condition of his release that he not commit a Federal, State, or local crime during the period of release shall be brought before the judicial officer who ordered the release and whose order is alleged to have been violated. The judicial officer shall enter an order of revocation and detention if, after a hearing, the judicial officer—

"(1) finds that there is—

"(A) probable cause to believe that the person has committed a Federal, State, or local crime while on release; or

"(B) clear and convincing evidence that the person has violated any other condition of his release; and

"(2) finds that—

"(A) based on the factors set forth in section 3142(g), there is no condition or combination of conditions of release that will assure that the person will not flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community; or

"(B) the person is unlikely to abide by any condition or combination of conditions of release.

If there is probable cause to believe that, while on release, the person committed a Federal, State, or local felony, a rebuttable presumption arises that no condition or combination of conditions will assure that the person will not pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community. If the judicial officer finds that there are conditions of release that will assure that the person will not flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community, and that the person will abide by such conditions, he shall treat the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142 and may amend the conditions of release accordingly.

"(c) PROSECUTION FOR CONTEMPT.—The judge may commence a prosecution for contempt, pursuant to the provisions of section 401, if the person has violated a condition of his release.

"§ 3149. Surrender of an offender by a surety

"A person charged with an offense, who is released upon the execution of an appearance bond with a surety, may be arrested by the surety, and if so arrested, shall be delivered promptly to a United States marshal and brought before a judicial officer. The judicial officer shall determine in accordance with the provisions of section 3148(b) whether to revoke the release of the person, and may absolve the surety of responsibility to pay all or part of the bond in accordance with the provisions of Rule 46 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The person so committed shall be held in official detention until released pursuant to this chapter or another provision of law.

"§ 3150. Applicability to a case removed from a State court

"The provisions of this chapter apply to a criminal case removed to a Federal court from a State court.".

(b) Section 3154 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in subsection (1), by striking out "and recommend appropriate release conditions for each such person" and inserting in lieu thereof "and, where appropriate, include a recommendation as to whether such individual should be released or detained and, if release is recommended, recommend appropriate conditions of release"; and

(2) in subsection (2), by striking out "section 3146(e) or section 3147" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 3145".

(c) Section 3156(a) of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "3146" and inserting in lieu thereof "3141";

(2) in paragraph (1)—

(A) by striking out "bail or otherwise" and inserting in lieu thereof "detain or"; and

(B) by deleting "and" at the end thereof;

(3) in paragraph (2), by striking out the period at the end and inserting in lieu thereof "; and";

(4) by adding after paragraph (2) the following new paragraphs:

"(3) The term 'felony' means an offense punishable by a maximum term of imprisonment of more than one year; and

"(4) The term 'crime of violence' means—

"(A) an offense that has as an element of the offense the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another; or

"(B) any other offense that is a felony and that, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense."; and

(5) in subsection (b)(1), by striking out "bail or otherwise" and inserting in lieu thereof "detain or".

(d) The item relating to chapter 207 in the analysis of part II of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"207. Release and detention pending judicial proceedings..... 3141".

(e)(1) The caption of chapter 207 is amended to read as follows:

"CHAPTER 207—RELEASE AND DETENTION PENDING JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS".

(2) The section analysis for chapter 207 is amended by striking out the items relating to section 3141 through 3151 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"3141. Release and detention authority generally.
"3142. Release or detention of a defendant pending trial.
"3143. Release or detention of a defendant pending sentence or appeal.
"3144. Release or detention of a material witness.
"3145. Review and appeal of a release or detention order.
"3146. Penalty for failure to appear.
"3147. Penalty for an offense committed while on release.
"3148. Sanctions for violation of a release condition.
"3149. Surrender of an offender by a surety.
"3150. Applicability to a case removed from a State court."

SEC. 3. Chapter 203 of title 18, United States Code, is amended as follows:

(a) The last sentence of section 3041 is amended by striking out "determining to hold the prisoner for trial" and inserting in lieu thereof "determining, pursuant to the provisions of section 3142 of this title, whether to detain or conditionally release the prisoner prior to trial".

(b) The second paragraph of section 3042 is amended by striking out "imprisoned or admitted to bail" and inserting in lieu thereof "detained or conditionally released pursuant to section 3142 of this title".

(c) Section 3043 is repealed.

(d) The following new section is added after section 3061:

"§ 3062. General arrest authority for violation of release conditions

"A law enforcement officer, who is authorized to arrest for an offense committed in his presence, may arrest a person who is released pursuant to chapter 207 if the officer has reasonable grounds to believe that the person is violating, in his presence, a condition imposed on the person pursuant to section 3142 (c)(2)(D), (c)(2)(E), (c)(2)(H), (c)(2)(I), or (c)(2)(M), or, if the violation involves a failure to remain in a specified institution as required, a condition imposed pursuant to section 3142(c)(2)(J).".

(e) The section analysis is amended—

(1) by amending the item relating to section 3043 to read as follows:

"3043. Repealed."; and

(2) by adding the following new item after the item relating to section 3061:

"3062. General arrest authority for violation of release conditions.".

SEC. 4. Section 3731 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after the second paragraph the following new paragraph:

"An appeal by the United States shall lie to a court of appeals from a decision or order, entered by a district court of the United States, granting the release of a person charged with or convicted of an offense, or denying a motion for revocation of, or modification of the conditions of, a decision or order granting release.".

SEC. 5. The second paragraph of section 3772 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out "bail" and inserting in lieu thereof "release pending appeal."

SEC. 6. Section 4282 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(a) by striking out "and not admitted to bail" and substituting "and detained pursuant to chapter 207"; and

(b) by striking out "and unable to make bail".

SEC. 7. Section 636 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking out "impose conditions of release under section 3146 of title 18" and inserting in lieu thereof "issue orders pursuant to section 3142 of title 18 concerning release or detention of persons pending trial".

SEC. 8. The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure are amended as follows:

(a) Rule 5(c) is amended by striking out "shall admit the defendant to bail" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall detain or conditionally release the defendant".

(b) The second sentence of rule 15(a) is amended by striking out "committed for failure to give bail to appear to testify at a trial or hearing" and inserting in lieu thereof "detained pursuant to section 3144 of title 18, United States Code".

(c) Rule 40(f) is amended to read as follows:

"(f) RELEASE OR DETENTION.—If a person was previously detained or conditionally released, pursuant to chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, in another district where a warrant, information or indictment issued, the Federal magistrate shall take into account the decision previously made and the reasons set forth therefor, if any, but will not be bound by that decision. If the Federal magistrate amends the release or detention decision or alters the conditions of release, he shall set forth the reasons for his action in writing.".

(d) Rule 46 is amended—

(1) in subdivision (a), by striking out "§ 3146, § 3148, or ¶ 3149" and inserting in lieu thereof "§§ 3142 and 3144";

(2) in subdivision (c), by striking out "3148" and inserting in lieu thereof "3143";

(3) by amending subdivision (e)(2) to read as follows:

"(2) SETTING ASIDE.—The court may direct that a forfeiture be set aside in whole or in part, upon such conditions as the court may impose, if a person released upon execution of an appearance bond with a surety is subsequently surrendered by the surety into custody or if it otherwise appears that justice does not require the forfeiture."; and

(4) by adding the following new subdivision at the end thereof:

"(h) FORFEITURE OF PROPERTY.—

"Nothing in this rule or in chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, shall prevent the court from disposing of any charge by entering an order directing forfeiture of property pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 3142(c)(2)(K) if the value of the property is an amount that would be an appropriate sentence after conviction of the offense charged and if such forfeiture is authorized by statute or regulation.".

(e) Rule 54(b)(3) is amended by striking out "under 18 U.S.C. § 3043, and".

SEC. 9. Rule 9(c) of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure is amended by striking out "3148" and inserting in lieu thereof "3143", and following the word "community", inserting "and that the appeal is not for purpose of delay and raises a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in reversal or in an order for a new trial".

MITCHELL (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 2695

Mr. MITCHELL (for himself, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. CRANSTON) proposed an amendment to the bill S. 215, supra; as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

"SEC. 10. Section 3164 of title 18, United States Code is amended—

(a) by striking in subsection (b) the phrases "(a)(1) or" and "continuous detention or";

(b) by striking in subsection (c) the words "ninety day", and inserting in lieu thereof "sixty day";

(c) by relettering subsection (c) as subsection (d); and

(d) by inserting a new subsection (c) as follows:

(c) The trial of any person described in subsection (a)(1) of this section shall commence not later than sixty days following the beginning of such continuous detention. The periods of delay enumerated in section 3161(h) are excluded in computing the time limitation specified in this section."

CRIMINAL AND CIVIL FOREFEITURE

BIDEN AMENDMENT NO. 2696

Mr. BIDEN proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 948) to reform Federal criminal and civil forfeiture; as follows:

On page 36, line 19, delete "1983" and insert in lieu thereof "1984".

On page 48, line 21, delete "section 413" and insert in lieu thereof "sections 413 and 414".

On page 60, delete the quotation mark and second period on line 11, and insert after line 11 the following:

"'(p) The provisions of this section shall be liberally construed to effectuate its remedial purposes.'.".

On page 60, insert before line 12 the following:

"'INVESTMENT OF ILLICIT DRUG PROFITS

"'SEC. 414. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person who has received any income derived, directly or indirectly, from a violation of this title or title III punishable by imprisonment for more than one year in which such person has participated as a principal within the meaning of section 2 of title 18, United States Code, to use or invest, directly or indirectly, any part of such income, or the proceeds of such income, in acquisition of any interest in, or the establishment or operation of, any enterprise which is engaged in, or the activities of which affect, interstate or foreign commerce. A purchase of securities on the open market for purposes of investment, and without the intention of controlling or participating in the control of the issuer, or of assisting another to do so, shall not be unlawful under this section if the securities of the issuer held by the purchaser, the members of his immediate family, and his or their accomplices in any violation of this title or title III after such purchase do not amount in the aggregate to one percent of the outstanding securities of any one class, and do not confer, either in law or in fact, the power to elect one or more directors of the issuer.

"'(b) Whoever violates this section shall be fined not more than [$50,000] or imprisoned nor more than [ten] years, or both.

"'(c) As used in this section, the term 'enterprise' includes any individual, partnership, corporation, association, or other legal entity, and any union or group of individuals associated in fact although not a legal entity.

"'(d) The provisions of this section shall be liberally construed to effectuate its remedial purposes.'.".

On page 62, line 11, delete "remove" and insert in lieu thereof "and remove".

On page 62, delete the quotation mark and second period on line 23, and insert after line 23 the following:

"'(j) In addition to the venue provided for in section 1395 of title 28, United States Code, or any other provision of law, in the case of property of a defendant charged with a violation that is the basis for forfeiture of the property under this section, a proceeding for forfeiture under this section may be brought in the judicial district in which the defendant owning such property is found or in the judicial district in which the criminal prosecution is brought.'.".

On page 63, line 13, delete "item" and insert in lieu thereof "items".

On page 63, delete the item after line 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"'Sec. 413. Criminal forfeitures.
"'Sec. 414. Investment of illicit drug profits.'.".

On page 64, insert after line 2 the following:

"(b) Section 511(e) of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 881(e)) is amended by inserting before 'The proceeds from any sale under paragraph (2)' the following: 'The Attorney General shall ensure the equitable transfer pursuant to paragraph (1) of any forfeited property to the appropriate State or local law enforcement agency so as to reflect generally the contribution of any such agency participating directly in any of the acts which led to the seizure or forfeiture of such property. A decision by the Attorney General pursuant to paragraph (1) shall not be subject to review.'.".

On page 64, line 3, delete "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof "(c)".

On page 64, line 8, delete "subsection (j) of this section" and insert in lieu thereof "section 524(c) of title 28, United States Code".

On page 64, delete line 9 and all that follows through line 13 on page 67, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 302. Section 524 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"'(c)(1) There is established in the United States Treasury a special fund to be known as the Department of Justice Assets Forfeiture Fund (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as the "fund") which shall be available to the Attorney General without fiscal year limitation in such amounts as may be specified in Appropriations Acts for the following purposes of the Department of Justice:

"'(A) the payment, at the discretion of the Attorney General, of any expenses necessary to seize, detain, inventory, safeguard, maintain, advertise, or sell property under seizure, detention, or forfeited pursuant to any law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice, or of any other necessary expenses incident to the seizure, detention, or forfeiture of such property; such payments may include payments for contract services and payments to reimburse any Federal, State, or local agency for any expenditures made to perform the foregoing functions;

"'(B) the payment of awards for information or assistance leading to a civil or criminal forfeiture under the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 800 et seq.) or a criminal forfeiture under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations statute (18 U.S.C. 1961 et seq.), at the discretion of the Attorney General;

"'(C) the compromise and payment of valid liens and mortgages against property that has been forfeited pursuant to any law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice, subject to the discretion of the Attorney General to determine the validity of any such lien or mortgage and the amount of payment to be made; and

"'(D) disbursements authorized in connection with remission or mitigation procedures relating to property forfeited under any law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice.

"'(2) Any award paid from the fund for information concerning a forfeiture, as provided in paragraph (1)(B), shall be paid at the discretion of the Attorney General or his delegate, except that the authority to pay an award of $10,000 or more shall not be delegated to any person other than the Deputy Attorney General, the Associate Attorney General, the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, or the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration. Any award for such information shall not exceed the lesser of $150,000 or one quarter of the amount realized by the United States from the property forfeited.

"'(3) There shall be deposited in the fund all amounts from the forfeiture of property under any law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice remaining after the payment of expenses for forfeiture and sale authorized by law.

"'(4) Amounts in the fund which are not currently needed for the purpose of this section shall be kept on deposit or invested in obligations of, or guaranteed by, the United States.

"'(5) The Attorney General shall transmit to the Congress, not later than four months after the end of each fiscal year a detailed report on the amounts deposited in the fund and a description of expenditures made under this subsection.

"'(6) The provisions of this subsection relating to deposits in the fund shall apply to all property in the custody of the Department of Justice on or after the effective date of the Comprehensive Forfeiture Act of 1983.

"'(7) For fiscal years 1984, 1985, 1986, and 1987, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for the purposes described in paragraph (1). At the end of each fiscal year, any amount in the fund in excess of the amount appropriated shall be deposited in the General Fund of the Treasury of the United States, except that an amount not to exceed $5,000,000 may be carried forward and available for appropriation in the next fiscal year.

"'(8) For the purposes of this subsection, property is forfeited pursuant to a law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice if it is forfeited pursuant to—

"'(A) any criminal forfeiture proceeding;

"'(B) any civil judicial forfeiture proceeding; or

"'(C) any civil administrative forfeiture proceeding conducted by the Department of Justice; except to the extent that the seizure was effected by a Customs officer or that custody was maintained by the Customs Service in which case the provisions of section 613a of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1613a) shall apply.'.".

On page 72, insert after line 17 the following:

"The Secretary of the Treasury shall ensure the equitable transfer pursuant to paragraph (2) of any forfeited property to the appropriate State or local law enforcement agency so as to reflect generally the contribution of any such agency participating directly in any of the acts which led to the seizure or forfeiture of such property. A decision by the Secretary pursuant to paragraph (2) shall not be subject to review."

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

REPEAL OF SENATE PAY RAISE

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, S. 2211 seeks to repeal a pay raise that represents the worst of both worlds. The 3.5-percent increase that went into effect on January 1 has still failed to produce a reasonable salary for Members of this body—it was neither reasonable enough in amount to compensate Senators for the expenses that attend this office nor reasonably calculated to insure that Members in the future will be drawn from all walks of life regardless of their economic means. And the unwise and unconstitutional limitation on honoraria that also went into effect on January 1 has only made the situation worse.

Yet this pay raise was not merely inadequate. It was also introduced through the legislative back door, without the knowledge of many Senators and without ever having come to this floor for a vote. This insult to the American public only compounds the financial injury to Congress that has resulted from our failure to devise a rational approach to the issue of compensation. Our 3.5 percent, back door pay increase richly deserved to be repealed, and I therefore voted in favor of S. 2211.●

COMPREHENSIVE TRADE REFORM ACT

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, last November I joined Senators HEINZ and MOYNIHAN in introducing S. 2139, the Comprehensive Trade Law Reform Act of 1983. This bill includes several modifications in our trade remedy laws as a response to the many international challenges U.S. industry now faces.

Congress last acted in this area in 1979, when it approved the Trade Agreements Act. Since then we have had the opportunity to determine how closely the implementation of this act has followed Congress intent in passing that legislation.

The provisions of S. 2139 respond to the need to make our trade remedies more effective for domestic petitioners. Changes are proposed in the antidumping and countervailing duty laws and sections 201 and 301 of the Trade Act of 1974. These are the major statutes used to respond to unfair foreign practices and to provide temporary relief from high levels of imports. S. 2139 would make these remedies less complex and costly to use and would provide relief in a more timely manner. The bill would also strengthen current laws in order to respond more effectivley to specific unfair practices, including industrial targeting.

There is substantial support for comprehensive trade law reform. I would like to include in the RECORD a resolution approved by the National League of Cities in support of this effort.

The resolution follows:

PROPOSED RESOLUTION—COMPREHENSIVE TRADE LAW REFORM LEGISLATION

Whereas the United States experienced a $43 billion merchandise trade deficit in 1982 which is expected to reach nearly $80 billion this year and $100 billion in 1984; and

Whereas the United States laws providing remedies for dumping, subsidization, targeting and other unfair trade practices have not provided an effective deterrent to the proliferation of foreign unfair trade practices with respect to both U.S. exports, and U.S. "escape clause" statute has not provided effective relief with respect to imports which cause injury to U.S. workers and producers; and

Whereas serious injury to America's urban economies, in the form of reduced employment and both temporary and permanent plan closings, has resulted from inadequate U.S. trade laws and ineffective trade laws enforcement; and

Whereas the Comprehensive Trade Law Reform Act of 1983 has been introduced in the 98th Congress with the support of a broad coalition of U.S. industry and labor organizations known as the Trade Reform Action Coalition in order to provide for comprehensive trade law reforms which would make existing U.S. laws less complex, less expensive, less arbitrary, more expeditious, more fair and more effective for all petitioners; now, therefore, be it

Resolved That the National League of Cities does hereby express its deep concern over the impact of increasing U.S. merchandise trade deficits on the economies of U.S. urban areas and over the inability of present U.S. trade laws to deter foreign unfair trade practices, to establish fair and equitable conditions of competition in U.S. domestic and export markets, and to provide effective relief from imports which cause serious injury; be it further

Resolved, That the National League of Cities urges the Congress to enact comprehensive trade law reform legislation.●

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET AND REGULATORY REFORM

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, Congress received the President's budget message Wednesday. In it he described the improved prospects for the Nation's economy as a result of policies to streamline the scope of Government and simplify or eliminate burdensome regulations. Already this administration has instituted procedures, under Executive Order 12291, to make new rules as cost-effective as possible and to screen out hundreds of ill-conceived proposals that would require massive expenditures in the private sector for very little public gain.

Administrative actions under this Executive order are largely responsible for reversing the growth of Federal regulations and making regulatory agencies consider more carefully the need for and the alternatives to proposed rules. There is no doubt that these policies have contributed much to the economic recovery we are now experiencing. However this situation could be reversed at some time in the future when the Nation's leaders may have different priorities and less understanding of the burden of regulation on our free enterprise system.

The President's message insists that these improvements be enacted into law. I could not agree more. His strong statement on regulatory reform says:

"Individual regulatory decisions will always be contentious and controversial, but surely we can all agree on the general need for regulatory reform. Making each Government rule as cost-effective as possible benefits everyone and strengthens the individual regulatory statutes. Regulation has become such an important role of the Federal Government that strong and balanced central oversight is becoming a necessity and a bipartisan objective. The Laxalt/Leahy Regulatory Reform Act, which passed the Senate unanimously in 1982, would have accomplished this reform." And he continues by stating ". . . I strongly urge the Congress to take up and pass similar legislation this year."

I am pleased that President Reagan has taken this means to express support for the Laxalt/Leahy Regulatory Reform Act. Senator HEFLIN and I reintroduced S. 1080 early last year, exactly as it passed the Senate in March 1982 by a vote of 94 to 0. With more than half of the Senate listed as cosponsors, we expect this bill to be considered soon after the February recess.

This country must not be subjected again to the 1970's explosive growth of regulatory programs which sap the strength and the resources of the productive side of our economy. Many of these earlier regulations were promulgated without a proper basis in terms of research and evaluation, and only after the costs had been paid, did the questions arise. Certainly we need regulation to assure the protection of our environment and public health, to expose unfair business practices and protect the integrity of our markets, and to confine our public assistance programs to those for whom the help is essential. What we do not need is regulation based on groundless and unreasonable fears, unsubstantiated or isolated cases which do not call for a national response, and premises which simply call for asserting Government control over the private sector.

Congress bears the ultimate responsibility for regulatory programs. We are elected to make these difficult decisions, and we should not pass them on to nameless bureaucrats in order to avoid that responsibility. If we are not able to provide more specific guidance in statutes creating these agencies, in our budget and appropriations process, and in legislative oversight, then at least we should be willing to enact into law procedures that require careful analysis of proposed regulations, with ample opportunity for public input and full realization of the costs as well as the benefits likely to result.

In the aftermath of the unfortunate Supreme Court decision invalidating almost every form of legislative restraint on the power to enact regulations, many different forms of congressional review have been suggested. Some have been enacted or attached to various proposals, creating a confusing and probably unworkable system for curtailing the legislative power we have delegated to the agencies.

I have been studying this problem and expressing my concern over the failure to face the issue squarely. The Judiciary Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure, which I chair, has held 3 days of hearings clearly showing regulatory reform is still needed. We must find a strong constitutional method of striking down or forcing the reconsideration of regulatory proposals which we find objectionable or outside original legislative intent. My conclusion is that Congress must accept responsibility for enacting into law at least those rules which are to have a $100 million impact on the economy, or that have serious effects on more intangible factors such as the environment, productivity, and competition.

Consequently, Senator HEFLIN and I, along with a majority of the Judiciary Committee members, have proposed to amend section 13 of S. 1080 which now contains an unconstitutional procedure for disapproving agency rules. The amendment requires passage of a joint resolution of approval prior to the effectiveness of any "major rule" as defined in S. 1080. A joint resolution of disapproval is the available alternative for all other rules. Under our amendment all proposed final rules are submitted to Congress with a 90-day waiting period during which appropriate resolutions could be passed. Expedited procedures insure that no single Member or group could block the will of the majority or delay consideration.

The Administrative Practice and Procedure Subcommittee will hold a hearing on this proposal on Wednesday, February 8, 1984, at 10 a.m. We will hear testimony on this and other legislative veto proposals, and on regulatory reform in general. I invite my fellow Senators to take notice of this hearing and to participate if possible. In addition, I urge all of you to seriously consider this proposal as the most reasonable compromise between unrestrained bureaucratic rulemaking and the burdensome task of legislating more detailed instructions to regulatory agencies.●

OUR THANKS TO S. DILLON RIPLEY FOR 20 YEARS OF DISTINGUISHED SERVICE

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, it was 20 years ago this week—February 4, 1964—that S. Dillon Ripley became Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution. And, we are all much in his debt.

Secretary Ripley's intellect, vision, and hard work have altered the landscape of this Nation's Capital and the minds and imaginations of individual's around the world. He has set new standards which museums everywhere strive to emulate. In his words, museums should be "points of contact in a life-long process of renewal of personality, of curiosity, and of public enlightenment."

The Smithsonian was Mr. Ripley's natural habitat. A Ph. D. in Zoology from Harvard, several expeditions to the field, assistantships at the American Museum of Natural History and the Smithsonian, 18 years on the Yale faculty, and 4 as director of that university's Peabody Museum of Natural History clearly marked him as the rarest of "rarae aves." Here is a scholar and scientist willing and able to blend respect for nature's majesty with man's inquiring intellect.

His extensive contributions to scholarship, which include the definitive 10 volume, "Handbook of The Birds of India and Pakistan," and informed public discourse, by themselves, leave a trail of distinction. But these personal contributions must be measured against a series of prodigious public works: buildings, publications, new centers for study and festivals.

Twenty-six million people visited the Smithsonian last year, and consider for a moment what their choices included that did not exist 20 years ago: The Anacostia Neighborhood Museum, the renovated U.S. Patent Building, now the home of the National Museum of American Art and the National Portrait Gallery, and the Renwick, the Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden, the U.S. Air and Space Museum, the Museum of African Art, the Cooper-Hewitt Museum of Design and Decorative Arts in New York City, and the now under construction Quadrangle project, a study and exhibition space for African, Near Eastern, and Asian art and culture.

Always the concerned scientist and engaged humanist, Secretary Ripley aided scholarship in a wide variety of disciplines. New centers—the Chesapeake Bay Center for Environmental Studies, the Astrophysical Observatory and Multiple Mirror Telescope, the Tropical Research Institute, the Museum Support Center, and the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars—proliferated and with them the centrality of the Smithsonian to the world of a mind. Indeed, this prominence is exemplified by the Secretary's magnanimity and sense of the symbolic when he determined that the Wilson Center ought to be at the very center of the Smithsonian, the Castle.

While overseeing all the building and creative endeavors, he did not lose sight of the need to make "these museums our living places. Children of all ages are here. They come to learn. They must learn because it's fun * * *. They shouldn't be footsore and weary." Add to this the marvelous Outreach programs, the Smithsonian Associates, the magazine, the Folklife Festival, and not least his beloved carousel.

Dr. Ripley has embodied and enriched the human spirit. We owe him our thanks for a lifetime of service and 20 years of distinguished stewardship.●

JOSE MARTI

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, a few days ago we celebrated the 131st anniversary of the birth of the freedom-loving Cuban patriot, poet, and journalist, Jose Marti.

Marti was born in Havana, the son of a Spanish military official. As a teenager he was imprisoned and later exiled for his democratic beliefs. In exile, he spent 15 years as a journalist in New York where he wrote much of his poetry, plays, and essays, founding the Modernist movement in Spanish literature.

He loved the American people and greatly admired our Nation's strength and the opportunity it offered to men and women to live in freedom. Marti wrote many essays about the United States and while critical of U.S. policy initiatives in the 1880's, he greatly loved the American people and wrote admiringly of Walt Whitman, Ralph Waldo Emerson, the American West, and the Brooklyn Bridge, just to mention a few topics. He lived and wrote in New York, and found great comfort in the Cuban-American communities in south Florida, which in Tampa and Key West had already become devoted to the cause of a free Cuba.

Although a peace-loving individual who spoke against unnecessary violence, he joined the Cuban patriots soon after the revolution against Spain was initiated. He died in battle in eastern Cuba at the age of 42.

Marti's ideals have survived him. His dream of a free and democratic Cuba still burns in the hearts of millions of Cubans in the island and in the hearts of a million Cuban Americans and many friends of a free Cuba in the United States. I would like to quote a brief passage from Marti's writings:

> I want the first law of our republic to be the reverence of Cubans for the full dignity of man . . . Either the republic is built on the character of each one of its children, on their habit of working with their hands and thinking for themselves, on the full exercise of their abilities and respect for the rights of others to fully exercise theirs, as if it were a matter of family honor, a passion, in short, for the dignity of man, or the republic is not worth a single tear from one of our women, a single drop of blood from one of our brave men. . . .

Carlos Ripoll, a Cuban American scholar who is presently professor of romance languages at Queens College, New York, has compiled an excellent anthology of the writings of Jose Marti. The words gathered in his book, "Jose Marti: Thoughts," reveal Marti's acute sensibility to human suffering and a deep concern about the denial of basic human rights and human conduct in government and politics.

As we begin a new year, we will do well to remember the words of Jose Marti:

> Respect for the freedom and ideas of others, of even the most wretched being, is my fanaticism. If I die or am killed, it will be because of that.

In the 1880's and 1890's, Marti's essays about life in the United States were a regular feature in some of Latin America's most prestigious dailies. Upon the death of Ulysses S. Grant in September of 1885, Marti wrote a thoughtful and heartfelt article about the American hero:

In the end, it was sickness that brought a luminous and memorable conclusion to that life that was pure strength. It was brilliant in some respects, and sordid in others, yet the magnitude of the services he rendered made it definitively, undeniably great. To some it will seem appropriate that an existence, whose great merit was to have preserved without cruelty the greatest political system yet devised by man's imagination, ended with a spectacular funeral in which the entire * * * the tomb on Riverside, covered now by the clinging branches of what was once a shoot from a vine on Napoleon's tomb on St. Helena. They will see a fit ending to that fruitful life in the funeral train that came down from the lofty mountain with its black curtains whipped by the rain and the wind; in the ranks of New York militiamen who accompanied the corpse through the still wet streets from the railroad station to City Hall, where the vestibule had been converted into a funeral crypt; in the tireless homage of men and women, black and white, workers on their way home, soldiers who had fought in his armies, and the curious, who for two days and nights formed a line that stretched unbroken for the distance of a mile from City Hall; in the day of the solemn burial, decreed a day of mourning throughout the land, on which the enormous hearse drawn by twenty-four black horses bore the remains to the tomb through streets hung with crepe and crowded with people, many of whom had been waiting since the previous morning, huddled on corners, clinging to the rooftops, perched on telephone poles, packed on balconies at stations dearly bought, to see General Hancock pass by with the general staff, which included one Southerner; the ranks on ranks of splendid militia; the battalion from Virginia that Grant drove before him, and another battalion of those who drove them under Grant's command; the deceased, at whose passing all heads were bared; the President, in a coach drawn by black horses, and two ex-presidents; five hundred carriages filled with notables, secretaries of state, governors, bishops, and generals; and the daughter and daughters-in-law of the great man, wrapped in their long veils.

But it was not this that brought Grant's life to a luminous conclusion. It was his superior spirit that waxed bright in the last, long days before his death, endured with great fortitude by that wasted old man, in which he revealed the best of his natural energies, long obscured by the passions and vulgarities of existence, through words and acts of great tenderness. A profound self-examination put him in clear possession of the true greatness of his life. The vanities, which he once prized so high, fell from him like dust from an old statue when he came to write his personal memoirs of the war, which was all the fortune he had to leave his children, and whose final pages he wrote with trembling hand and with the sweat of death's agony on his brow. He rose to an awarness of the greatness of the spirit, with the capacity for elevation that is given primary characters by their genuine grace, and he saw, prized, and recorded only the essential acts of his achievement, in which he was great in combat only to be greater in the manner of his triumph.

His deep-set eyes, softened by the gratitude he felt toward his good-hearted countrymen for their forgiveness of his errors and vigil at his death, turned with dignified and elevated kindness toward the mistaken heroes it was his lot to combat without rest, and subdue without anger. The fleshless hand he extended in good will from the border of the grave has been clasped with loving admiration by his gallant former enemies who count that gesture a national treasure. A nation of men has appeared on this earth, and this man, for all his grave errors, helped clear the way.

In the same article, Marti wrote that the United States was:

A nation where questions are asked and answers given, where no man is above public scrutiny, and woe to him who falls under suspicion, for every act is probed to its core.

And he added that:

A nation where newspapers are living things, and no sooner does a cause emerge than it has its organ to which all who are interested have equal access, so that there is no injustice or suspicion that lacks a voice, or a newspaper to air it, or a bar of opinion disposed to censure wrongdoing.

I want to join the many celebrations being held in Jose Marti's honor. I am also very pleased that his name has been chosen for the U.S. radio station that will soon begin broadcasting a message of hope and freedom to the people of Cuba.●

BILL AND DOROTHY JANE WOOD APPRECIATION WEEK

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, in Fairbanks, Alaska, February 6 to 11 is designated as Bill and Dorothy Jane Wood Appreciation Week. My hometown is honoring them for their many years of contributions to Fairbanks.

Bill is currently the executive director of Festival Fairbanks 1984, a committee that organizes the Fairbanks celebration of Alaska's statehood, where I recently had the pleasure of working with him. He has also served as the president of the University of Alaska for 14 years, mayor of Fairbanks, and executive director of the Fairbanks Industrial Development Council.

Dorothy Jane is a member of the Fairbanks Symphony Orchestra, active in numerous volunteer civic and community organizations, and gardening projects in Fairbanks.

It is most fitting that the community honor these two individuals. They are involved, energetic and enthusiastic residents of Fairbanks. Their desire to help others is infectious and they inspire others to join them in contributing to community, church, social, and political events.

By the way, today, February 3, is Bill's 77th birthday. I know Fairbanksans join my colleague, Senator STEVENS and me in wishing him good health and happiness for many years to come.

Thank you Bill and Dorothy Jane for providing us with a recipe for making our community a better place to live: equal parts of dedication and involvement.●

INCREASING THE INTERSPOUSAL IRA TO $4,000

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to lend my support and cosponsorship to S. 2229, legislation to increase the maximum interspousal IRA to $4,000 from $2,250.

The Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981, reformed the IRA provisions to allow for greater individual participation in this savings incentive. Clearly, the change in the IRA law has been an unbridled success. In 1982, over $27 billion was invested in IRA's. Experts anticipate the amount of participation in IRA's to increase in 1983. The new savings generated is available to fuel continued economic growth, which is the cornerstone of the administration's economic policy.

However, there was one principal flaw in the IRA reform mandated in ERTA; nonworking spouses, primarily women, are discriminated against because they do not earn income. Currently, the law states that a married couple in which both spouses work can establish an IRA of up to $4,000. Yet, a married couple with a non-income-earning spouse can only establish an IRA up to $2,250. Though a non-income-earning spouse works and contributes indirectly to our gross national product, their ability to save for retirement is restricted. This is wrong and discriminates against women.

S. 2229 would increase the maximum interspousal IRA to $4,000, or parity with a married couple in which both spouses earn income. I am pleased that the President endorsed this legislation in his fiscal year 1985 budget proposal. S. 2229 would infuse necessary equity into the IRA provisions.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join me in cosponsoring S. 2229.●

MILITARY FACILITIES IN HONDURAS

(By request of Mr. BYRD, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I will be traveling to Honduras on official Senate business in my capacity as ranking member of the Military Construction Subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee in order to analyze the buildup of military facilities in that country. Initial reports indicate that some military facilities that are being constructed in Honduras go beyond what is necessary for current military maneuvers being conducted in that country. In some cases, these facilities are being built without specific congressional approval.

The fiscal year 1984 military construction bill (Public Law 98-116) contained my amendment requiring the Department of Defense to fully disclose the extent of its construction activities in Honduras before funds could be obligated for airfield construction in that country. It is imperative that the Congress be fully apprised of our military construction efforts in this part of Central America. I am confident that this official visit to Honduras will enable the Senate Appropriations Committee to better evaluate the proposed fiscal year 1985 military construction requests for this region.●

NEEDED: PRODUCT LIABILITY REFORM

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, Congress is often accused, with good reason, of passing laws that result in needless spending. It would, therefore, be ironic indeed if the lack of congressional action were to cause an unnecessary expenditure of national resources.

Unfortunately, that is precisely what is happening in one particular case. We have a problem in this country that costs us billions of dollars, forces businesses to close, and requires our citizens to undertake lengthy lawsuits, all because of congressional inaction. It has created, in effect, a hidden tax on every manufactured product purchased in the United States. The only bright spot is that we can easily solve the problem by the adoption of one law.

The problem is product liability. There is no uniform product liability standard, so each State is free to make up one of its own. The resulting crazy-quilt system of often conflicting laws has resulted in sky-rocketing insurance rates and higher consumer prices.

A recent article in the Green Bay, Wis., Press-Gazette summarized the issue well. I commend it to the attention of my colleagues, and I ask that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I also urge the Senate to quickly adopt a uniform national product liability law and end the misery the present system allows.

The article follows:

PRODUCT LIABILITY LAWS NEED UNIFORMITY

(By Harry Maier)

There's a reason the American Association of Trial Lawyers is opposed to a national product liability law—big bucks are involved.

Lobbying against the legislation introduced by Sen. Robert Kasten, R-Wis., has been intensive.

The Kasten bill, S-44, is before the Senate Commerce Committee and is expected to be reported out sometime in February. It carries the names of 25 co-sponsors in a bipartisan effort. Backers of the legislation expect the bill will be passed and forwarded to the House.

It has been in the hopper for about three years and already has gone through about 20 revisions to bring it to the level where passage is expected. Legislation directed at product liability is not new, having worked its way through three administrations since 1976.

Product liability has been a thorn in the side of business and industry for years, but more so in recent years with the substantial increase in the amount of court awards.

In 1974, the number of suits filed nationally totaled 1,579. By 1982, the number had risen to 8,944 and when the 1983 figures are in, they are expected to be even higher.

That's been a bonanza for the trial lawyers who have made substantial commissions on the awards. The National Machine Tool Builders Association estimates that lawyers receive $77 for every $66 awarded a claimant. That adds up quickly in suits with awards running into the millions.

Unfortunately, some of the awards border on the absurd.

Here's an example:

To demonstrate his superior physical conditioning, a 41-year-old champion body-builder entered a footrace with a refrigerator strapped to his back. During the run, one of the straps holding the refrigerator slipped and the man was injured.

The injury prevented him from competing in body-building contests for several years, so he sued a number of defendants, including the maker of the strap. In September 1982, a Los Angeles County Superior Court awarded the body-builder $1 million in damages.

There also have been many instances in which a claimant has won a suit after he removed a safety device from a machine and then filed an action following an injury.

Representatives of the Coalition for Uniform Product Liability Law visited Green Bay last week seeking support for the Kasten bill.

Robert Heinz, attorney for Johnson Controls Inc., Milwaukee, pointed out that the cost of products manufactured by a company also reflects the high cost of product liability insurance, often as much as 20 percent.

His company is insured by Wausau Insurance Co., Wausau.

"The annual premiums for that insurance are based on our business on a national and international basis. It's virtually impossible for the insurance carrier to keep up with legislation in every state or country where we sell. That's the prime reason business is supporting a controlling law on the federal level," he said.

"Some rules have to be established nationally so that a single product would be subjected to the same standard for liability. The Kasten bill does nothing to restrict the right to file a lawsuit," Heinz said.

One of the provisions of the proposed legislation also would establish a statute of limitations at 25 years. Many suits continue to be filed on machinery or equipment that has been in use for as much as 30, 40 or even 50 years and often under two, three or more owners. The 25-year limit is longer than any current statute on a state level.

Currently, there is no national legislation, although about 30 states have adopted have some form of product liability law. No two are alike, however.

As a result, a claimant can win a suit in one state, but another can lose an identical suit in another state.

The Kasten legislation basically would provide courts with uniform legal rules to apply in all product liability cases.

Such uniformity would benefit both the manufacturer and the consumer. Passage is overdue.●

LEBANON

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I recently returned from a 7-day, five-nation Middle East tour with Senator JOHN TOWER, chairman of the Senate Committee on Armed Services.

The primary purpose of our trip was to have a firsthand opportunity to consult with and inspect U.S. military forces operating in the area, to review the political and military situation in Lebanon, and to assess the continued U.S. participation in the multinational force.

In accomplishing our purpose, Senator TOWER and I met with the presidents of Egypt and Lebanon, the Prime Minister of Israel, King Hussein I of Jordan, and the Foreign Minister of Syria.

In addition, we met with the commander of each of the contingents constituting the MNF in Lebanon, the commander of the U.S. 6th Fleet, and President Reagan's special Middle East Envoy, Ambassador Rumsfeld.

Mr. President, I believe that we have a dilemma on our hands in the Congress. The Congress has a legitimate responsibility to conduct a serious debate on this important issue but, at the same time, every day that passes as the debate continues increases the probability of our forces in Lebanon, particularly those ashore, becoming high value targets of opportunity for our adversaries.

Wednesday, while receiving testimony from the Secretary of Defense and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff before the Committee on Armed Services, I asked General Vessey if it would not be in the interest of all concerned to, as quickly and expeditiously as possible, reconcile whatever differences the Congress may have with the President and conclude that debate, thereby reducing their value as a target of opportunity of our adversaries, the Marines and the Navy afloat.

General Vessey, our senior uniformed officer, supported this position unequivocally. He pointed out in the strongest terms that, and I quote:

Those who want instability in that part of the world want us out of Lebanon.

He went on to say, and I quote again:

If they think that shooting at our people will cause a rift in this country's support for the President's policies, they are certainly going to go ahead and shoot at our people.

Mr. President, my concern—indeed, the concern of the whole of America—is about the safety of our troops both at sea and ashore in that region.

A protracted debate in the Congress is not in the interest of our Nation.

I urge my colleagues to promptly express their views on this vital matter. The issue must be resolved as quickly as possible to reduce the motivation and value of targeting one of the four partners of the multinational force, namely the U.S. Marines and Naval units offshore. Our personnel are gallantly serving in these difficult circumstances; we owe them individually and collectively our duty to contribute to their safety.

Mr. President, I attach for the reference of my colleagues the actual testimony:

Senator WARNER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

My first question is to General Vessey.

Earlier today over breakfast I had the opportunity to visit with you and the Secretary and we discussed the situation in Lebanon.

I expressed to you my support for the President's current policy and at the same time my concern, indeed the concern of many, indeed the whole of America, about the safety of our troops, both at sea and ashore in that region.

General Vessey, it seems to me that we have a dilemma on our hands here in the Congress. We have a responsibility to conduct a legitimate debate on this issue and at the same time I judge from your observations this morning that that debate focuses particularly upon the Marines ashore which enhances their being a target of opportunity by our adversaries.

My question to you would be: Would it not be in the interest of all concerned to as quickly and as expeditiously as possible reconcile whatever differences the Congress may have with the President and conclude that debate, thereby reducing, should we say, the target of opportunity of our adversaries against the Marines and perhaps the Navy afloat?

General VESSEY. I would certainly agree with you, Senator. As you know from your trip in that part of the world, the people who want instability in that part of the world want us out of there.

If they think that shooting at our people will cause a rift in this country's support for the President's policies, they are certainly going to go ahead and shoot at our people.

So, I believe that it is important that those policies be resolved and that we support the President and his negotiator in getting on with peace in Lebanon and peace in the Middle East.

Senator WARNER. The representation has been made, indeed the Chairman and I have testified, that the credibility of the U.S. is very much affected by what we do with those Marines ashore and the manner in which a decision is made on what time to make the withdrawal that all of us hope will be as soon as possible.

Do you agree that their presence ashore very definitely impacts on the present long-range credibility of the United States to be an effective working partner, both diplomatically and militarily, in that region?

General VESSEY. Certainly you found the same things I found. I found in my trips throughout that area that the nations that are interested in peace and stability and who are interested in supporting the United States in that area believe that their presence is very important.

It is a very important psychological presence for the Government of Lebanon to understand that there are nations in the world that support them and it is important to those other nations in the Middle East to understand that we are not going to back off on our commitment.

Senator WARNER. One of the hopeful signs in that area is the progress being made by President Gemayel and others in constituting the Lebanese armed forces.

There are presently five to six, brigades. They are operational. Their goal is perhaps as high as ten brigades by June.

We, as I understand, are supplying as quickly as possible the needed equipment to reconstitute the armed forces of the Government of Lebanon.

Do you see that as a hopeful sign, namely that they in turn could eventually begin to take over some of the responsibility of the Multinational Force, indeed cut Marines at the airport, within a reasonable period of time?

General VESSEY. Yes, Senator, I do. The Marines were sent in as part of that Multinational Force, not to solve all the political problems in the Middle East. That is beyond their ability.

They were sent in there to give a breathing spell to the Government of Lebanon so that they could build up their own capability, both to control their own territory and solve their political problems.

The army of the Government of Lebanon certainly won't solve all the problems alone. The problems are basically political problems.

The army is growing and it is a good army. It represents all the factions in the country. From what I have seen of it, it looks good and it will certainly be able to control its own territory fairly soon.

Senator WARNER. In brief, then, the Joint Chiefs view this situation in a manner consistent with the President?

General VESSEY. That is certainly correct.●

REPEAL OF THE SENATE PAY RAISE

● Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, I would like to express a few further thoughts on S. 2211, the bill that we passed on January 26 to repeal our backdoor pay increase. I am glad that the bill passed, despite the fact that it not only reduces our pay, but has the further effect of reducing the amount of honoraria income that Senators may earn, since that amount is limited to a fixed 30 percent of our salaries. I do not object to higher Senate salaries, nor do I believe that we should impose more onerous limits on honoraria. Senate salaries have not kept pace with inflation, and fail to take into account the many costs of holding public office today. This body's inability to vote itself a reasonable salary, and its inability to resist imposing a limitation on fully disclosed outside income—a limitation that I consider unconstitutional—have made it increasingly difficult for Congress to attract and retain those citizens best qualified and suited for public office.

But I set these considerations aside in voting on S. 2211 because I am even more bothered by the secretive manner in which this latest pay increase was accomplished. When the Senate seeks to avoid accountability for an action that is so unavoidably self-serving, our public standing is diminished in a way that no amount of money can correct. Therefore, although I believe that the Senate's actions in the area of salary and compensation have been unwise and at times unconstitutional, I was happy to have the opportunity to vote in favor of S. 2211.●

WEINBERGER'S REMARKABLE STATEMENTS

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, a year ago tomorrow, America's newspapers published stories about the testimony before the Senate Budget Committee of Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger. It contained a startling statement, relayed from President Reagan, about proposed cuts in defense spending. The Secretary told the committee that, in his words: "The President was and is of the firm view that we have reached the bone, and that any further cuts would do severe damage to our national security." End of quote. As we all know, Congress—which is at least as concerned as the President is about national security—did make further cuts. In fact, the cuts totaled $15.8 billion. Yet, somehow or other, the bone which the President a year ago warned already had been reached seems not only to have survived those cuts but indeed to have come out strengthened.

For, this week—on Wednesday, to be exact—Secretary Weinberger gave the Senate Armed Services Committee a statement as remarkable as last year's. The Reagan administration had, over the past year, committed itself to "return America's defense programs to a safe and steady course," he said. And—miraculously and notwithstanding the dire forecast of last year, but with what he called "the bipartisan support of Congress, we did just that." In other words, budget cuts which a year ago Congress was warned not to make with the threat of doing severe damage to national security—but which were made—remarkably have led us back to a "safe and steady course" in defense. And those of us who had been warned not to make the cuts, but did, have become part of a "bipartisan support."

Mr. President, if this is not magic, what is it? And if the Defense Secretary is not a magician—at least with words—what is he? Far be it from me to give my judgment. Suffice it to say, I believe that it is important today, as we mark the anniversary of what may go down in history as the administration's famous "we have reached the bone" warning, to be on the alert for still more prestidigitation.

Just as there remains waste and misguided priorities within the defense budget there remains excessive posturing in this administrations rhetoric about that budget.●

ABA ACTIVE IN PROVIDING FOR LEGAL NEEDS OF OLDER CLIENTS

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Aging and a member of the Judiciary Committee, I have taken a great interest in the ways in which the legal profession is serving older Americans, both through government and private sector efforts.

I have been gratified to learn that this very subject has been a major focus of the American Bar Association, which in 1978 established an interdisciplinary Commission on Legal Problems of the Elderly. The commission today focuses on six areas of particular concern to elderly clients: simplification of administrative procedures and regulations, discrimination against the elderly, provision of legal services to the elderly, long-term care, housing, and social security.

The commission's current projects include model statutes for retirement facilities, model instruments for home equity conversion, and encouraging corporate legal departments to provide pro bono services. But the commission is also active in mobilizing the private bar to improve service to the elderly.

As part of this effort, the commission publishes a newsletter entitled "Bifocal," along with a number of informational pamphlets on specific legal issues affecting the elderly.

I recently reviewed one of those pamphlets for attorneys entitled "Counseling Older Clients," and was so impressed with the quality of the suggestions it includes that I submit it for the RECORD.

Mr. President, I encourage all attorneys, but especially those interested in serving the elderly, to contact the commission or their local bar association for further literature and information. The Commission on Legal Problems of the Elderly is headquartered at the offices of the American Bar Association, 1800 M Street NW., Washington, D.C. 20036.

Mr. President, I ask that a pamphlet published by the commission be printed in the RECORD.

The pamphlet follows:

COUNSELING OLDER CLIENTS

Are you sometimes bewildered in responding to sentiments expressed by older clients? Have you found it difficult to close an interview with an older client? Do you know the signs of hearing and vision loss, and how to compensate for these problems? Are you prepared to make appropriate referrals? Answering questions like these will help you assess your effectiveness as a legal counselor for the elderly.

In working with older persons, attorneys must be sensitive to age-related factors without losing sight of the individuality of every elderly client. No two people age in the same way or at the same pace. The aging process is affected by an individual's economic situation, health, social relationships, and personality.

Certain conditions, such as hearing or vision loss, are more prevalent among older people than younger people, and awareness of these conditions is essential in working with older clients. The central distinction between older and younger clients is the degree to which the aging process has limited the autonomy of the older client. Through no fault of their own, older clients may find themselves severely limited physically, financially, and socially.

Attorneys can play a significant role in restoring or enhancing the independence of older clients. However, their personal attitudes about aging may influence the extent to which they are willing to accept this key role. Therefore, it is of primary importance that any attitudes and stereotypes be examined which might interfere with the attorney's ability to serve the client as an adult—with the same need for autonomy as the younger client.

Listed on the following pages are some fundamentals for counseling older clients. They focus on special skills which attorneys and referral panel coordinators need to develop, many of which are useful in the counseling relationship regardless of the age of the client.

1. Make yourself physically accessible. Some elderly clients have problems getting to an attorney. Be prepared to make house calls or otherwise aid the client in arranging transportation. Make offices safe for older clients; avoid slippery floors and throw rugs in walk areas. Provide for access by clients in wheelchairs.

2. Develop your clients' confidence and trust in a thoughtful way. Take time to explain the process. Stress the confidential nature of your relationship. Some clients may fear that what is discussed could result in a loss of needed benefits; others may resent the need to see an attorney at all. To elicit all possible legal problems, the attorney must take the first steps leading to an open relationship with the older client.

3. Sharpen your active listening skills. Paraphrasing or repeating your client's statements is a useful technique for encouraging and checking for accurate communication. It enhances the client's sense of involvement and trust, and indicates that you care about what is said.

4. Do not assume hearing or vision loss in older clients. Most older people hear and see as well as younger ones. However, if a client has experienced sensory loss, many useful techniques exist for facilitating communication.

5. To compensate for hearing loss: Eliminate background noise. Sit so that the client can see your lips, do not block the view of your face, particularly your mouth. Speak in a low pitch; enunciate clearly. Do not make important points merely in passing. Develop methods of rephrasing important points so that you can check on communication gaps (without being condescending).

6. To compensate for vision loss: Double or triple space all written materials. Allow ample time for the client to read printed materials. Avoid having the client face a source of glare such as a shiny table top, desk top, or window.

7. Organize sessions carefully, allowing sufficient time for all tasks. Sending the client written questions in advance may be helpful in preventing excessively lengthy counseling sessions, and also enhances the client's sense of participation. You may need to plan shorter sessions for clients who show fatigue or difficulty attending for long periods.

8. Actively involve the client and maintain regular contact. Clients may lose interest or retreat from a legal case if there is not continuing contact. If possible, assure the client of the probable benefits of pursuing the case.

9. Learn techniques for closing an interview with the client who wants to stay longer. Set a time limit in advance of the appointment. Stress your intent to stay in contact (and then do it). Let your clients know that you understand and care how they feel.

10. Fully explore the problems your client may (or may not) have before initiating any action. The real problem may be something other than that which the client expresses initially. A combination of patience, sensitivity, and persistence is needed in eliciting all pertinent information.

11. Learn about available community resources for older people. If there is no legal solution, suggest an alternative, or refer the client to the proper service provider.

12. Confront your own pre-existing perceptions and values about aging. Age bias is deeply ingrained in our society and can be detrimental to an attorney's communication with clients.●

NOTICE OF DETERMINATIONS BY THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ETHICS

● Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it is required by paragraph 4 of rule 35 that I place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this notice of Senate employees who propose to participate in programs, the principal objective of which is educational, sponsored by a foreign government or a foreign educational or charitable organization involving travel to a foreign country paid for by that foreign government or organization.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Charles Marinaccio of the Banking Committee staff, to participate in a program sponsored by Tunghai University, in Taipei, Taiwan, from January 15 to 22, 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Marinaccio in the program in Taiwan, at the expense of Tunghai University, to discuss United States-Taiwan relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received requests for determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Ira S. Shapiro on the staff of the Committee on Governmental Affairs and Mr. Thomas A. Daffron on the staff of Senator COHEN, to participate in a program sponsored by the Chinese Culture University in Taipei, Taiwan, from January 7 through 15, 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Shapiro and Mr. Daffron in this program in Taipei, at the expense of the Chinese Culture University, to discuss United States-Taiwan relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. John Childers of the Rules Committee, to participate in a program sponsored by the Chinese Culture University, in Taipei, Taiwan, from January 7 to 15, 1984.

The committee has detemined that participation by Mr. Childers in the program in Taipei, at the expense of the Chinese Culture University, to discuss United States-Taiwan relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Ms. Margo Carlisle of the staff Senator McCLURE, to participate in a program sponsored by the Chinese Culture University, in Taipei, Taiwan, from January 7 to 15, 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Ms. Carlisle in the program in Taipei, at the expense of the Chinese Cultural University, to discuss United States-Taiwan relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Ms. Susan Schwab of the staff of Senator DANFORTH to participate in a program sponsored by Seoul National University, in Seoul, Korea, from December 2 to 11, 1983.

The committee has determined that participation by Ms. Schwab in the program in Seoul, Korea, at the expense of the Seoul National University, to discuss United States-Korean economic and political relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Paul A. Sivley of the staff of Senator MURKOWSKI, to participate in a program sponsored by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in Israel, in early January 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Sivley in the program in Israel, at the expense of the Hebrew University, to participate in meetings and seminars, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Senator WILLIAM V. ROTH, JR., and Dr. Ian Butterfield of his staff to participate in a program sponsored by the Institute of International Affairs in Pietermaritzburg, South Africa, from January 15 to 21, 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Senator ROTH and Dr. Butterfield in the program in South Africa, at the expense of the Institute of International Affairs, to attend a conference concerning international affairs, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. David G. Shoultz, of the staff of Senator HAWKINS, to participate in a program sponsored by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in Jerusalem from January 2 to 13, 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Shoultz, in the program in Jerusalem, at the expense of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, to discuss United States-Israeli relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Ms. Deborah Harnesberger of the staff of Senator JOHN TOWER to participate in a program sponsored by Tamkang University in Taipei, Taiwan from November 28 to December 11, 1983, and Messrs. Neil Levin and Steven Harris, of the staff of the Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs, to participate in a program in Seoul, Korea, sponsored by the Seoul National University from December 1 to 11, 1983.

The committee has determined that participation by Ms. Harnesberger in the program in Taipei, at the expense of Tamkang University, as part of a congressional delegation visit, and participation by Messrs. Levin and Harris in the program in Seoul, Korea, sponsored by the Seoul National University, to discuss United States-Korea relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Dr. Clifford Kiracofe of the staff of Senator JESSE HELMS, to participate in a program sponsored by the Asociacion Internacional de Amigos de El Salvador, in El Salvador, from November 21 to 25, 1983.

The committee has determined that participation by Dr. Kiracofe in the program in El Salvador, at the expense of the Asociacion Internacional de Amigos de El Salvador, to confer with political and private sector interests who are affected by U.S. aid policies, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Jeff M. Bingham, of the staff of Senator JAKE GARN, to participate in a program sponsored by the Hanns-Seidel Foundation, and coordinated by the Heritage Foundation, in West Germany, from December 10 to 18, 1983.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Bingham in the program in West Germany, at the expense of the Hanns-Seidel Foundation, to meet with government officials, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Dave Sullivan and Ms. Jade West of the staff of Senator STEVE SYMMS to participate in a program sponsored by the Hanns-Seidel Foundation, and coordinated by the Heritage Foundation, in West Germany from December 11 to 18, 1983.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Sullivan and Ms. West in the program in West Germany, at the expense of the Hanns-Seidel Foundation to meet with government officials, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Ms. Margo Carlisle of the staff of Senator McCLURE to participate in a program sponsored by the Hanns-Seidel Foundation, in Bonn, West Germany, from December 10 to 18, 1983.

The committee has determined that participation by Ms. Carlisle in the program in West Germany, at the expense of the Hanns-Seidel Foundation to attend a conference, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. David Morey of the staff of Senator JOHN GLENN, to participate in a program sponsored by Tamkang University, in Taipei, Taiwan, from November 27 to December 7, 1983.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Morey in the program in Taiwan, at the expense of Tamkang University, to discuss Taiwan's culture and institutions, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Grayson Fowler of the staff of Senator ZORINSKY to participate in a program sponsored by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in Jerusalem from January 3 to 13, 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Fowler in the program in Jerusalem, at the expense of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, to discuss United States-Israeli relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Ralph B. Everett of the staff of the Commerce Committee, to participate in a program sponsored by the Tunghai University, in Taiwan in mid-January 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Everett in the program in Taiwan, at the expense of Tunghai University, to discuss United States-Taiwan relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Joel S. Lisker of the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, to participate in a conference in Jerusalem, sponsored by the Department of Education and Culture of the Jewish Agency, from January 31 to February 2, 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Lisker in the conference in Jerusalem, at the expense of the Department of Education and Culture of the Jewish Agency, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Senator STEVE SYMMS to participate in a factfinding visit to South Africa, sponsored by the South Africa Foundation, from January 11 to 25, 1984.

The committee has determined the participation by Senator SYMMS in the visit to South Africa, at the expense of the South Africa Foundation, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Ms. Ann Pride of the staff of Senator PRYOR to participate in a program sponsored by Tunghai University, in Taiwan, in mid-January 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Ms. Pride in the program in Taiwan, at the expense of Tunghai University, to discuss United States-Taiwan relations is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Ms. Cynthia Jurciukonis of the staff of Senator RIEGLE, to participate in a program sponsored by Haus Rissen International Institute for Politics and Economics in Hamburg, West Germany, from April 1 to 15, 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Ms. Jurciukonis in the program in Hamburg, West Germany, at the expense of the Haus Rissen International Institute for Politics and Economics, to discuss United States-German relations, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.●

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on yesterday an order was entered granting authority to the majority leader to call up one of three bills after consulting with the minority leader. I consulted with him on last evening, and it is my understanding that he does not object to proceeding at this time to call up one of these measures. We are doublechecking now, and I wish to announce that the first one of the three bills to be called up will be the bail reform bill which is Calendar Order 229, S. 215. I anticipate that it will take a fairly brief time to dispose of that. It is possible that we will have a rollcall vote, however, on that measure. Indeed, I wish to say to Senators who may be listening in their offices or elsewhere that I anticipate probably two rollcall votes today, but I still hope that we can be out, or at least have no further rollcall votes after about 3 p.m.

Now, Mr. President, while we complete checking with the minority leader, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent there now be an additional period for the transaction of routine morning business of no longer than 5 minutes in length in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the distinguished and gracious majority leader.

NUCLEAR FREEZE—YES! BUILD-DOWN—NO!

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, are we speeding along a high-tech nuclear arms road to death and oblivion? Somehow, we have become so enchanted by the magic of science, and especially by the impressive lingo of nuclear physics, that we assume that the geniuses who gave us the awful power of nuclear weapons can wave another scientific wand and bring all this life-ending power under control.

Brilliant young scientists are working at the Livermore Lab in California and elsewhere to create weapons that will nullify the opposition's nuclear weapons. Of course, these defensive nuclear weapons will also advance the nuclear confrontation another trillion dollars along the dangerous and unpredictable nuclear path.

President Reagan is pushing the Congress to embark on a huge, new nuclear weapons in space initiative designed to end the threat of Russian intercontinental ballistic missiles. This, too, would shove our human, financial, and economic resources further along the unpredictable nuclear race track where every reaction has a reaction.

We know that as we build our immense Star Wars defenses, the Russians will find other ways besides space to deliver their nukes. And now we are wooed by the administration to accept something they cleverly call build-down. They promise that build-down would reduce the nuclear threat by providing an agreement with the U.S.S.R. It would provide that both sides would only replace aging and obsolete nuclear weapons either with fewer or more stable nuclear weapons.

This is the most seductive appeal dreamed up by the nuclear hawks yet. Does it make any sense? No. Here is why: It overlooks the fact that the United States has been following a build-down formula without any agreement for the past 24 years—ever since 1960. We have reduced the number of nuclear warheads in our arsenal from 32,000 in 1960 to 26,000 today. We have slashed the megatonnage from more than 30,000 megatons in 1960 to less than 12,000 today. But have we built down? Whom are we trying to kid? We have built up. We have simply reduced our so-called tactical weapons, sharply increased our strategic weapons, and vastly improved the accuracy and reliability of these strategic weapons. So now we can deliver on the Soviet Union a far more lethal package than we could 24 years ago. Some build-down.

But this phony build-down is precisely what some of our most influential Members in the Senate are pushing; and, indeed, shortly before the recess, the Senate as a whole rejected a nuclear freeze in favor of this same spurious build-down approach to arms control. Ah, the power of words.

Mr. President, the power of words can be critical in our success or failure in stopping the arms race, as Caryl Rivers points out brilliantly in an article in the New York Times on February 2. Listen to these two short paragraphs from the Rivers article:

> Language, after all, is politics, as George Orwell pointed out. The way we talk about something has a great deal to do with how we think about it. There is something wonderfully comforting in high-tech talk. If somebody says he can debolitize a framistan, I breathe a sigh of relief: Now, there is a person who knows what he's doing.
> High tech language tends to foster one of the most dangerous myths of modern geopolitics: the illusion of control. If we just push the right buttons, deploy the right missiles with the right initials, input the right set of computer-aided policy objectives, everything will work out just fine.

Finally, Rivers concludes:

> If we are to deal realistically with the nuclear threat, we must abandon—at great cost to egos in Washington—the illusion of control. The truth is we deal with crisis and confrontation roughly the same way we did when we settled things with a barrage of stones. If we're not careful we'll be back to that in short order.

The nuclear nightmare will not be held at bay by high tech dazzle. It will be rolled back only by a sustained, slogging, wearying effort to pare down the nuclear arsenal, and a determination to be absolutely sure we do not wander blindly into a "High Noon" confrontation.

Is the situation hopeless? No; but we do, indeed, have an administration that seems determined not to even try to negotiate an end to the arms race. On that same February 2, on the op ed page of the New York Times, this country's chief negotiator at the Geneva arms talks, Gen. Edward Rowney, writes about how hopeful the outlook for negotiations has become because the administration is pushing build-down. Build-down becomes our final, most sought-after arms control goal.

So even if we conclude a completely successful negotiation with the U.S.S.R., what do we have? We have an agreement to push ahead, full steam, in the technological arms race, while the Russians do likewise.

In all fairness, it is certainly true that build-down might reduce nuclear weapon instability if both sides agree to provide an incentive for introducing more stable weapons by permitting a one-for-one substitution of single warhead launchers while the agreement requires a two-for-one or three-for-one per warhead substitution of new MIRV'd land-based missiles. But build-down would increase the killing power—the capacity to deliver ever greater payloads on the enemy's homeland on both sides, just as it has for the past 14 years with our own unilateral build-down.

With a build-down agreement, we could be sure of two things: First, neither side would make a substitution that did not enhance the lethality of its arsenal. Second, and by far the most important, the technological race would go on as feverishly as ever to refine ever more reliable, cheaper, more portable nuclear devices. And where does this kind of competition lead? Obviously, it leads to possession of nuclear arsenals by more and more countries and ever greater risk that somewhere, sometime, someone will start the last war.

The answer, once again, Mr. President is a freeze—especially a freeze on testing—a mutual, verifiable frontal lobotomy on the research that takes us ever closer to universal death.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have referred, entitled "Armageddon Lingo," by Caryl Rivers, in the February 2, New York Times, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARMAGEDDON LINGO

(By Caryl Rivers)

BOSTON.—Today, the more gruesome, the more grotesque the weapon of destruction, the more sanitized the terminology by which it is described.

In World War II, when we sent out B-29's against Japan, we called it "fire-bombing." It wasn't hard to visualize the great storms blowing through Tokyo streets. Today, our weapons make those incendiary bombs look like a pack of matches. And what do we call them? Intercontinental ballistic missiles and medium-range tactical cruises and multiple-warhead missiles (that is, MIRV's, or multiple independently targetable re-entry vehicles), and the MX. MX sounds like it ought to be a sports car, and MIRV a new Atari game. Since these devices can turn flesh to molten paste in seconds, the use of high-tech lingo for talking about Armageddon is no accident.

Language, after all, is politics, as George Orwell pointed out. The way we talk about something has a great deal to do with how we think about it. There is something wonderfully comforting in high-tech talk. If somebody says he can debolitize a framistan, I breathe a sight of relief: Now, there is a person who knows what he's doing.

High-tech language tends to foster one of the most dangerous myths of modern geopolitics: the illusion of control. If we just push the right buttons, deploy the right missiles with the right initials, input the right set of computer-aided policy objectives, everything will work out just fine.

I have been dismayed, as the nuclear debate intensifies, to hear politicians, bureaucrats and military men talking in exactly these terms, and looking chipper as they do. Such comments gave me a nagging sense of déjà vu: Where had I heard that sort of thing before? It was 19 years ago, at a press luncheon. Lyndon B. Johnson's people were telling us we were not going to lose the Vietnam War. American power routed? Impossible. I was a green reporter and didn't have the temerity to question their impressive statistics. But I wondered about their absolute lack of self-doubt. I wondered: How do they know?

Of course, they didn't know. And Ronald Reagan and Yuri V. Andropov don't know whether we will blow each other sky high. But American officialdom still suffers from the illusion of control.

If you seek its roots, one place you'll find it is in the deification of science spawned by the 19th century. No longer were we a cowed, primitive species that had to lop off the head of a goat to appease angry gods. We—through science—had become the gods, and had subdued nature. We didn't understand that our mechanisms of control had a dark side—or that we control much less than we imagined.

The illusion of control is also fostered by the male stereotype. To be a man is to be in control, at all times. James Bond, after all, doesn't mess up when he fires one of his ingenious gadgets. The need to be in control—or to appear to be—is programed into the political and military systems. Talking of Vietnam, Lyndon Johnson referred to the coonskin tacked to the wall. Ronald Reagan repeats Teddy Roosevelt's up-San-Juan-Hill maxims. But again and again, the image of control has proved false. We lost in Vietnam. It should have been impossible for fanatics to destroy our Marine headquarters in Beirut and kill 241 servicemen with a truckful of dynamite, but it happened.

If we are to deal realistically with the nuclear threat, we must abandon—at great cost to egos in Washington—the illusion of control. The truth is we deal with crisis and confrontation roughly the same way we did when we settled things with a barrage of stones. If we're not careful, we'll be back to that in short order.

The nuclear nightmare will not be held at bay by high-tech razzle-dazzle. It will be rolled back only by a sustained, slogging, wearying effort to pare down the nuclear arsenal, and a determination to be absolutely sure we do not wander blindly into a "High Noon" confrontation.

J. Robert Oppenheimer, one of the men who created the bomb, felt the elemental danger loosed on the earth when he watched the first atomic sun dawn over the plains of New Mexico. His words were not the jargon of high technology but those of a Hindu poem far more appropriate for the nuclear age: "Now I have become death, the destroyer of worlds."

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE THIRD REICH'S COMMITMENT TO GENOCIDE: A REMINDER OF THE NEED FOR THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, 42 years ago last month, at the Wannsee Conference, the Third Reich officially decided upon extermination as the "final solution" to the presence of Jews in occupied Europe. Couched in ambiguous terms but obvious to all participants, history's most barbaric act of genocide was outlined for the regional ministers by Hitler's deputies, setting in motion the grisly logistics of mass murder.

With numbing precision, the macabre details of the Holocaust were ironed out. Conferees discussed whether to murder the children of mixed marriages. They exchanged ideas on how to transport the millions to their deaths. The overall blueprint was revealed, grotesque in its simplicity: the Jews of Europe would be uprooted to Eastern Europe and worked to death. Any survivors would be executed.

If this recounting of the horrors of the Holocaust seems morbid and unnecessary, I relate it with a purpose. Such inhuman atrocities need to be aired and relived for, in remembering, one acts to prevent a recurrence. To dismiss such barbarity as a momentary historical aberration is to invite complacency. George Santayana said:

Progress, far from consisting in change, depends on retentiveness.

The horrors of the Holocaust galvanized the architects of postwar Europe to action. Of the several international human rights documents that were drafted, only the Genocide Convention specifically outlaws the murder and serious mental or physical persecution of an ethnic, racial, or religious group. Eighty-seven nations have chosen to sign the treaty, honoring the millions that died in the Holocaust and binding themselves to an international commitment to uphold human rights.

Paradoxically, despite the constant reiteration of our adherence to the principles that characterize this agreement, the United States has yet to sign. Our lack of action betrays our words, and our global reputation is diminished. The right to live has been and always will be defended to the utmost by this country. Consistency in our relationship with the international community demands that we give proof of our commitment to these ideals and move quickly to give our advice and consent to the President, so that we may become cosigners of this crucial humanitarian document.

APPOINTMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRIBLE). The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, appoints the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) to attend the Diplomatic Conference to Revise the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property to be held in Geneva, Switzerland, February 27–March 24, 1984.

The Chair, in its capacity as a Senator from the Commonwealth of Virginia, suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BAIL REFORM ACT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have now consulted with the minority leader, who indicates that he has no difficulty with our proceeding at this point to the consideration of the Bail Reform Act of 1983, which is S. 215, Calendar No. 229.

The distinguished Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL) is here. It is my understanding that we are prepared now to proceed and that the Senator from Maine will manage on his side.

Therefore, Mr. President, in accordance with the order previously entered, I now ask the Chair to lay before the Senate S. 215.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 215) to amend the Bail Reform Act of 1966 to permit consideration of danger to the community in setting pretrial release conditions, to expand the list of statutory release conditions, to establish a more appropriate basis for deciding on postconviction release, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I repeat what I said a moment ago, for the benefit of those who are listening in their offices and elsewhere.

It appears that there will be two votes on this bill—one in relation to a Mitchell amendment and one in relation to final passage of the bill. There may be other amendments and there may be other votes. But it appears now that there will be at least two votes on this bill.

I hope we can finish the bill by 12 noon or 12:30 p.m., and it will be the intention of the leadership on this side to proceed next to S. 948, the forfeiture bill. I have not yet conferred with the minority leader on that subject, but I say that for the benefit of Senators.

AMENDMENT NO. 2694

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for S. 215. This substitute is identical to title 1 of S. 1762, which was passed by the Senate yesterday in the crime package.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) proposes an amendment numbered 2694.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Bail Reform Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) Sections 3141 through 3151 of title 18, United States Code, are repealed and the following new sections are inserted in lieu thereof:

"§ 3141. Release and detention authority generally

"(a) PENDING TRIAL.—A judicial officer who is authorized to order the arrest of a person pursuant to section 3041 of this title shall order that an arrested person who is brought before him be released or detained, pending judicial proceedings, pursuant to the provisions of this chapter.

"(b) PENDING SENTENCE OR APPEAL.—A judicial officer of a court of original jurisdiction over an offense, or a judicial officer of a Federal appellate court, shall order that, pending imposition or execution of sentence, or pending appeal of conviction or sentence, a person be released or detained pursuant to the provisions of this chapter.

"§ 3142. Release or detention of a defendant pending trial

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Upon the appearance before a judicial officer of a person charged with an offense, the judicial officer shall issue an order that, pending trial, the person be—

"(1) released on his personal recognizance or upon execution of an unsecured appearance bond, pursuant to the provisions of subsection (b);

"(2) released on a condition or combination of conditions pursuant to the provisions of subsection (c);

"(3) temporarily detained to permit revocation of conditional release, deportation, or exclusion pursuant to the provisions of subsection (d); or

"(4) detained pursuant to the provisions of subsection (e).

"(b) RELEASE ON PERSONAL RECOGNIZANCE OR UNSECURED APPEARANCE BOND.—The judicial officer shall order the pretrial release of the person on his personal recognizance, or upon execution of an unsecured appearance bond in an amount specified by the court, subject to the condition that the person not commit a Federal, State, or local crime during the period of his release, unless the judicial officer determines that such release will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required or will endanger the safety of any other person or the community.

"(c) RELEASE ON CONDITIONS.—If the judicial officer determines that the release described in subsection (b) will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required or will endanger the safety of any other person or the community, he shall order the pretrial release of the person—

"(1) subject to the condition that the person not commit a Federal, State, or local crime during the period of release; and

"(2) subject to the least restrictive further condition, or combination of conditions, that he determines will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community, which may include the condition that the person—

"(A) remain in the custody of a designated person, who agrees to supervise him and to report any violation of a release condition to the court, if the designated person is able reasonably to assure the judicial officer that the person will appear as required and will not pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community;

"(B) maintain employment, or, if unemployed, actively seek employment;

"(C) maintain or commence an educational program;

"(D) abide by specified restrictions on his personal associations, place of abode, or travel;

"(E) avoid all contact with an alleged victim of the crime and with a potential witness who may testify concerning the offense;

"(F) report on a regular basis to a designated law enforcement agency, pretrial services agency, or other agency;

"(G) comply with a specified curfew;

"(H) refrain from possessing a firearm, destructive device, or other dangerous weapon;

"(I) refrain from excessive use of alcohol, or any use of a narcotic drug or other controlled substance, as defined in section 102 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 802), without a prescription by a licensed medical practitioner;

"(J) undergo available medical or psychiatric treatment, including treatment for drug or alcohol dependency, and remain in a specified institution if required for that purpose;

"(K) execute an agreement to forfeit upon failing to appear as required, such designated property, including money, as is reasonably necessary to assure the appearance of the person as required, and post with the court such indicia of ownership of the property or such percentage of the money as the judicial officer may specify;

"(L) execute a bail bond with solvent sureties in such amount as is reasonably necessary to assure the appearance of the person as required;

"(M) return to custody for specified hours following release for employment, schooling, or other limited purposes; and

"(N) satisfy any other condition that is reasonably necessary to assure the appearance of the person as required and to assure the safety of any other person and the community.

The judicial officer may not impose a financial condition that results in the pretrial detention of the person. The judicial officer may at any time amend his order to impose additional or different conditions of release.

"(d) TEMPORARY DETENTION TO PERMIT REVOCATION OF CONDITIONAL RELEASE, DEPORTATION, OR EXCLUSION.—If the judicial officer determines that—

"(1) the person—

"(A) is, and was at the time the offense was committed, on—

"(i) release pending trial for a felony under Federal, State, or local law;

"(ii) release pending imposition or execution of sentence, appeal of sentence or conviction, or completion of sentence, for any offense under Federal, State, or local law; or

"(iii) probation or parole for any offense under Federal, State, or local law; or

"(B) is not a citizen of the United States or lawfully admitted for permanent residence, as defined in section 101(a)(20) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(20)); and

"(2) the person may flee or pose a danger to any other person or the community;

he shall order the detention of the person, for a period of not more than ten days, excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays, and direct the attorney for the Government to notify the appropriate court, probation or parole official, or State or local law enforcement official, or the appropriate official of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. If the official fails or declines to take the person into custody during that period, the person shall be treated in accordance with the other provisions of this section, notwithstanding the applicability of other provisions of law governing release pending trial or deportation or exclusion proceedings. If temporary detention is sought under paragraph (1)(B), the person has the burden of proving to the court that he is a citizen of the United States or is lawfully admitted for permanent residence.

"(e) DETENTION.—If, after a hearing pursuant to the provisions of subsection (f), the judicial officer finds that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community, he shall order the detention of the person prior to trial. In a case described in (f)(1), a rebuttable presumption arises that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the safety of any other person and the community if the judge finds that—

"(1) the person has been convicted of a Federal offense that is described in subsection (f)(1), or of a State or local offense that would have been an offense described in subsection (f)(1) if a circumstance giving rise to Federal jurisdiction had existed;

"(2) the offense described in paragraph (1) was committed while the person was on release pending trial for a Federal, State, or local offense; and

"(3) a period of not more than five years has elapsed since the date of conviction, or the release of the person from imprisonment, for the offense described in paragraph (1), whichever is later.

Subject to rebuttal by the person, it shall be presumed that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of the community if the judicial officer finds that there is probable cause to believe that the person committed an offense for which a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years or more is prescribed in the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 801 et seq.), the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 951 et seq.), section 1 of the Act of September 15, 1980 (21 U.S.C. 955a), or an offense under section 924(c) of title 18 of the United States Code.

"(f) DETENTION HEARING.—The judicial officer shall hold a hearing to determine whether any condition or combination of conditions set forth in subsection (c) will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community in a case—

"(1) upon motion of the attorney for the Government, that involves—

"(A) a crime of violence;

"(B) an offense for which the maximum sentence is life imprisonment or death;

"(C) an offense for which a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years or more is prescribed in the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 801 et seq.), the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 951 et seq.), or section 1 of the Act of September 15, 1980 (21 U.S.C. 955a); or

"(D) any felony committed after the person had been convicted of two or more prior offenses described in subparagraphs (A) through (C), or two or more State or local offenses that would have been offenses described in subparagraphs (A) through (C) if a circumstance giving rise to Federal jurisdiction had existed; or

"(2) Upon motion of the attorney for the Government or upon the judicial officer's own motion, that involves—

"(A) a serious risk that the person will flee;

"(B) a serious risk that the person will obstruct or attempt to obstruct justice, or threaten, injure, or intimidate, or attempt to threaten, injure, or intimidate, a prospective witness or juror.

The hearing shall be held immediately upon the person's first appearance before the judicial officer unless that person, or the attorney for the Government, seeks a continuance. Except for good cause, a continuance on motion of the person may not exceed five days, and a continuance on motion of the attorney for the Government may not exceed three days. During a continuance, the person shall be detained, and the judicial officer, on motion of the attorney for the Government or on his own motion, may order that, while in custody, a person who appears to be a narcotics addict receive a medical examination to determine whether he is an addict. At the hearing, the person has the right to be represented by counsel, and, if he is financially unable to obtain adequate representation, to have counsel appointed for him. The person shall be afforded an opportunity to testify, to present witnesses on his own behalf, to cross-examine witnesses who appear at the hearing, and to present information by proffer or otherwise. The rules concerning admissibility of evidence in criminal trials do not apply to the presentation and consideration of information at the hearing. The facts the judicial officer uses to support a finding pursuant to subsection (e) that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the safety of any other person and the community shall be supported by clear and convincing evidence. The person may be detained pending completion of the hearing.

"(g) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED.—The judicial officer shall, in determining whether there are conditions of release that will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community, take into account the available information concerning—

"(1) the nature and circumstances of the offense charged, including whether the offense is a crime of violence or involves a narcotic drug;

"(2) the weight of the evidence against the person;

"(3) the history and characteristics of the person, including—

"(A) his character, physical and mental condition, family ties, employment, financial resources, length of residence in the community, community ties, past conduct, history relating to drug or alcohol abuse, criminal history, and record concerning appearance at court proceedings; and

"(B) whether, at the time of the current offense or arrest, he was on probation, on parole, or on other release pending trial, sentencing, appeal, or completion of sentence for an offense under Federal, State, or local law; and

"(4) the nature and seriousness of the danger to any person or the community that would be posed by the person's release. In considering the conditions of release described in subsection (c)(2)(K) or (c)(2)(L), the judicial officer may upon his own motion, or shall upon the motion of the Government, conduct an inquiry into the source of the property to be designated for potential forfeiture or offered as collateral to secure a bond, and shall decline to accept the designation, or the use as collateral, of property that, because of its source, will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required.

"(h) CONTENTS OF RELEASE ORDER.—In a release order issued pursuant to the provisions of subsection (b) or (c), the judicial officer shall—

"(1) include a written statement that sets forth all the conditions to which the release is subject, in a manner sufficiently clear and specific to serve as a guide for the person's conduct; and

"(2) advise the person of—

"(A) the penalties for violating a condition of release, including the penalties for committing an offense while on pretrial release;

"(B) the consequences of violating a condition of release, including the immediate issuance of a warrant for the person's arrest; and

"(C) the provisions of sections 1503 of this title (relating to intimidation of witnesses, jurors, and officers of the court), 1510 (relating to obstruction of criminal investigations), 1512 (tampering with a witness, victim, or an informant), and 1513 (retaliating against a witness, victim, or an informant).

"(i) CONTENTS OF DETENTION ORDER.—In a detention order issued pursuant to the provisions of subsection (e), the judicial officer shall—

"(1) include written findings of fact and a written statement of the reasons for the detention;

"(2) direct that the person be committed to the custody of the Attorney General for confinement in a corrections facility separate, to the extent practicable, from persons awaiting or serving sentences or being held in custody pending appeal;

"(3) direct that the person be afforded reasonable opportunity for private consultation with his counsel; and

"(4) direct that, on order of a court of the United States or on request of an attorney for the Government, the person in charge of the corrections facility in which the person is confined deliver the person to a United States marshal for the purpose of an appearance in connection with a court proceeding.

The judicial officer may, by subsequent order, permit the temporary release of the person, in the custody of a United States marshal or another appropriate person, to the extent that the judicial officer determines such release to be necessary for preparation of the person's defense or for another compelling reason.

"(j) PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE.—Nothing in this section shall be construed as modifying or limiting the presumption of innocence.

"§ 3143. Release or detention of a defendant pending sentence or appeal

"(a) RELEASE OR DETENTION PENDING SENTENCE.—The judicial officer shall order that a person who has been found guilty of an offense and who is waiting imposition or execution of sentence, be detained, unless the judicial officer finds by clear and convincing evidence that the person is not likely to flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community if released pursuant to section 3142 (b) or (c). If the judicial officer makes such a finding, he shall order the release of the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142 (b) or (c).

"(b) RELEASE OR DETENTION PENDING APPEAL BY THE DEFENDANT.—The judicial officer shall order that a person who has been found guilty of an offense and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, and who has filed an appeal or a petition for a writ of certiorari, be detained, unless the judicial officer finds—

"(1) by clear and convincing evidence that the person is not likely to flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community if released pursuant to section 3142 (b) or (c); and

"(2) that the appeal is not for purpose of delay and raises a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in reversal or an order for a new trial.

If the judicial officer makes such findings, he shall order the release of the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142 (b) or (c).

"(c) RELEASE OR DETENTION PENDING APPEAL BY THE GOVERNMENT.—The judicial officer shall treat a defendant in a case in which an appeal has been taken by the United States pursuant to the provisions of section 3731 of this title, in accordance with the provisions of section 3142, unless the defendant is otherwise subject to a release or detention order.

"§ 3144. Release or detention of a material witness

"If it appears from an affidavit filed by a party that the testimony of a person is material in a criminal proceeding, and if it is shown that it may become impracticable to secure the presence of the person by subpena, a judicial officer may order the arrest of the person and treat the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142. No material witness may be detained because of inability to comply with any condition of release if the testimony of such witness can adequately be secured by deposition, and if further detention is not necessary to prevent a failure of justice. Release of a material witness may be delayed for a reasonable period of time until the deposition of the witness can be taken pursuant to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

"§ 3145. Review and appeal of a release or detention order

"(a) REVIEW OF A RELEASE ORDER.—If a person is ordered released by a magistrate, or by a person other than a judge of a court having original jurisdiction over the offense and other than a Federal appellate court—

"(1) the attorney for the Government may file, with the court having original jurisdiction over the offense, a motion for revocation of the order or amendment of the conditions of release; and

"(2) the person may file, with the court having original jurisdiction over the offense, a motion for amendment of the conditions of release.

The motion shall be determined promptly.

"(b) REVIEW OF A DETENTION ORDER.—If a person is ordered detained by a magistrate, or by a person other than a judge of a court having original jurisdiction over the offense and other than a Federal appellate court, the person may file, with the court having original jurisdiction over the offense, a motion for revocation or amendment of the order. The motion shall be determined promptly.

"(c) APPEAL FROM A RELEASE OR DETENTION ORDER.—An appeal from a release or detention order, or from a decision denying revocation or amendment of such an order, is governed by the provisions of section 1291 of title 28 and section 3731 of this title. The appeal shall be determined promptly.

"§ 3146. Penalty for failure to appear

"(a) OFFENSE.—A person commits an offense if, after having been released pursuant to this chapter—

"(1) he knowingly fails to appear before a court as required by the conditions of his release; or

"(2) he knowingly fails to surrender for service of sentence pursuant to a court order.

"(b) GRADING.—If the person was released—

"(1) in connection with a charge of, or while awaiting sentence, surrender for service of sentence, or appeal or certiorari after conviction, for—

"(A) an offense punishable by death, life imprisonment, or imprisonment for a term of fifteen years or more, he shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned for not more than ten years, or both;

"(B) an offense punishable by imprisonment for a term of five or more years, but less than fifteen years, he shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both;

"(C) any other felony, he shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; or

"(D) a misdemeanor, he shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both; or

"(2) for appearance as a material witness, he shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

A term of imprisonment imposed pursuant to this section shall be consecutive to the sentence of imprisonment for any other offense.

"(c) AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE.—It is an affirmative defense to a prosecution under this section that uncontrollable circumstances prevented the person from appearing or surrendering, and that the person did not contribute to the creation of such circumstances in reckless disregard of the requirement that he appear or surrender, and that he appeared or surrendered as soon as such circumstances ceased to exist.

"(d) DECLARATION OF FORFEITURE.—If a person fails to appear before a court as required, and the person executed an appearance bond pursuant to section 3142(b) or is subject to the release condition set forth in section 3142(c)(2)(K), or (c)(2)(L), the judicial officer may, regardless of whether the person has been charged with an offense under this section, declare any property designated pursuant to that section to be forfeited to the United States.

"§ 3147. Penalty for an offense committed while on release

"A person convicted of an offense committed while released pursuant to this chapter shall be sentenced, in addition to the sentence prescribed for the offense to—

"(1) a term of imprisonment of not less than two years and not more than ten years if the offense is a felony; or

"(2) a term of imprisonment of not less than ninety days and not more than one year if the offense is a misdemeanor.

A term of imprisonment imposed pursuant to this section shall be consecutive to any other sentence of imprisonment.

"§ 3148. Sanctions for violation of a release condition

"(a) AVAILABLE SANCTIONS.—A person who has been released pursuant to the provisions of section 3142, and who has violated a condition of his release, is subject to a revocation of release, an order of detention, and a prosecution for contempt of court.

"(b) REVOCATION OF RELEASE.—The attorney for the Government may initiate a proceeding for revocation of an order of release by filing a motion with the district court. A judicial officer may issue a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with violating a condition of release, and the person shall be brought before a judicial officer in the district in which his arrest was ordered for a proceeding in accordance with this section. To the extent practicable, a person charged with violating the condition of his release that he not commit a Federal, State, or local crime during the period of release shall be brought before the judicial officer who ordered the release and whose order is alleged to have been violated. The judicial officer shall enter an order of revocation and detention if, after a hearing, the judicial officer—

"(1) finds that there is—

"(A) probable cause to believe that the person has committed a Federal, State, or local crime while on release; or

"(B) clear and convincing evidence that the person has violated any other condition of his release; and

"(2) finds that—

"(A) based on the factors set forth in section 3142(g), there is no condition or combination of conditions of release that will assure that the person will not flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community; or

"(B) the person is unlikely to abide by any condition or combination of conditions of release.

If there is probable cause to believe that, while on release, the person committed a Federal, State, or local felony, a rebuttable presumption arises that no condition or combination of conditions will assure that the person will not pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community. If the judicial officer finds that there are conditions of release that will assure that the person will not flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community, and that the person will abide by such conditions, he shall treat the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142 and may amend the conditions of release accordingly.

"(c) PROSECUTION FOR CONTEMPT.—The judge may commence a prosecution for contempt, pursuant to the provisions of section 401, if the person has violated a condition of his release.

"§ 3149. Surrender of an offender by a surety

"A person charged with an offense, who is released upon the execution of an appearance bond with a surety, may be arrested by the surety, and if so arrested, shall be delivered promptly to a United States marshal and brought before a judicial officer. The judicial officer shall determine in accordance with the provisions of section 3148(b) whether to revoke the release of the person, and may absolve the surety of responsibility to pay all or part of the bond in accordance with the provisions of Rule 46 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The person so committed shall be held in official detention until released pursuant to this chapter or another provision of law.

"§ 3150. Applicability to a case removed from a State court

"The provisions of this chapter apply to a criminal case removed to a Federal court from a State court.".

(b) Section 3154 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in subsection (1), by striking out "and recommend appropriate release conditions for each such person" and inserting in lieu thereof "and, where appropriate, include a recommendation as to whether such individual should be released or detained and, if release is recommended, recommend appropriate conditions of release"; and

(2) in subsection (2), by striking out "section 3146(e) or section 3147" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 3145".

(c) Section 3156(a) of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "3146" and inserting in lieu thereof "3141";

(2) in paragraph (1)—

(A) by striking out "bail or otherwise" and inserting in lieu thereof "detain or"; and

(B) by deleting "and" at the end thereof;

(3) in paragraph (2), by striking out the period at the end and inserting in lieu thereof "; and";

(4) by adding after paragraph (2) the following new paragraphs:

"(3) The term 'felony' means an offense punishable by a maximum term of imprisonment of more than one year; and

"(4) The term 'crime of violence' means—

"(A) an offense that has as an element of the offense the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another; or

"(B) any other offense that is a felony and that, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense."; and

(5) in subsection (b)(1), by striking out "bail or otherwise" and inserting in lieu thereof "detain or".

(d) The item relating to chapter 207 in the analysis of part II of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"207. Release and detention pending judicial proceedings ..... 3141".

(e)(1) The caption of chapter 207 is amended to read as follows:

"CHAPTER 207—RELEASE AND DETENTION PENDING JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS".

(2) The section analysis for chapter 207 is amended by striking out the items relating to section 3141 through 3151 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"3141. Release and detention authority generally.
"3142. Release or detention of a defendant pending trial.
"3143. Release or detention of a defendant pending sentence or appeal.
"3144. Release or detention of a material witness.
"3145. Review and appeal of a release or detention order.
"3146. Penalty for failure to appear.
"3147. Penalty for an offense committed while on release.
"3148. Sanctions for violation of a release condition.
"3149. Surrender of an offender by a surety.
"3150. Applicability to a case removed from a State court."

SEC. 3. Chapter 203 of title 18, United States Code, is amended as follows:

(a) The last sentence of section 3041 is amended by striking out "determining to hold the prisoner for trial" and inserting in lieu thereof "determining, pursuant to the provisions of section 3142 of this title, whether to detain or conditionally release the prisoner prior to trial".

(b) The second paragraph of section 3042 is amended by striking out "imprisoned or admitted to bail" and inserting in lieu thereof "detained or conditionally released pursuant to section 3142 of this title".

(c) Section 3043 is repealed.

(d) The following new section is added after section 3061:

"§ 3062. General arrest authority for violation of release conditions

"A law enforcement officer, who is authorized to arrest for an offense committed in his presence, may arrest a person who is released pursuant to chapter 207 if the officer has reasonable grounds to believe that the person is violating, in his presence, a condition imposed on the person pursuant to section 3142 (c)(2)(D), (c)(2)(E), (c)(2)(H), (c)(2)(I), or (c)(2)(M), or, if the violation involves a failure to remain in a specified institution as required, a condition imposed pursuant to section 3142(c)(2)(J).".

(e) The section analysis is amended—

(1) by amending the item relating to section 3043 to read as follows:

"3043. Repealed."; and

(2) by adding the following new item after the item relating to section 3061:

"3062. General arrest authority for violation of release conditions.".

SEC. 4. Section 3731 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after the second paragraph the following new paragraph:

"An appeal by the United States shall lie to a court of appeals from a decision or order, entered by a district court of the United States, granting the release of a person charged with or convicted of an offense, or denying a motion for revocation of, or modification of the conditions of, a decision or order granting release.".

SEC. 5. The second paragraph of section 3772 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out "bail" and inserting in lieu thereof "release pending appeal."

SEC. 6. Section 4282 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(a) by striking out "and not admitted to bail" and substituting "and detained pursuant to chapter 207"; and

(b) by striking out "and unable to make bail".

SEC. 7. Section 636 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking out "impose conditions of release under section 3146 of title 18" and inserting in lieu thereof "issue orders pursuant to section 3142 of title 18 concerning release or detention of persons pending trial".

SEC. 8. The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure are amended as follows:

(a) Rule 5(c) is amended by striking out "shall admit the defendant to bail" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall detain or conditionally release the defendant".

(b) The second sentence of rule 15(a) is amended by striking out "committed for failure to give bail to appear to testify at a trial or hearing" and inserting in lieu thereof "detained pursuant to section 3144 of title 18, United States Code".

(c) Rule 40(f) is amended to read as follows:

"(f) RELEASE OR DETENTION.—If a person was previously detained or conditionally released, pursuant to chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, in another district where a warrant, information or indictment issued, the Federal magistrate shall take into account the decision previously made and the reasons set forth therefor, if any, but will not be bound by that decision. If the Federal magistrate amends the release or detention decision or alters the conditions of release, he shall set forth the reasons for his action in writing.".

(d) Rule 46 is amended—

(1) in subdivision (a), by striking out "§ 3146, § 3148, or § 3149" and inserting in lieu thereof "§§ 3142 and 3144";

(2) in subdivision (c), by striking out "3148" and inserting in lieu thereof "3143";

(3) by amending subdivision (e)(2) to read as follows:

"(2) SETTING ASIDE.—The court may direct that a forfeiture be set aside in whole or in part, upon such conditions as the court may impose, if a person released upon execution of an appearance bond with a surety is subsequently surrendered by the surety into custody or if it otherwise appears that justice does not require the forfeiture."; and

(4) by adding the following new subdivision at the end thereof:

"(h) FORFEITURE OF PROPERTY.—

"Nothing in this rule or in chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, shall prevent the court from disposing of any charge by entering an order directing forfeiture of property pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 3142(c)(2)(K) if the value of the property is an amount that would be an appropriate sentence after conviction of the offense charged and if such forfeiture is authorized by statute or regulation.".

(e) Rule 54(b)(3) is amended by striking out "under 18 U.S.C. § 3043, and".

SEC. 9. Rule 9(c) of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure is amended by striking out "3148" and inserting in lieu thereof "3143", and following the word "community", inserting "and that the appeal is not for purpose of delay and raises a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in reversal or in an order for a new trial".

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, since we are dealing now with the substitute, which I believe substitutes the language of one bill for another, I ask unanimous consent that if this substitute amendment is adopted, it be treated as original text for the purpose of further amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute (No. 2694) was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, S. 215, the Bail Reform Act of 1984, is the product of several years of deliberation by the Committee on the Judiciary. It is comparable to the bill which was reported by the committee and passed by the full Senate almost unanimously as part of the crime package in the 97th Congress. I am pleased to note that identical provisions constitute the first title of the President's Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, as passed by the Senate yesterday.

Mr. President, in my estimation, the Bail Reform Act of 1984 is one of the most important criminal measures that this body will act upon in this or any other Congress. Its significance is twofold. First, it will address problems in the Bail Reform Act of 1966, which have plagued defendants and the judiciary alike. Second, and perhaps more important, it will send a clear message to career criminals and drug traffickers that the elected representatives of the American people are determined to take strong measures to fight the crime wave that has infested this country for far too long.

The Bail Reform Act of 1983 makes several important changes in existing law. First, it includes a commonsense provision which would permit Federal judges in noncapital cases to consider the danger that a defendant's release might pose to the community. Federal judges are currently faced with a deadly Hobson's choice. If they comply with the law, they may be forced to release dangerous drug traffickers and other criminals without considering the danger that they may pose to the community. On the other hand, if they may fulfill what they consider to be their moral duty by considering any potential danger in a sub rosa manner, they must ignore the spirit of the law by imposing high money bond. S. 215 corrects these deficiencies by permitting the consideration of public safety in imposing release conditions and by permitting the pretrial detention of persons for whom no conditions of release will be likely to insure appearance at trial or community safety. This system, which contains numerous due process protections for the defendant, will ultimately accrue to the benefit of defendants by insuring truth in detention. Federal judges will no longer have the incentive to impose high money bond in order to detain defendants without a due process hearing.

The second major change made by this bill is that it would reverse the presumption in favor of releasing individuals who have been found guilty and are awaiting sentencing or appeal. Once someone has been found guilty, there is no longer a presumption of innocence and the burden should be on that person to demonstrate that he will not flee or pose a danger to the community, if released.

Finally, S. 215 recognizes the special problems that major drug traffickers pose in the Federal bail system. The committee has received considerable testimony about the ability of these criminals to post bail in the millions of dollars. Because forfeited bond is merely a cost of doing their heinous business, there is no incentive for them to appear at trial. Accordingly, S. 215 permits Federal judges to refuse to accept anything of value offered as bond if the judge determines that the source of the collateral, such as illegal profits, would not insure appearance at trial or community safety.

Although the Congressional Budget Office cost estimate suggests that the authorized cost of S. 215 to the Federal Government will approach some $45 million after 3 years of operation and then level off, as the sponsor of S. 215, I believe that the costs to the Federal Government will be incidental. While certain career criminals and major drug traffickers will be incarcerated for longer periods, the bill is also designed to eliminate the unnecessary detention of persons currently detained solely because of an inability to post high money bond. The committee, therefore, anticipates that S. 215 will result in incidental additional costs, which will be absorbed by the agencies involved. As a result, S. 215 should have no impact on the appropriations process.

Mr. President, S. 215 is a fair and constitutional response to the problem of bail crime which our citizens frequently identify as an aspect of the crime problem in this country which concerns them most. I am hopeful that the other body will act on this important measure in the near future so that legislation can be sent to the President for his signature by the end of this session.

Mr. President, I now yield to the able distinguished Senator from Maine.

AMENDMENT NO. 2695

(Purpose: To amend speedy trial provision of title 18, U.S.C.)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the bill as amended and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL) for himself, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. CRANSTON, proposes an amendment numbered 2695.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill, add the following new section:

"SEC. 10. Section 3164 of title 18, United States Code is amended—

(a) by striking in subsection (b) the phrases "(a)(1) or" and "continuous detention or";

(b) by striking in subsection (c) the words "ninety day", and inserting in lieu thereof "sixty day";

(c) by relettering subsection (c) as subsection (d); and

(d) by inserting a new subsection (c) as follows:

(c) The trial of any person described in subsection (a)(1) of this section shall commence not later than sixty days following the beginning of such continuous detention. The periods of delay enumerated in section 3161(h) are excluded in computing the time limitation specified in this section."

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the amendment I am offering today is an amendment which, earlier this week, Senator SPECTER, I, and others were asked not to push because the bill before us then, the Comprehensive Crime Control Act, was a package and its proponents were anxious to maintain it as a package. So earlier this week I did not ask for a rollcall vote on this amendment.

Today, however, we have before us the same provisions to which this amendment was directed as an individual bill. Now there is absolutely no danger of unravelling a carefully crafted package, so I am again offering this amendment for Senator SPECTER, myself, and others, and asking for a rollcall vote because I believe that the individual Members of this body should have an opportunity to clearly express themselves on this issue.

The amendment is a simple one, and its purpose is straightforward. It does not undermine or weaken in any way whatsoever the fundamental changes in bail procedures this Senate adopted yesterday. It simply seeks to expedite the trial of anyone held under the preventive detention provisions that this change in law will put into effect.

The bill we passed yesterday makes broad and sweeping changes in the Bail Reform Act of 1966 to allow a judge to consider a defendant's dangerousness to the community in setting bail. I believe these changes are both necessary and appropriate.

The Bail Reform Act of 1966 allowed just one factor to be considered in setting bail: The likelihood that a defendant will appear in court for trial or other proceedings. A Federal judge may not now take into account in setting bail a defendant's dangerousness to the community.

As a former Federal prosecutor and Federal judge, I am acutely aware of the difficulty that current law poses. Federal judges are now forced to choose between setting inordinately high monetary bail, which the Bail Reform Act discourages, or permitting a dangerous individual to be released back into the community pending trial.

In the 17 years since the Bail Reform Act was passed, it has been the subject of much criticism—and much of it has been well-warranted criticism—because of this inflexibility.

The primary purpose of the act was to deemphasize the use of monetary bonds in the Federal courts because that often results in disproportionate pretrial incarceration of indigent defendants. The purpose of bail reform was to provide a range of alternative forms of pretrial release flexible enough to safely set conditions of release appropriate to each individual case.

In the 17 years of experience we have had with the law, it has come under criticism as too liberally permitting pretrial release and not allowing judges to give sufficient weight to any other factors involved, particularly the safety of the community.

The need to allow a judge to consider the dangerousness of a defendant to the community when bail or release is contemplated is to me obvious. And it is supported by studies. A 1981 Lazar Institute study found that approximately 1 of 6 defendants awaiting trial was rearrested during the pretrial period. And of those, more than one-third had multiple arrests.

No society can or will maintain its essential civil liberties if a majority of its citizens comes to believe that the Government cannot or will not protect them against random crime. Current bail and pretrial release practice is an area in which the public perception is that apprehension and arrest provide no assurance for public safety.

The bill before us now addresses the inadequacies in current law by making the safety of the community a factor in the judge's decision on pretrial release. It will allow a judge, following a detention hearing at which the defendant can present evidence and witnesses in his own behalf, to order detention if the finding is that "no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the appearance of the person and the safety of any other person and the community."

This is an effort to strike a balance between the rights of any citizen accused—but not convicted—of a crime and the legitimate interests of the people of a community to be secure in their persons and homes.

The principle on which our system of criminal justice is based, the principle which gives it legitimacy, is the presumption that a person is innocent until proven guilty. That is the bedrock right on which individual Americans are assured that they cannot be deprived of their liberty unless they have been proven—in a court after a trial, before a jury of their peers—to have violated the law.

This is a principle which has come into increasing conflict with the realities of modern industrialized, increasingly urban society. Pretrial release of accused individuals, coupled with crowded court dockets, at times results in the commission of further crimes by those released. The public is justifiably outraged when a suspect free on bail commits a crime.

Allowing a judge to order a defendant detained until trial conflicts with but does not undermine the principle of innocent until proven guilty. If it is done with appropriate safeguards, it is a means of satisfying the legitimate public demand for community safety without undermining the rights of the defendant.

The District of Columbia Court of Appeals, hearing a petition against the constitutionality of the preventive detention statute in force in the District, examined in depth the question of bail rights, of pretrial release rights, and the legitimacy of government detention orders under carefully written safeguards. One of the findings of that court, in the case of United States v. Edwards, was that the 60-day limit on preventive detention in the D.C. law was an integral part of the circumstances in which preventive detention does not contravene constitutional guarantees. The court said:

> Significantly, pretrial detention is closely circumscribed so as not to go beyond the need to protect the safety of the community pending the detainee's trial. Such detention is not to exceed 60 days, by which time either the detainee must be brought to trial or bail must be set.

The bail reform legislation before us, which the Senate approved yesterday, is generally drawn to remain within the limits set by that judgment and the District of Columbia law.

But in one significant feature it fails to do so.

The bail reform provision the Senate approved contains no time limitation beyond those limits otherwise applied by the Federal Speedy Trial Act.

The District of Columbia law contains a provision to expedite the trial of those under preventive detention. Such a feature was not identified by the appeals court as central to its determination of when pretrial detention is carefully and narrowly drawn. But in the absence of either a determinate detention period—which the court did single out for comment—or a directive requiring expedited trials for detained suspects, I am concerned that the reforms we have passed may not, in fact, withstand constitutional challenges.

The amendment I am offering is modest in reach and scope. It does not amend the Speedy Trial Act to require trial within 60 days for all defendants. Those free on pretrial release would remain subject to the 90-day limit now in the law.

But for suspects detained prior to trial—and for them only—my amendment would require that trial begin in 60 days, subject to the same kinds of legitimate delays already outlined in the Speedy Trial Act itself.

The amendment specifically excludes from the 60-day period those delays which are recognized within the Speedy Trial Act. They include, for instance, delays when a defendant must undergo psychiatric testing to determine mental competency; delays because witnesses are unavailable; certain continuances granted by a judge; or the time involved in transporting a defendant to another district. In fact, 17 specific legitimate causes of delayed trials, recognized by the Speedy Trial Act, are also recognized by this amendment.

This amendment is not an effort to curtail or undermine the reasoned conclusion of a judge that pretrial detention is necessary to protect the community safety. Nor would it subject either defense or prosecuting attorneys to unworkable time limits. It is an effort to incorporate into the Federal bail reforms we have just approved with the kind of conditions the appeals court has identified as essential components to a constitutional pretrial detention statute.

I believe deeply, after a lifetime spent in dealing with the criminal justice system, that courts should have the authority to detain defendants prior to trial. At the same time, I believe equally strongly that the government has an overriding obligation to expedite the trial of those so detained because their detention conflicts directly with the presumption of innocence which is at the foundation of our criminal justice system.

Frankly, I cannot comprehend opposition to this rather modest proposal. It does not undermine the pending bail reform. It does not impose an unwarranted workload on Federal prosecutors or defense lawyers.

In fact, what it does do is preserve an element of constitutionality that has already been identified by one court, in a statute that we can confidently expect will be subject to substantial court challenges.

One of the few arguments made against this amendment is that we already have a Speedy Trial Act in place that says a defendant must be tried within 90 days, so what difference does another 30 days in jail make?

The first answer to that is that if you are in jail and have not been convicted of anything and you are in fact innocent, then even 1 day in jail is too much. And every day in this country, in every State, people are charged with crimes for which they are not convicted and of which they are in fact innocent.

We have an effective, workable criminal justice system. It is the best that human minds have been able to devise, but it is not infallible. Mistakes have been made. Mistakes are being made. Mistakes will be made. And we have an obligation to minimize the adverse impact of those mistakes, especially when we can maintain the principle that we are all working toward.

The second argument—and I think it is equally significant—is that if this bill becomes law, it will become a model for the 50 States, many of which are considering changes in their bail laws. And while many States have laws or court rules requiring criminal trials to be held within certain times, they are not uniform and vary widely.

As a practical matter, most of the crimes that directly affect community safety in this country are tried in State courts, not Federal courts. The number of crimes of violence prosecuted under Federal law is very small. The overwhelming majority of violent crimes are prosecuted under State laws, as is appropriate.

But when States do not have a Speedy Trial Act, or have varying time limits, and when States model their legislation on the Federal law—and many do—we run the risk of having many Americans in jail who have not been convicted of anything, who are not in fact guilty of anything, and without any standard limit to their detention.

Not only does such an outcome offend our most basic principles, it could easily undermine the entire bail reform statute which has been written and passed by this Senate.

Adoption of my amendment would not alter or weaken the bail changes we have already adopted in the slightest degree. It would not limit the ability of judges to determine that community or individual safety is best served by detaining certain suspects. It would not limit the ability of government prosecutors to ask for detention when their judgment dictates. It would not prevent an adequate defense for anyone so held.

What it would do is to maintain the essential temporary nature of pretrial detention as a matter of law, and to help insulate such a statute from constitutional challenge. I believe it should be adopted.

Mr. President, I hope that those Senators who are listening in their offices, or their staffs, will focus on what is a central issue involved here. We are dealing with a situation in which American citizens are charged with a crime and put in jail before a trial is held to determine whether they are guilty of that crime.

As I said earlier, that conflicts directly with the fundamental principle on which our entire judicial system is based. That is the individual is presumed innocent until proven guilty.

All this amendment says is that if you are going to put a person in jail before a trial, you ought to have the trial as promptly as reasonably possible, consistent with the interest of society and the interest of the defendant. That is all it says. Sixty days.

I have personally been involved in a large number of criminal trials as a prosecuting attorney and for a short time as a Federal judge. I can say to Members of the Senate this is not an unworkable limitation. There remain the opportunities for continuances which are already set forth in the Speedy Trial Act, including a catchall provision that permits a judge to grant a continuance if the interests of justice are best served thereby.

All this does, again, is to say if you are going to have a person put in jail before he has been convicted of anything, then in the United States of America you ought to have a trial within a reasonably prompt time.

Mr. President, I note the presence on the floor of my colleague, the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has been a leader in this effort. I yield the floor to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank my colleague for yielding to me at this time. I commend Senator MITCHELL for his leadership in this very important matter. I am pleased to join with the distinguished Senator from Maine on this amendment at this time.

The history of this effort, briefly stated, began in the Senate Judiciary Committee in the 97th Congress. This legislation was considered at that time. I had proposed an amendment in the Judiciary Committee to limit the period of detention to 60 days instead of 90. When the bill came before the full Senate, I proposed an amendment on September 30, 1982.

Senator MITCHELL has just noted that he and I proposed an amendment this past Tuesday, but it was withdrawn from consideration in the Comprehensive Crime Control Act as a matter of expediting the disposition of that bill and in deference to the wishes of the distinguished chairman of the committee, Senator THURMOND. At that time, there was recognition that there would be a full opportunity to present this issue at this time during consideration of the separate bail bill, and we do so now.

The entire subject of preventive detention is a complex one. It represents a rather abrupt change in American criminal procedure to call for detention prior to conviction.

There is no principle of American jurisprudence more fundamental than that a person is presumed innocent until proven guilty. Pending the proof of guilt, that person has traditionally been entitled to be at liberty on bail. Bail has heretofore been set solely on the consideration of guaranteeing the appearance of the defendant at trial.

So it is an abrupt departure to say that from this day forward, or once the new bail law is fully effective through passage in both Houses and the signature of the Chief Executive, that the rule will be shifted so we can detain a person prior to the time he has been convicted. Why is such a change necessary?

The experience, and the bitter experience, in this country has been that many people who are on bail commit repeat offenses. In the course of some 14 years of law enforcement and 8 years as district attorney in Philadelphia, I have seen many such cases, where defendants on bail for robbery commit other armed robberies and sometimes murder in the process. Defendants on bail for burglary have committed other burglaries while on bail and sometimes murder in the process. Defendants on bail for rape, arson, and a wide variety of other serious charges commit other crimes while they are out on bail. We thus have an intolerable situation as a matter of public safety, leading to a considerable interest in having a remedy for this serious problem.

In the District of Columbia a preventive detention measure was enacted, has been in effect for some time, and is working reasonably well.

When we come to the issue as to how long the period of detention should be, there has been a debate as to what is reasonable. The legislation as currently drafted provides for a 90-day period.

It is my sense that the period ought to be substantially less than 90 days. There is much to be said for imposing a period of time substantially briefer than 60 days, where the State in effect says, in the interest of the security of the people of the State, there ought to be this unusual remedy of detention awaiting trial.

What, then, is realistic? What, then, is reasonable? Like Senator MITCHELL, I too have been a prosecuting attorney. Where there is sufficient evidence to warrant an arrest; that is, probable cause, there could be a case made out that a trial should be commenced within a short period of time. If you seek a preliminary injunction in a civil case without a hearing, the maximum period of time you can have a preliminary injunction remain in effect is 5 days. Perhaps the law ought to be established that if you are going to keep someone in detention, there ought to be a 5-day limit wherein a person must be brought to trial or he cannot be detained.

Well, the prosecutors in this country, unfortunately, have limited resources. The problem that I faced as district attorney in Philadelphia is the problem that virtually all prosecutors face in this country.

The Department of Justice says it needs 90 days, that 60 days would be insufficient.

My own sense is that there are sufficient reasons already provided in the Speedy Trial Act for needed extensions beyond the 60 days or beyond the 90 days. If some real justification arises, that extension of time can be obtained.

A more direct answer to the problem of resources is that if the Government wishes to hold a defendant in detention, then the Government ought to provide resources which the prosecutor needs and the court needs to bring the defendant to trial within a very brief period of time. My own judgment is that 60 days is the farthest stretch that a person ought to be held in detention before the trial is commenced and before his guilt or innocence is established.

In setting the 60-day period, my own thinking initially was to follow the standard of the District of Columbia, which originally had a 60-day period for pretrial detention. That rule was tested in the case of United States against Edwards. In 1981, the constitutionality of preventive detention was upheld by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

The District of Columbia 60-day period has since been extended to 90 days, but its constitutionality has not been tested. As Senator MITCHELL has pointed out, a 90-day period runs a serious constitutional risk.

In supporting an amendment to limit the detention to 60 days, it is my legal opinion that such a 30-day reduction in the bill as it stands is an irreducible minimum. The 60-day period ought to be established and the prosecutors will quickly learn to work with it. If the prosecutors find that their resources are insufficient, that is a matter we can address in the Congress. We really ought to be providing the Department of Justice and the U.S. attorneys around this country with adequate resources to discharge the very important roles they have, not only in the trial of those who are subject to preventive detention, but the trials and the prosecution of other important cases.

I believe also, as Senator MITCHELL has pointed out, that the Federal legislation will be a significant role model for the States; the period of time we establish for preventive detention will inevitably be a model to be followed elsewhere and the Federal Government ought to lead the way.

It is very important that, in our quest for adequate law enforcement, we always maintain a sharp eye on the rights of the accused. That has been the hallmark of the British and American systems of justice. It distinguishes our country from most other judicial systems in the world. It is a hallmark of fairness and decency, one upon which we must always insist. The maintenance of those standards would, in my judgment, require that the maximum period for preventive detention be the 60 days as provided in this amendment.

I thank the Chair. I yield the floor.

Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the committee has asked for a quorum call at this time, so I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARNER). The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL). It would decrease the time limit for starting the trial under the Speedy Trial Act (18 U.S.C. 3161 et seq.) of a person detained awaiting trial from 90 to 60 days, excluding the periods of delay specified in other parts of the act. Failure to commence trial within the specified time would require release of defendants already determined to be unacceptable flight or danger risks.

Mr. President, the period we are talking about spans the time from arrest through a grand jury indictment to commencement of the trial. The situation would typically involve the most serious crimes and complex drug trafficking cases. Not only must the government utilize this limited time to locate witnesses, find and evaluate evidence, obtain a grand jury indictment, and generally prepare for trial, there are some districts in the United States that do not even have grand juries sit at frequent enough intervals to meet such a deadline.

What is going to happen to them? Others are so congested with large drug and other major cases as to be unable to absorb any more time restrictions. In addition, some districts have relatively high rates of pretrial detention for readily identifiable reasons while other districts do not have such a need. Such comparisons led the Department of Justice to observe that, for example, "[t]he impact of the proposed 60 day deadline in a district such as southern Florida would be devastating."

Let me repeat that: The impact of the proposed 60-day deadline in a district such as southern Florida, where they have all these drug cases, would be devastating.

What do we want to do, turn a dangerous man or potential fugitive loose? That is what this amendment would do. If the prosecutors cannot reach it in 60 days with a heavy docket, with all kinds of heavy drug cases, then the man goes free.

Certainly the public does not want that. The prosecutors of this Nation are against this amendment. Now, I realize the distinguished Senator from Maine and the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania were once prosecutors, but that was years ago. Since then we have a growing drug problem coming into focus. The distinguished Senator from Maine has not been a Federal judge since then. He has been here in the Senate since then. But conditions have changed. Now drug cases are clogging the dockets. We cannot afford to let these people go free.

Mr. President, the point is that no case has been made for changing the original judgment of Congress in the Speedy Trial Act that a 90-day period struck a sound balance between the desire for swift trial of detained defendants and the effective management of serious, complex cases. Indeed, the 90 days is the worst case limit in a country with diverse problems from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. President, the amendment is also strongly opposed by the Department of Justice. I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a letter from the Department of Justice. This letter has six pages opposing this amendment. These are the people who are responsible for prosecuting Federal crimes. They strongly oppose reducing the time from arrest to trial of obtained defendants from 90 to 60 days. I am not going to take time now to read the entire letter to the Senate. I should like to read about a page. I quote from this letter signed by Robert A. McConnell, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legislative Affairs for the Department of Justice:

Aside from the fact that the bail reform legislation under consideration provides no justification for reduction of the Speedy Trial Act's current 90 day limitation on detention, the 60 day proposal is on its own merits objectionable. As noted above, nearly 40 percent of federal defendants subject to some term of detention remain in custody from 31 to 90 days. The number of defendants in this group in fiscal year 1982 was 2,614. Unfortunately no further statistical breakdown is available, so we do not know the exact number of these defendants held in excess of 60 days whose cases would have to be accommodated by substantially accelerated trial dates were the proposed 60 day limit enacted. Nonetheless, it is likely that a good proportion fall into this category.

The potential difficulties in significantly accelerating the trials of such defendants so as to avoid the release of persons who are severe flight risks or pose especially grave dangers to community safety are aggravated by the fact that the incidence of pretrial detention is not uniform across all districts. Instead, there is considerable variation among the districts, with relatively high rates of detention occurring in a handful of districts, primarily those which, because of their geographical location, are particularly concerned about defendants fleeing the country to avoid prosecution. This phenomenon has been noted by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, in citing the Districts of Southern California, Arizona, and Southern Florida, as the districts with the highest detention rates:

"California, Southern and Arizona are border districts and detention is required to be certain that the defendant will be available for trial. For Florida Southern, many defendants are highly mobile and are being prosecuted for drug law violations."

As the members of the Committee are no doubt aware, some of the most egregious examples of the failures of the current bail system have involved major drug traffickers in South Florida. Experience has shown that with respect to such defendants, money bonds that would, in other contexts, appear adeqeuate to assure defendant appearance have proven ineffective, and this district's high detention rate is understandable in light of this experience. The impact of the proposed 60 day deadline in a district such as Southern Florida would be devastating. For example, despite an admirable average compliance rate of 96.3 percent with the Speedy Trial Act's 70 day limit on the period from indictment to trial across all districts, South Florida, with a criminal docket that has swelled in response to an alarming crime rate, much of which is associated with the illegal drug trade, had a compliance rate of only 77.5 percent, the lowest rate of any district within the United States. In this setting, there is little leeway to further accelerate trials to accommodate the proposed 60 day deadline, and we are thus very much concerned that imposition of this proposed limit would result in the release of major drug traffickers who are serious flight risks. As our experience in South Florida has shown, these defendants have both enormous resources and foreign contacts that enable them to flee the country almost immediately upon release.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this letter by the Justice Department follow my statement in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. THURMOND. Now, Mr. President, I want to say again that the Justice Department is strongly opposed to this amendment. They feel that it will handicap the Government prosecutors in doing their duty. Their duty is to try people charged with crime. If they cannot reach a criminal case in 60 days—we already have to try detained defendants within 90 days under the Speedy Trial Act—why cut that off 30 days and turn dangerous people loose?

Mr. President, I want to say, too, that the Judiciary Committee defeated this amendment. Moreover, the Senate itself has voted down this amendment. On September 30, 1982, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SPECTER), who is cosponsor of this amendment, offered a similar amendment on the floor of the Senate. The Senate voted it down 64 to 32, a 2-to-1 vote. I hope the Senate will not revise its thinking on this matter and will stand by the previous position. We want to protect the public and not turn defendants who are dangerous or likely to flee loose just because the prosecutors are so busy that they cannot bring all the cases to trial within 90 days and therefore have to turn some of them free.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF LEGISLATIVE AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., April 19, 1983.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to a request for the views of the Department of Justice on a proposed amendment to S. 215, the bail reform legislation now under consideration by the Judiciary Committee, that would amend 18 U.S.C. 3164, the provision of the Speedy Trial Act which limits to 90 days the period during which a person may be held in detention pending trial. If a detained person is not released within the current 90 day period, he must be released pursuant to conditions set by the court. In addition to this 90 day limit on pretrial detention, section 3164 also requires that the trial of any person held in detention be afforded priority. The proposed amendment would reduce the current 90 day period of limitation to 60 days. The Department of Justice strongly opposes this amendment.

The current 90 day limit established under section 3164 was originally set on an interim basis. In its 1979 review of the Speedy Trial Act, the Congress adopted this period on a permanent basis.[1] Enactment of the bail reform legislation now before the Committee provides no rationale, in and of itself, for the Congress to now reduce the permitted period of pretrial detention by one-third. Although S. 215 would for the first time incorporate statutory procedures for the issuance of pretrial detention orders and permit consideration of defendant dangerousness as a general matter in all release decisions, under our current bail system—the very context in which Congress reviewed and adopted as a permanent provision the present 90 day limit—pretrial detention is not an uncommon phenomenon. In fiscal year 1982, 18.4% of all federal defendants were subject to some period of pretrial detention. While slightly more than half of these defendants (52.2 percent) were in custody for 10 days or less, 39.5 percent were in custody from 31 to 90 days.[2] Despite the fact that current bail laws do not permit consideration of defendant dangerousness, many believe it is concerns about dangerousness rather than flight risk that have led to the detention of a good proportion of these defendants because of their inability to meet high money bonds.

Certainly, one of the primary reasons for this Department's strong support of S. 215 is that it would specifically authorize pretrial detention in limited circumstances. We have been very much concerned by instances in which even extremely high money bonds have been inadequate to assure appearance and in which judges, operating under the constraints of current law, have released persons who pose especially severe threats to the safety of others. However, in our support of this legislation we have never asserted that pretrial detention would be appropriate for more than a small minority of federal defendants, and anticipate that enactment of this legislation would result in only a minor enlargement of the present number of persons subject to detention.

Indeed, one of the most laudatory aspects of this legislation is that it recognizes that there is already a substantial incidence of pretrial detention in the federal system, and that it responds to this phenomenon by providing for the first time a set of statutory criteria that define the circumstances in which detention may be appropriate and by requiring a pretrial detention hearing with important procedural safeguards in which the court, government, and defendant may address the issue of pretrial detention squarely. The provisions of S. 215 do not set the stage for a wholesale increase in the incidence of pretrial detention, but rather establish procedures to assure that it is imposed with greater rationality and fairness. In sum, enactment of this legislation will not herald a change in circumstances so significant that the Congress's 1979 determination with respect to detention limits in section 3164 should be overturned.

Aside from the fact that the bail reform legislation under consideration provides no justification for reduction of the Speedy Trial Act's current 90 day limitation on detention, the 60 day proposal is on its own merits objectionable. As noted above, nearly 40 percent of federal defendants subject to some term of detention remain in custody from 31 to 90 days. The number of defendants in its group in fiscal year 1982 was 2,614.[3] Unfortunately no further statistical breakdown is available, so we do not know the exact number of these defendants held in excess of 60 days whose cases would have to be accommodated by substantially accelerated trial dates were the proposed 60 day limit enacted. Nonetheless, it is likely that a good proportion fall into this category.

The potential difficulties in significantly accelerating the trials of such defendants so as to avoid the release of persons who are severe flight risks or pose especially grave dangers to community safety are aggravated by the fact that the incidence of pretrial detention is not uniform across all districts. Instead, there is considerable variation among the districts, with relatively high rates of detention occurring in a handful of districts, primarily those which, because of their geographical location, are particularly concerned about defendants fleeing the country to avoid prosecution. This phenomenon has been noted by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, in citing the Districts of Southern California, Arizona, and Southern Florida, as the districts with the highest detention rates:

California, Southern and Arizona are border districts and detention is required to be certain that the defendant will be available for trial. For Florida Southern many defendants are highly mobile and are being prosecuted for drug law violations.[4]

As the members of the Committee are no doubt aware, some of the most egregious examples of the failures of the current bail systems have involved major drug traffickers in South Florida. Experience has shown that with respect to such defendants, money bonds that would, in other contexts, appear adequate to assure defendant appearance have proven ineffective, and this district's high detention rate is understandable in light of this experience. The impact of the proposed 60 day deadline in a district such as Southern Florida would be devastating. For example, despite an admirable average compliance rate of 96.3 percent with the Speedy Trial Act's 70 day limit on the period from indictment to trial across all districts, South Florida, with a criminal docket that has swelled in response to an alarming crime rate, much of which is associated with the illegal drug trade, had a compliance rate of only 77.5 percent, the lowest rate of any district within the United States.[5] In this setting, there is little leeway to further accelerate trials to accommodate the proposed 60 day deadline, and we are thus very much concerned that imposition of this proposed limit would result in the release of major drug traffickers who are serious flight risks. As our experience in South Florida has shown, these defendants have both enormous resources and foreign contacts that enable them to flee the country almost immediately upon release.

The difficulties in accelerating trial schedules to meet the proposed 60 day deadline must also be understood in the context of other aspects of the Speedy Trial Act. Where a case is commenced with indictment, trial must occur within 70 days. In such cases, the proposed 60 day detention deadline would not require significant advance of the trial date, although we reiterate that in jurisdictions with particularly crowded criminal dockets such as South Florida even seemingly modest further manipulations of trial schedules may pose significant problems. However, where a case is commenced by arrest and indictment then follows, a substantial acceleration would be required. In these cases, the government must indict within 30 days, and trial must occur within 70 days of the indictment. Thus, the proposed 60 day limit would reduce by 40 percent for pretrial detainees the maximum period that could elapse from arrest to trial.

In cases commenced by arrest, the problem posed by compliance with the proposed 60 day deadline is not confined to the substantial acceleration of trial date that would be required, but also involves the lack of flexibility in setting a trial date within this schedule. After indictment, defendants are afforded under the statute a right to a minimum 30 day trial preparation period.[6] This means that in cases in which indictment occurs at or near the expiration of the Act's 30 day limit on the time that may pass from arrest to indictment, there will be only a few days (or in the case of an indictment falling on the 30th day, a single day) after the defendant's post-indictment trial preparation period has elapsed in which trial may be scheduled so as to avoid the release of a defendant who has been determined to be a serious flight risk or danger to the community.[7] Reserving one of a very limited number of trial dates in advance will be particularly difficult in cases in which pretrial motions and other matters—matters which generally give rise to excludable delay—are being pursued.[8] In these cases, the dates on which the Act's various limitation periods expire will vary from day-to-day as pretrial matters arise and are concluded. In sum, in cases initiated by arrest, the government and the courts will be "boxed in" in the proposed 60 day limit to but a few days in which trial may be held in order to avoid the sanction of release of the defendant. Such inflexibility ignores the scheduling problems the courts and government must now address to comply with the larger scheme of deadlines under the Speedy Trial Act, deadlines which, if not met, entail the sanction of dismissal of the charges against the defendant.

Clearly, the spectre of the proposed 60 day limit operating to require the release of defendants who are significant flight risks or extreme threats to the safety of others will be of greatest concern in cases commenced by arrest rather than indictment. However, it is with respect to these very types of defendants that it will be inadvisable to delay arrest until an indictment is, or is about to be, filed. Obviously, it would ill serve the interests of the public to encourage delay in arresting such persons. Already the arrest to indictment time limitations of the Speedy Trial Act have led to an increase in the proportion of criminal cases commenced by indictment rather than arrest.[9] The proposed 60 day detention deadline would further aggravate this situation and it would do so with respect to the highest risk category of defendants.

In essence, the proposed 60 day limit will present prosecutors with a Hobson's choice. On the one hand, if they choose to delay arrest until indictment occurs or is imminent so as to mitigate the possibility that the defendant will be released because the 60 day limit will elapse before a trial may be set, they then run the risk that the defendant will flee or commit another offense before the indictment is returned. On the other hand, if they choose to arrest immediately and then indict, they may have eliminated the immediate danger, but then run the risk that the defendant will later be released if the crowded criminal docket in their district cannot accommodate a trial date within the very limited number of days that will exist between the expiration of the defendant's statutorily guaranteed trial preparation period and the running of the proposed 60 day period.

We have no doubt that the proposed amendment is well intentioned and agree that a speedy trial is especially important where a defendant must, for the protection of the integrity of the judicial process or the safety of the community, be held pending trial. But the problems posed by the proposed reduction to 60 days of the Speedy Trial Act's present limit on pretrial detention are simply too great to justify its enactment as a means of furthering this principle. We are deeply concerned that this proposed amendment of section 3164 will result in delays in arresting defendants who are significant flight risks or pose grave danger to the safety of the innocent public.

The Department of Justice therefore strongly urges that the Committee retain the current 90 day limit of section 3164. As we noted at the outset, there is no aspect of the bail reform legislation being considered by the Committee that requires that this period, enacted on a permanent basis only four years ago, now be reduced by one-third. Moreover, we stress that super-imposed on this current 90 day limit is section 3164's present requirement that all cases involving pretrial detention be afforded priority. Thus, the present 90 day deadline sets only the outer limit of the time in which a detainee must be tried or released. If an earlier trial date may be set, the law currently requires that this be done.

Sincerely,

ROBERT A. MCCONNELL,
Assistant Attorney General,
Office of Legislative Affairs.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, Senator MITCHELL's proposal drastically to [4] 1982 Annual Report, supra note 2, at 150.

[5] Id. at 149, 348-9 (Table D-11). Of all districts, only the Northern Marianas had a compliance rate lower than Southern Florida's.

[6] Although section 3161(c)(2) speaks of the 30 day trial preparation period commencing with the defendant's first appearance through counsel, this provision has been interpreted to require that the 30 day period commence with indictment if this occurs after the first appearance. See Committee on the Administration of the Criminal Law of the Judicial Conference of the United States, Guidelines to the Administration of the Speedy Trial Act of 1974, as Amended, 10-11 (August, 1981).

[7] The "worst case" scenario evoked by the proposed 60 day limit under section 3164 would occur in instances in which no grand jury is sitting at the time the defendant is arrested. In such cases, the government is permitted an additional 30 days in which to indict, but this extension does not constitute an excludable delay under section 3161(h), and so does not extend the time limits for detention under section 3164. In such cases, therefore, the defendant could assure his release simply by insisting on his 30 day trial preparation period. Such extensions of the indictment period are, however, extremely rare. (Only 0.3 percent of cases in fiscal year 1981 involved such extensions. Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Report for the Year Ended June 30, 1981 on the Implementation of Title I of the Speedy Trial Act of 1974, 123.) Nonetheless, the proposed amendment's failure to accommodate such cases, as rare as they may be, is untenable.

[8] It is the position of the Judicial Conference that periods of excludable delay do not apply to the 30 day trial preparation period to which defendants are entitled. See Guidelines, supra note 6, at 12-13. However, in United States v. Mers (No. 81-7777, decided March 21, 1983), the Eleventh Circuit held that periods of excludable delay do apply to extend the 30 day trial preparation period. If this additional scheduling variable must also be considered, setting a firm trial date that will accommodate the existing indictment and trial deadlines, the defendant's 30 day trial preparation period, and the proposed 60 day deadline on detention may be all the more difficult.

alter the Speedy Trial Act could well undercut the bail reform provisions in this bill that are designed to increase public safety. I oppose this amendment.

In a letter to Chairman THURMOND dated April 19, 1983, the Department of Justice outlined the reasons for its strong opposition to the changes Senator SPECTER advocates.

As the Department notes, Congress reviewed the Speedy Trial Act in 1979 and made permanent the maximum limit of 90 days within which a person may be held in detention while awaiting trial. Nothing in this bill argues in favor of changing that well considered 90-day upper bound, for while S. 1762 does assure that pretrial detention will be imposed with greater rationality and fairness, its passage will not vastly increase the number of defendants held pending trial. I should point out that current law not only establishes the 90-day limit, but also gives priority to the trial or any person held in detention. Trial must, by law, be set for the earliest possible date.

Cutting the maximum allowed detention period by one-third could create real problems. The greatest impact would be on those districts where, because of the exigencies of geography, the incidence of pretrial detention is high. Take a border area such as southern Florida, where defendants are more likely to flee to another country and where drug traffickers, for example, are able to raise high amounts of bail money. The effect of a 60-day deadline would be serious indeed. In those cases that commence with indictments, south Florida is able to comply with present time limits only 77 percent of the time. As the Department of Justice observes, there is little leeway here to accelerate trials to meet the proposed 60-day deadline, passage of the amendment would mean release of more major drug smugglers who pose a significant risk of flight.

Under already existing law, the Government must proceed to indictment within 30 days of arrest. Defendants are guaranteed another 30-day trial preparation period after indictment. Reducing the maximum total detention period to 60 days could thus eliminate any flexibility in scheduling a trial at all, by mandating that a defendant be tried at the very day ending his preparation period, or else be set free. Law officers might therefore choose to delay all arrests until indictments are issued, but such a policy would allow suspects more time to flee or to commit further crimes.

Because the proposed amendment could result in greater danger to the public, I urge that it be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair now recognizes the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MITCHELL. Thank you, Mr. President. I should like to respond briefly to the comments made by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina. First, with respect to my own experience, I would note that I was a Federal prosecutor, U.S. attorney, as late as 1979. I personally prosecuted a number of large drug cases, my own State of Maine being a haven for drug smuggling. The situation has not changed since that time, as the Senator suggests.

Second, with respect to the argument that there are no grand juries in small districts, I was the U.S. attorney in one of the smallest districts in the country. We had at all times in our State two grand juries impaneled and available to be called on very short notice. That is a specious argument without any substance.

Third, the Senator suggests that this 90-day period strikes the proper balance. I remind all Senators that the 90-day limit in the Speedy Trial Act is intended to strike the proper balance between the interests of the Government and all defendants, the overwhelming majority of whom are not put in jail before a trial. We are introducing a new element. That is the purpose of the bill which the Senate is now considering, to authorize judges to put people in jail before their trials. Therefore, the balance that is applicable and appropriate when you have a defendant who is free pending trial, as is the ordinary case, is not appropriate for a defendant who is in jail prior to trial.

The situation plainly is not the same. The standard is not the same. The balance is not the same.

With respect to the 1982 vote, I remind all my Senate colleagues that this is a different vote from that which occurred in 1982. This amendment preserves all the exemptions that now exist in the Speedy Trial Act for delay. The 1982 vote did not do so. Therefore, this is a substantially different provision from that which was voted on in the Senate in 1982.

I conclude by saying that nothing better illustrates the lack of understanding of what the American judicial process is about than the repeated references made that if you adopt this amendment, you are going to turn a guilty man loose, as the Senator said, or "Do you want to turn a lot of people loose who are guilty?"

I remind the Senator—I remind the Senate—that we are dealing with a situation in which a person has not been convicted of a crime, and no American is guilty just because he has been charged with a crime. This is not the Soviet Union. This is the United States of America. Every American citizen is innocent until he is proved guilty in a court, after a trial, by a jury, and it does not make any difference how big the government is. It does not make any difference how serious the charge is. Every American is innocent until he is proved guilty.

You cannot say that this will turn guilty people loose. It will result in charges being dismissed against people who have been charged with crimes if the Government does not prosecute them. That is up to the Government.

I say that this is not an unworkable limitation. This is a reasonable limitation. It simply says that in this country, where every citizen is presumed innocent until he is proved guilty, if we put a person in jail before that, then you have an obligation to bring the case to trial within a reasonable period of time; and in doing so, we will achieve the purposes of this bill, without undue violation to the constitutional rights of every American.

I urge the Members of the Senate to note that we are dealing here with a situation in which a person is charged with a crime, not convicted. We are not dealing with guilty people, because no one in this country is guilty until a jury has said he is guilty—not 1 minute before that.

As to the southern district of Florida being devastated and the arguments of these thousands of criminals being let out on the streets: I have tried many cases. A case can be prepared promptly. If the problem is that we do not have enough prosecutors to prosecute these criminals, then I say to the Senator from South Carolina that I will join him in offering an amendment to make the money available to provide the prosecutors, so that we will prosecute the people promptly. But the answer is not to curtail the constitutional rights of other Americans in doing so.

I urge the Senate to adopt this amendment. It is a reasonable, modest proposal.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, most of what needs to be said has been said, perhaps more than once, but one additional point should be made.

This amendment does not take anything away from the prosecuting attorney. This bill gives something new to the prosecuting attorney, and that is the power to detain. The issue is how long a period of time that detention will be after this new grant of authority to the prosecuting attorney.

When we talk about what goes on in the southern district of Florida, let it be understood that we are not adding to problems of the prosecuting attorney who now cannot detain by way of preventive detention. The amendment here, however, may well be the saving factor which will preserve the contitutionality of preventive detention.

So that when we talk about public protection, if we try to go too far and have too long a period of time, the risk is high that this act will be stricken as unconstitutional.

In the Edwards case, previously cited, which upheld a 60-day period, there was language of concern about detention on constitutional grounds. It is a certainty that there will be a vigorous battle fought in the courts on the constitutional issue of any preventive detention. It is most likely that the courts will impose the strictest scrutiny as to what is appropriate detention. So that this amendment really seeks to preserve this additional, valuable law enforcement tool.

I yield the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, some cases are extremely difficult to bring to trial. For example, we had a drug case in my State recently in which there must have been 25 or 30 defendants. It takes considerable time to prepare a case such as that. If they cannot get it prepared, if other cases on the docket are ahead of it, and if 60 days expire, then these people may never be tried. Drug defendants are notorious for fleeing the jurisdiction and even the country.

It is not a question here of saying people are guilty before they have been tried. Of course they have to be tried. But they cannot even try them to determine whether they are guilty if the 60 days expire and the court must turn them loose.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I should like to respond to that and say that the Speedy Trial Act contains 17 provisions which permit delay that is not counted within the 60 days, including a provision that a judge can delay for the reason that he or she finds that the ends of justice would best be served.

This argument that there is an inflexible 60-day limit, that if they cannot get these complex cases ready, the case will be dismissed, is simply not true. If there is discovery beforehand, if there are other proceedings, if there is transportation, if there is psychiatric examination, if there is a whole host of things, that is not included in the 60 days. There is no substance to the argument that suddenly people are going to be on the street.

I further point out that even if cases are dismissed, the court can dismiss them without prejudice, and they can be brought back in a new case on the same charge the very next day.

So there is no thrust to the arguments made against this amendment.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, if the dockets are clogged and they cannot reach the case, detained defendants may have to be released and escape justice altogether.

I hope Senators will follow their previous vote.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I resisted any amendments on this bail bill as part of the package. However, I do think this is a good amendment. Now that we are looking at this as a separate bill I wish to announce my support for this amendment. I want to make that clear.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, this amendment is unnecessary in light of the current limits of the Speedy Trial Act. The Speedy Trial Act already requires any detainee to be brought to trial within 90 days of his arrest. This existing law insures that the objectives of the Mitchell amendment will be carried out: no defendant will be detained indefinitely while the processes of justice grind to a halt.

A 60-day time limit will put inordinate pressure on the prosecution. If a case commences with an arrest, the prosecution has 30 days to bring an indictment followed by a mandatory period of 30 days for the defense to prepare its case. Thus, the prosecution must either cut short its time of indictment, perhaps rushing the process before all evidence is reported, or risk having the 60-day limit expire at the same time the defense's preparation time expires and before the court can schedule a trial time.

Putting an additional time limit on courts will only tax further court dockets which are already overburdened. Other litigants will have to wait longer for trial and court management will in general be disrupted.

If a judge finds a defendant so dangerous that nothing other than detention will insure the safety of the community, it would be unwise to release him into the community due to delays in the litigative process. The Justice Department concludes that this would result in the release of major drug traffickers who are serious flight risks.

No evidence has been presented at any time in our hearings that the 90-day Speedy Trial Act limit has not worked perfectly well to protect against lengthy incarceration. Let us have seperate legislation if this is needed, but let us not complicate the bail reform bill, and jepordize it's passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. HECHT), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT) would vote "nay."

Mr. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI), the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), and the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER) is absent on official business.

The Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY) is absent because of illness in the family.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON) would each vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

So Mr. MITCHELL's amendment (No. 2695) was rejected.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the problem of crime committed by individuals free on bail is a problem created by the current state of the law. When judges are only permitted to consider conditions of release to assure appearance at trial, a dangerous defendant, one likely to commit other crimes, is required to be released if he can demonstrate an excellent past record of responding to court summons.

Unfortunately, the law permits this to happen all too often. For instance, a defendant was recently apprehended after two plainclothes policemen watched the suspect beat and rob an unsuspecting victim. At the time of his arrest, this defendant had four pending cases in the judicial system for charges of armed robbery—for which he had been arrested only 4 days prior to this last arrest—second degree burglary, grand larceny, receiving stolen property, and attempted unwarranted use of a vehicle. In another case, a 17-year-old was apprehended for the fatal shooting of a 68-year-old in the course of a robbery. This defendant had two armed robbery cases pending at the time of the killing. Finally, a defendant stabbed a man at a bar who refused to buy him a drink. This victim is still only barely clinging to life in a hospital intensive care unit. At the time of the crime, the defendant was on pretrial release for another incident in the same bar under identical circumstances. In addition, he was under grand jury investigation for at least one other unprovoked stabbing.

I mention these actual cases so that we do not make the mistake of concentrating on statistics that fail to account for the human suffering involved in crime. These type of stories become even more alarming, however, when we realize that a study compiled last year in 12 jurisdictions around the country found that 16 percent of all defendants released pending trial were later arrested for other charges while on bail. Thirty percent of these were arrested more than once while on bail and the average number of arrests before trial was 1.4.

S. 251 is a rewrite of the Bail Reform Act of 1966. The Subcommittee on the Constitution, provoked by some of the considerations mentioned above, held hearings and approved this language last Congress and again last year. During its consideration of this question, the subcommittee particularly explored the meaning of the eighth amendment in order to recommend to the Senate language which would address the national problem of crimes committed by persons free on bail without the slightest conflict with the letter or spirit of the Constitution. As chairman of the Constitution Subcommittee, I can confidently announce that title I of S. 1762 implements constitutional authority to resolve this crime problem. My remarks today are designed to assure the Senate that the Constitution fully authorizes these changes in our bail policy.

The primary change in current bail policy made by this title would allow Federal courts to consider community safety in setting pretrial conditions of release. This language expands the list of conditions which the court may impose upon a defendant to assure his appearance for trial. In the event that a judicial officer does not ascertain that these release conditions will assure the safety of the community or of other persons or that conditions will assure the defendant's appearance at trial, he may opt to detain the suspect pending trial. This title also permits temporary detention of individuals who are arrested while subject to some form of conditional release stemming from an earlier arrest. This will allow the authorities to notify the jurisdiction from which the arrestee has fled.

The current policy of the Bail Reform Act presents Federal judicial officers with a genuine dilemma. Without legal authority to deny bail on grounds of dangerousness, courts are in a dilemma. Many judges apparently resolve this difficulty by setting a financial condition of release that exceeds the defendant's ability to pay. The Attorney General's Task Force on Violent Crime recognized this sub rosa form of pretrial detention with the terse observation that "there is a widespread practice of detaining particularly dangerous defendants by the setting of high money bonds to assure appearance." In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee a few years after the enactment of the 1966 act, former Judge Tim Murphy of the District of Columbia Court of General Sessions explained the reasons judges may resort to high money bail:

An unreasonable law has the ultimate effect of forcing those who administer it to ignore it, calloused of the consequences, or else to make extreme rationalization in circumventing it; this applies to judges. You cannot expect judges to follow the letter of a law that requires them to turn many dangerous criminals loose day after day.

The ultimate irony of this situation is that the Bail Reform Act of 1966, enacted to protect individuals against detention "because of their financial inability to post bail," placed courts in the posture of regularly setting bail beyond a defendants' financial ability. By forbidding any weighing of the suspect's dangerousness, the statute, in continuing to rely on the category of "capital" offenses to describe the gravest crimes, despite the limitation over time of that category to virtually the sole offense of first-degree murder, and in conjunction with the demographical factors undermining the classical surety system, had the unintended effect of making the detention of defendants on high money bail a "widespread practice."

To remedy this situation, the Chief Justice had stressed the need to provide for greater flexibility in our bail laws to permit judges to give adequate consideration to the issue of threats to community safety. His recommendation is joined by the American Bar Association Standards Relating to the Administration of Justice, the National Conference of Commissions on Uniform State Laws, and the National Association of District Attorneys.

Statutory provisions granting courts the discretion to weigh risk to community safety as a factor in pretrial release decisions, however, have been vaguely criticized as requiring judges to predict future behavior. Although this approach to the problem would involve the courts in weighing as a factor the potential for future behavior based on the defendant's past record, this is not an unusual burden for the courts. The Bail Reform Act itself allows a judge to examine the suspect's proclivity for future violence when determining bail in a capital case. Moreover, the same bail law requires the courts to predict the potential for flight by the defendant in all instances of pretrial release. When balancing protection of the public against the first amendment right to hold a mass demonstration, the courts also must weigh the potential for violence. Thus, projecting potentialities and tendencies in the interest of public safety is not beyond the capability of the courts.

When the court makes a determination about the likelihood of dangerous conduct between arrest and trial, it is not idly gazing into a nonexistent crystal ball, but instead examining a reliable record of past conduct. The current bail act, in effect, blacks out that aspect of the record most relevant to public safety, dangerousness of the defendant, and leaves the court to make its projection based solely on the risk that the suspect will not appear for trial. The current law does not prevent courts from predicting but only withdraws that part of the record that would make the forecast reliable.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the legislation which the Senate considers today proposes a comprehensive reform of the unsatisfactory two-century-old system of money bail. Under the two key parts of this proposal, money bail can no longer be used as a means of detaining a defendant prior to trial, and persons accused of crime will be detained in prison prior to trial only if they are a danger to the community or likely to flee before their trial.

Our current system of bail is inadequate from the perspective of both the community and the criminal defendant. As written, the bail laws require a judge to release a defendant in noncapital cases prior to trial under those minimal conditions reasonably required to assure his presence at trial. Danger to the community and the protection of society are not factors to be considered under current law in the decision to grant bail.

Over the past 18 years, since the enactment of the Bail Reform Act of 1966, there has been rising public concern that our bail laws are not working. With increasing frequency, persons on bail are being arrested and charged with serious felonies—especially burglarly, robbery, larceny, and drug offenses. The public is outraged that these violent repeat offenders, with lengthy records of serious street crime, are put back onto the street to rob and mug again.

Under our present system of bail, it is common knowledge that judges use money bail to detain defendants whom they believe will threaten the community even when there is no indication the defendant will flee. Indeed the major reason today for the pretrial detention of defendants is the inability to post bond. A judge knows that the higher the bond, the less likely the defendant will be released from jail prior to trial. Studies show that approximately 65 percent of the persons with bonds of $10,000 or more were jailed for the entire pretrial period. Thus, in practice, we have a system of preventive detention today, but it operates only against the poor.

In this legislation, we seek to establish a bail system which candidly and openly acknowledges the need to consider safety to the community, and which eliminates the present discrimination against the indigent defendant. Defendants who pose no danger to the community or risk of flight will not be unfairly sent to jail because they cannot afford to pay the cost of bail. No longer will wealthy drug traffickers be able to meet the money bail requirements, and then flee the jurisdiction. Instead, this legislation will permit a judge, in determining whether to release a defendant, to consider both the likelihood of flight and of danger to the community without having to use any subterfuges to reach the legitimate objectives of detaining such persons before trial.

As one who has long been committed to preserving the civil liberties of all our citizens, I firmly believe that this legislation strikes a fair balance between the rights of the accused under the Constitution and the rights of the public to be safe in their homes and neighborhoods. It meets the basic goals of law enforcement without infringing unnecessarily on civil liberties.

Mr. President, I believe that this proposal has the potential to become a historic landmark in the war on crime, and in our ongoing effort to fulfill the great goal of equal justice under law.

This legislation is not a panacea for violent crime in America. Indeed, the Federal Government does not have jurisdiction to deal with many of the most serious crimes committed on the streets of the Nation. But we do have a responsibility to meet the challenge of devising new approaches to the problem of violence. If successful, the States will follow our lead. Bail reform is an important step forward in our continuing crime reduction efforts.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask for third reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any further amendments to be proposed? If there are no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

So the bill (S. 215), as amended, was passed, as follows:

S. 215

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Bail Reform Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) Sections 3141 through 3151 of title 18, United States Code, are repealed and the following new sections are inserted in lieu thereof:

"§ 3141. Release and detention authority generally

"(a) PENDING TRIAL.—A judicial officer who is authorized to order the arrest of a person pursuant to section 3041 of this title shall order that an arrested person who is brought before him be released or detained, pending judicial proceedings, pursuant to the provisions of this chapter.

"(b) PENDING SENTENCE OR APPEAL.—A judicial officer of a court of original jurisdiction over an offense, or a judicial officer of a Federal appellate court, shall order that, pending imposition or execution of sentence, or pending appeal of conviction or sentence, a person be released or detained pursuant to the provisions of this chapter.

"§ 3142. Release or detention of a defendant pending trial

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Upon the appearance before a judicial officer of a person charged with an offense, the judicial officer shall issue an order that, pending trial, the person be—

"(1) released on his personal recognizance or upon execution of an unsecured appearance bond, pursuant to the provisions of subsection (b);

"(2) released on a condition or combination of conditions pursuant to the provisions of subsection (c);

"(3) temporarily detained to permit revocation of conditional release, deportation, or exclusion pursuant to the provisions of subsection (d); or

"(4) detained pursuant to the provisions of subsection (e).

"(b) RELEASE ON PERSONAL RECOGNIZANCE OR UNSECURED APPEARANCE BOND.—The judicial officer shall order the pretrial release of the person on his personal recognizance, or upon execution of an unsecured appearance bond in an amount specified by the court, subject to the condition that the person not commit a Federal, State, or local crime during the period of his release, unless the judicial officer determines that such release will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required or will endanger the safety of any other person or the community.

"(c) RELEASE ON CONDITIONS.—If the judicial officer determines that the release described in subsection (b) will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required or will endanger the safety of any other person or the community, he shall order the pretrial release of the person—

"(1) subject to the condition that the person not commit a Federal, State, or local crime during the period of release; and

"(2) subject to the least restrictive further condition, or combination of conditions, that he determines will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community, which may include the condition that the person—

"(A) remain in the custody of a designated person, who agrees to supervise him and to report any violation of a release condition to the court, if the designated person is able reasonably to assure the judicial officer that the person will appear as required and will not pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community;

"(B) maintain employment, or, if unemployed, actively seek employment;

"(C) maintain or commence an educational program;

"(D) abide by specified restrictions on his personal associations, place of abode, or travel;

"(E) avoid all contact with an alleged victim of the crime and with a potential witness who may testify concerning the offense;

"(F) report on a regular basis to a designated law enforcement agency, pretrial services agency, or other agency;

"(G) comply with a specified curfew;

"(H) refrain from possessing a firearm, destructive device, or other dangerous weapon;

"(I) refrain from excessive use of alcohol, or any use of a narcotic drug or other controlled substance, as defined in section 102 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 802), without a prescription by a licensed medical practitioner;

"(J) undergo available medical or psychiatric treatment, including treatment for drug or alcohol dependency, and remain in a specified institution if required for that purpose;

"(K) execute an agreement to forfeit upon failing to appear as required, such designated property, including money, as is reasonably necessary to assure the appearance of the person as required, and post with the court such indicia of ownership of the property or such percentage of the money as the judicial officer may specify;

"(L) execute a bail bond with solvent sureties in such amount as is reasonably necessary to assure the appearance of the person as required;

"(M) return to custody for specified hours following release for employment, schooling, or other limited purposes; and

"(N) satisfy any other condition that is reasonably necessary to assure the appearance of the person as required and to assure the safety of any other person and the community.

The judicial officer may not impose a financial condition that results in the pretrial detention of the person. The judicial officer may at any time amend his order to impose additional or different conditions of release.

"(d) TEMPORARY DETENTION TO PERMIT REVOCATION OF CONDITIONAL RELEASE, DEPORTATION, OR EXCLUSION.—If the judicial officer determines that—

"(1) the person—

"(A) is, and was at the time the offense was committed, on—

"(i) release pending trial for a felony under Federal, State, or local law;

"(ii) release pending imposition or execution of sentence, appeal of sentence or conviction, or completion of sentence, for any offense under Federal, State, or local law; or

"(iii) probation or parole for any offense under Federal, State, or local law; or

"(B) is not a citizen of the United States or lawfully admitted for permanent residence, as defined in section 101(a)(20) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(20)); and

"(2) the person may flee or pose a danger to any other person or the community;

he shall order the detention of the person, for a period of not more than ten days, excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays, and direct the attorney for the Government to notify the appropriate court, probation or parole official, or State or local law enforcement official, or the appropriate official of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. If the official fails or declines to take the person into custody during that period, the person shall be treated in accordance with the other provisions of this section, notwithstanding the applicability of other provisions of law governing release pending trial or deportation or exclusion proceedings. If temporary detention is sought under paragraph (1)(B), the person has the burden of proving to the court that he is a citizen of the United States or is lawfully admitted for permanent residence.

"(e) DETENTION.—If, after a hearing pursuant to the provisions of subsection (f), the judicial officer finds that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community, he shall order the detention of the person prior to trial. In a case described in (f)(1), a rebuttable presumption arises that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the safety of any other person and the community if the judge finds that—

"(1) the person has been convicted of a Federal offense that is described in subsection (f)(1), or of a State or local offense that would have been an offense described in subsection (f)(1) if a circumstance giving rise to Federal jurisdiction had existed;

"(2) the offense described in paragraph (1) was committed while the person was on release pending trial for a Federal, State, or local offense; and

"(3) a period of not more than five years has elapsed since the date of conviction, or the release of the person from imprisonment, for the offense described in paragraph (1), whichever is later.

Subject to rebuttal by the person, it shall be presumed that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of the community if the judicial officer finds that there is probable cause to believe that the person committed an offense for which a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years or more is prescribed in the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 801 et seq.), the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 951 et seq.), section 1 of the Act of September 15, 1980 (21 U.S.C. 955a), or an offense under section 924(c) of title 18 of the United States Code.

"(f) DETENTION HEARING.—The judicial officer shall hold a hearing to determine whether any condition or combination of conditions set forth in subsection (c) will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community in a case—

"(1) upon motion of the attorney for the Government, that involves—

"(A) a crime of violence;

"(B) an offense for which the maximum sentence is life imprisonment or death;

"(C) an offense for which a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years or more is prescribed in the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 801 et seq.), the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 951 et seq.), or section 1 of the Act of September 15, 1980 (21 U.S.C. 955a); or

"(D) any felony committed after the person had been convicted of two or more prior offenses described in subparagraphs (A) through (C), or two or more State or local offenses that would have been offenses described in subparagraphs (A) through (C) if a circumstance giving rise to Federal jurisdiction had existed; or

"(2) Upon motion of the attorney for the Government or upon the judicial officer's own motion, that involves—

"(A) a serious risk that the person will flee;

"(B) a serious risk that the person will obstruct or attempt to obstruct justice, or threaten, injure, or intimidate, or attempt to threaten, injure, or intimidate, a prospective witness or juror.

The hearing shall be held immediately upon the person's first appearance before the judicial officer unless that person, or the attorney for the Government, seeks a continuance. Except for good cause, a continuance on motion of the person may not exceed five days, and a continuance on motion of the attorney for the Government may not exceed three days. During a continuance, the person shall be detained, and the judicial officer, on motion of the attorney for the Government or on his own motion, may order that, while in custody, a person who appears to be a narcotics addict receive a medical examination to determine whether he is an addict. At the hearing, the person has the right to be represented by counsel, and, if he is financially unable to obtain adequate representation, to have counsel appointed for him. The person shall be afforded an opportunity to testify, to present witnesses on his own behalf, to cross-examine witnesses who appear at the hearing, and to present information by proffer or otherwise. The rules concerning admissibility of evidence in criminal trials do not apply to the presentation and consideration of information at the hearing. The facts the judicial officer uses to support a finding pursuant to subsection (e) that no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the safety of any other person and the community shall be supported by clear and convincing evidence. The person may be detained pending completion of the hearing.

"(g) FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED.—The judicial officer shall, in determining whether there are conditions of release that will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community, take into account the available information concerning—

"(1) the nature and circumstances of the offense charged, including whether the offense is a crime of violence or involves a narcotic drug;

"(2) the weight of the evidence against the person;

"(3) the history and characteristics of the person, including—

"(A) his character, physical and mental condition, family ties, employment, financial resources, length of residence in the community, community ties, past conduct, history relating to drug or alcohol abuse, criminal history, and record concerning appearance at court proceedings; and

"(B) whether, at the time of the current offense or arrest, he was on probation, on parole, or on other release pending trial, sentencing, appeal, or completion of sentence for an offense under Federal, State, or local law; and

"(4) the nature and seriousness of the danger to any person or the community that would be posed by the person's release. In considering the conditions of release described in subsection (c)(2)(K) or (c)(2)(L), the judicial officer may upon his own motion, or shall upon the motion of the Government, conduct an inquiry into the source of the property to be designated for potential forfeiture or offered as collateral to secure a bond, and shall decline to accept the designation, or the use as collateral, of property that, because of its source, will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required.

"(h) CONTENTS OF RELEASE ORDER.—In a release order issued pursuant to the provisions of subsection (b) or (c), the judicial officer shall—

"(1) include a written statement that sets forth all the conditions to which the release is subject, in a manner sufficiently clear and specific to serve as a guide for the person's conduct; and

"(2) advise the person of—

"(A) the penalties for violating a condition of release, including the penalties for committing an offense while on pretrial release;

"(B) the consequences of violating a condition of release, including the immediate issuance of a warrant for the person's arrest; and

"(C) the provisions of sections 1503 of this title (relating to intimidation of witnesses, jurors, and officers of the court), 1510 (relating to obstruction of criminal investigations), 1512 (tampering with a witness, victim, or an informant), and 1513 (retaliating against a witness, victim, or an informant).

"(i) CONTENTS OF DETENTION ORDER.—In a detention order issued pursuant to the provisions of subsection (e), the judicial officer shall—

"(1) include written findings of fact and a written statement of the reasons for the detention;

"(2) direct that the person be committed to the custody of the Attorney General for confinement in a corrections facility separate, to the extent practicable, from persons awaiting or serving sentences or being held in custody pending appeal;

"(3) direct that the person be afforded reasonable opportunity for private consultation with his counsel; and

"(4) direct that, on order of a court of the United States or on request of an attorney for the Government, the person in charge of the corrections facility in which the person is confined deliver the person to a United States marshal for the purpose of an appearance in connection with a court proceeding.

The judicial officer may, by subsequent order, permit the temporary release of the person, in the custody of a United States marshal or another appropriate person, to the extent that the judicial officer determines such release to be necessary for preparation of the person's defense or for another compelling reason.

"(j) PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE.—Nothing in this section shall be construed as modifying or limiting the presumption of innocence.

"§ 3143. Release or detention of a defendant pending sentence or appeal

"(a) RELEASE OR DETENTION PENDING SENTENCE.—The judicial officer shall order that a person who has been found guilty of an offense and who is waiting imposition or execution of sentence, be detained, unless the judicial officer finds by clear and convincing evidence that the person is not likely to flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community if released pursuant to section 3142 (b) or (c). If the judicial officer makes such a finding, he shall order the release of the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142 (b) or (c).

"(b) RELEASE OR DETENTION PENDING APPEAL BY THE DEFENDANT.—The judicial officer shall order that a person who has been found guilty of an offense and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, and who has filed an appeal or a petition for a writ of certiorari, be detained, unless the judicial officer finds—

"(1) by clear and convincing evidence that the person is not likely to flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community if released pursuant to section 3142 (b) or (c); and

"(2) that the appeal is not for purpose of delay and raises a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in reversal or an order for a new trial.

If the judicial officer makes such findings, he shall order the release of the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142 (b) or (c).

"(c) RELEASE OR DETENTION PENDING APPEAL BY THE GOVERNMENT.—The judicial officer shall treat a defendant in a case in which an appeal has been taken by the United States pursuant to the provisions of section 3731 of this title, in accordance with the provisions of section 3142, unless the defendant is otherwise subject to a release or detention order.

"§ 3144. Release or detention of a material witness

"If it appears from an affidavit filed by a party that the testimony of a person is material in a criminal proceeding, and if it is shown that it may become impracticable to secure the presence of the person by subpena, a judicial officer may order the arrest of the person and treat the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142. No material witness may be detained because of inability to comply with any condition of release if the testimony of such witness can adequately be secured by deposition, and if further detention is not necessary to prevent a failure of justice. Release of a material witness may be delayed for a reasonable period of time until the deposition of the witness can be taken pursuant to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

"§ 3145. Review and appeal of a release or detention order

"(a) REVIEW OF A RELEASE ORDER.—If a person is ordered released by a magistrate, or by a person other than a judge of a court having original jurisdiction over the offense and other than a Federal appellate court—

"(1) the attorney for the Government may file, with the court having original jurisdiction over the offense, a motion for revocation of the order or amendment of the conditions of release; and

"(2) the person may file, with the court having original jurisdiction over the offense, a motion for amendment of the conditions of release.

The motion shall be determined promptly.

"(b) REVIEW OF A DETENTION ORDER.—If a person is ordered detained by a magistrate, or by a person other than a judge of a court having original jurisdiction over the offense and other than a Federal appellate court, the person may file, with the court having original jurisdiction over the offense, a motion for revocation or amendment of the order. The motion shall be determined promptly.

"(c) APPEAL FROM A RELEASE OR DETENTION ORDER.—An appeal from a release or detention order, or from a decision denying revocation or amendment of such an order, is governed by the provisions of section 1291 of title 28 and section 3731 of this title. The appeal shall be determined promptly.

"§ 3146. Penalty for failure to appear

"(a) OFFENSE.—A person commits an offense if, after having been released pursuant to this chapter—

"(1) he knowingly fails to appear before a court as required by the conditions of his release; or

"(2) he knowingly fails to surrender for service of sentence pursuant to a court order.

"(b) GRADING.—If the person was released—

"(1) in connection with a charge of, or while awaiting sentence, surrender for service of sentence, or appeal or certiorari after conviction, for—

"(A) an offense punishable by death, life imprisonment, or imprisonment for a term of fifteen years or more, he shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned for not more than ten years, or both;

"(B) an offense punishable by imprisonment for a term of five or more years, but less than fifteen years, he shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both;

"(C) any other felony, he shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; or

"(D) a misdemeanor, he shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both; or

"(2) for appearance as a material witness, he shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

A term of imprisonment imposed pursuant to this section shall be consecutive to the sentence of imprisonment for any other offense.

"(c) AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE.—It is an affirmative defense to a prosecution under this section that uncontrollable circumstances prevented the person from appearing or surrendering, and that the person did not contribute to the creation of such circumstances in reckless disregard of the requirement that he appear or surrender, and that he appeared or surrendered as soon as such circumstances ceased to exist.

"(d) DECLARATION OF FORFEITURE.—If a person fails to appear before a court as required, and the person executed an appearance bond pursuant to section 3142(b) or is subject to the release condition set forth in section 3142 (c)(2)(K), or (c)(2)(L), the judicial officer may, regardless of whether the person has been charged with an offense under this section, declare any property designated pursuant to that section to be forfeited to the United States.

"§ 3147. Penalty for an offense committed while on release

"A person convicted of an offense committed while released pursuant to this chapter shall be sentenced, in addition to the sentence prescribed for the offense to—

"(1) a term of imprisonment of not less than two years and not more than ten years if the offense is a felony; or

"(2) a term of imprisonment of not less than ninety days and not more than one year if the offense is a misdemeanor.

A term of imprisonment imposed pursuant to this section shall be consecutive to any other sentence of imprisonment.

"§ 3148. Sanctions for violation of a release condition

"(a) AVAILABLE SANCTIONS.—A person who has been released pursuant to the provisions of section 3142, and who has violated a condition of his release, is subject to a revocation of release, an order of detention, and a prosecution for contempt of court.

"(b) REVOCATION OF RELEASE.—The attorney for the Government may initiate a proceeding for revocation of an order of release by filing a motion with the district court. A judicial officer may issue a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with violating a condition of release, and the person shall be brought before a judicial officer in the district in which his arrest was ordered for a proceeding in accordance with this section. To the extent practicable, a person charged with violating the condition of his release that he not commit a Federal, State, or local crime during the period of release shall be brought before the judicial officer who ordered the release and whose order is alleged to have been violated. The judicial officer shall enter an order of revocation and detention if, after a hearing, the judicial officer—

"(1) finds that there is—

"(A) probable cause to believe that the person has committed a Federal, State, or local crime while on release; or

"(B) clear and convincing evidence that the person has violated any other condition of his release; and

"(2) finds that—

"(A) based on the factors set forth in section 3142(g), there is no condition or combination of conditions of release that will assure that the person will not flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community; or

"(B) the person is unlikely to abide by any condition or combination of conditions of release.

If there is probable cause to believe that, while on release, the person committed a Federal, State, or local felony, a rebuttable presumption arises that no condition or combination of conditions will assure that the person will not pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community. If the judicial officer finds that there are conditions of release that will assure that the person will not flee or pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community, and that the person will abide by such conditions, he shall treat the person in accordance with the provisions of section 3142 and may amend the conditions of release accordingly.

"(c) PROSECUTION FOR CONTEMPT.—The judge may commence a prosecution for contempt, pursuant to the provisions of section 401, if the person has violated a condition of his release.

"§ 3149. Surrender of an offender by a surety

"A person charged with an offense, who is released upon the execution of an appearance bond with a surety, may be arrested by the surety, and if so arrested, shall be delivered promptly to a United States marshal and brought before a judicial officer. The judicial officer shall determine in accordance with the provisions of section 3148(b) whether to revoke the release of the person, and may absolve the surety of responsibility to pay all or part of the bond in accordance with the provisions of Rule 46 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The person so committed shall be held in official detention until released pursuant to this chapter or another provision of law.

"§ 3150. Applicability to a case removed from a State court

"The provisions of this chapter apply to a criminal case removed to a Federal court from a State court.".

(b) Section 3154 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in subsection (1), by striking out "and recommend appropriate release conditions for each such person" and inserting in lieu thereof "and, where appropriate, include a recommendation as to whether such individual should be released or detained and, if release is recommended, recommend appropriate conditions of release"; and

(2) in subsection (2), by striking out "section 3146(e) or section 3147" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 3145".

(c) Section 3156(a) of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "3146" and inserting in lieu thereof "3141";

(2) in paragraph (1)—

(A) by striking out "bail or otherwise" and inserting in lieu thereof "detain or"; and

(B) by deleting "and" at the end thereof;

(3) in paragraph (2), by striking out the period at the end and inserting in lieu thereof "; and";

(4) by adding after paragraph (2) the following new paragraphs:

"(3) The term 'felony' means an offense punishable by a maximum term of imprisonment of more than one year; and

"(4) The term 'crime of violence' means—

"(A) an offense that has as an element of the offense the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another; or

"(B) any other offense that is a felony and that, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense."; and

(5) in subsection (b)(1), by striking out "bail or otherwise" and inserting in lieu thereof "detain or".

(d) The item relating to chapter 207 in the analysis of part II of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"207. Release and detention pending judicial proceedings ..... 3141".

(e)(1) The caption of chapter 207 is amended to read as follows:

"CHAPTER 207—RELEASE AND DETENTION PENDING JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS".

(2) The section analysis for chapter 207 is amended by striking out the items relating to section 3141 through 3151 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"3141. Release and detention authority generally.
"3142. Release or detention of a defendant pending trial.
"3143. Release or detention of a defendant pending sentence or appeal.
"3144. Release or detention of a material witness.
"3145. Review and appeal of a release or detention order.
"3146. Penalty for failure to appear.
"3147. Penalty for an offense committed while on release.
"3148. Sanctions for violation of a release condition.
"3149. Surrender of an offender by a surety.
"3150. Applicability to a case removed from a State court."

SEC. 3. Chapter 203 of title 18, United States Code, is amended as follows:

(a) The last sentence of section 3041 is amended by striking out "determining to hold the prisoner for trial" and inserting in lieu thereof "determining, pursuant to the provisions of section 3142 of this title, whether to detain or conditionally release the prisoner prior to trial".

(b) The second paragraph of section 3042 is amended by striking out "imprisoned or admitted to bail" and inserting in lieu thereof "detained or conditionally released pursuant to section 3142 of this title".

(c) Section 3043 is repealed.

(d) The following new section is added after section 3061:

"§ 3062. General arrest authority for violation of release conditions

"A law enforcement officer, who is authorized to arrest for an offense committed in his presence, may arrest a person who is released pursuant to chapter 207 if the officer has reasonable grounds to believe that the person is violating, in his presence, a condition imposed on the person pursuant to section 3142 (c)(2)(D), (c)(2)(E), (c)(2)(H), (c)(2)(I), or (c)(2)(M), or, if the violation involves a failure to remain in a specified institution as required, a condition imposed pursuant to section 3142(c)(2)(J).".

(e) The section analysis is amended—

(1) by amending the item relating to section 3043 to read as follows:

"3043. Repealed."; and

(2) by adding the following new item after the item relating to section 3061:

"3062. General arrest authority for violation of release conditions.".

SEC. 4. Section 3731 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after the second paragraph the following new paragraph:

"An appeal by the United States shall lie to a court of appeals from a decision or order, entered by a district court of the United States, granting the release of a person charged with or convicted of an offense, or denying a motion for revocation of, or modification of the conditions of, a decision or order granting release.".

SEC. 5. The second paragraph of section 3772 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out "bail" and inserting in lieu thereof "release pending appeal."

SEC. 6. Section 4282 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(a) by striking out "and not admitted to bail" and substituting "and detained pursuant to chapter 207"; and

(b) by striking out "and unable to make bail".

SEC. 7. Section 636 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by striking out "impose conditions of release under section 3146 of title 18" and inserting in lieu thereof "issue orders pursuant to section 3142 of title 18 concerning release or detention of persons pending trial".

SEC. 8. The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure are amended as follows:

(a) Rule 5(c) is amended by striking out "shall admit the defendant to bail" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall detain or conditionally release the defendant".

(b) The second sentence of rule 15(a) is amended by striking out "committed for failure to give bail to appear to testify at a trial or hearing" and inserting in lieu thereof "detained pursuant to section 3144 of title 18, United States Code".

(c) Rule 40(f) is amended to read as follows:

"(f) RELEASE OR DETENTION.—If a person was previously detained or conditionally released, pursuant to chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, in another district where a warrant, information or indictment issued, the Federal magistrate shall take into account the decision previously made and the reasons set forth therefor, if any, but will not be bound by that decision. If the Federal magistrate amends the release or detention decision or alters the conditions of release, he shall set forth the reasons for his action in writing.".

(d) Rule 46 is amended—

(1) in subdivision (a), by striking out "3146, 3148, or 3149" and inserting in lieu thereof "§§ 3142 and 3144";

(2) in subdivision (c), by striking out "3148" and inserting in lieu thereof "3143";

(3) by amending subdivision (e)(2) to read as follows:

"(2) SETTING ASIDE.—The court may direct that a forfeiture be set aside in whole or in part, upon such conditions as the court may impose, if a person released upon execution of an appearance bond with a surety is subsequently surrendered by the surety into custody or if it otherwise appears that justice does not require the forfeiture."; and

(4) by adding the following new subdivision at the end thereof:

"(h) FORFEITURE OF PROPERTY.—

"Nothing in this rule or in chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, shall prevent the court from disposing of any charge by entering an order directing forfeiture of property pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 3142(c)(2)(K) if the value of the property is an amount that would be an appropriate sentence after conviction of the offense charged and if such forfeiture is authorized by statute or regulation.".

(e) Rule 54(b)(3) is amended by striking out "under 18 U.S.C. § 3043, and".

SEC. 9. Rule 9(c) of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure is amended by striking out "3148" and inserting in lieu thereof "3143", and following the word "community", inserting "and that the appeal is not for purpose of delay and raises a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in reversal or in an order for a new trial".

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and move to table that motion.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BUDGET ACT WAIVER

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am advised by the distinguished managers that we are prepared to go to the forfeiture bill, which is Calendar No. 350, S. 948. I have consulted with the minority leader on this subject, and he has indicated that there is no objection on his side that he is aware of.

There is also a budget waiver to accompany the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 217, Calendar No. 422, which is a budget waiver to accompany S. 948.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 217) waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 948.

The resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

S. RES. 217

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 948. Such waiver is necessary because S. 948, as reported, authorizes the enactment of new budget authority which would first become available in fiscal year 1984, and such bill was not reported on or before May 15, 1983, as required by section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for such authorizations. Although this bill was originally introduced as separate legislation, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary felt that because S. 948 related so closely to the provisions of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act that was presented by the administration, it made sense to consider the two together. The package from the administration did not come before the committee until March 23, 1983. Due to the volume of the proposals, the committee could not hold hearings and take responsible action prior to the deadline.

The budget waiver will allow Senate consideration for S. 948 which provides for the establishment of a four-year trial program to deposit proceeds from the forfeiture of drug profits and drug-related assets in a Drug Assets Forfeiture Fund. To offset the cost of processing forfeitures, $10 million is appropriated for fiscal year 1984, $15 million for fiscal year 1985, and $20 million for each fiscal year 1986 and 1987. The appropriation is to come from the proceeds in the Fund. Any excess amounts in the Fund are to revert to the general fund of the United States Treasury. The bill will also create a Customs Forfeiture Fund which will be set up and operate the same as the Drug Assets Forfeiture Fund. To offset the cost of processing these forfeitures, the identical figures are to be appropriated as listed for the Drug Assets. These funds are to be taken from the Customs Forfeiture Fund.

COMPREHENSIVE FORFEITURE ACT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of S. 948, Calendar 350, the so-called forfeiture bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 948) to reform Federal criminal and civil forfeiture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, S. 948, as it will be amended shortly, is identical to the provisions of title III of S. 1762 as passed by the Senate yesterday. S. 948 is Senator BIDEN's bill. He has provided the leadership in this area to improve our fight against organized crime and drug dealers. The distinguished majority leader, Mr. BAKER, also has made a major contribution through amendments to S. 2572 last Congress that have been carried forward here.

Mr. President, this bill would provide for the forfeiture of profits and proceeds of organized crime enterprises. It expands criminal forfeiture so as to apply to all narcotics trafficking cases. The bill improves the procedures for "freezing" forfeitable property pending judicial proceedings and, if the forfeitable property cannot be seized, provides for forfeiture of substitute assets. It also expands the use of administrative forfeiture in noncontested cases and creates revolving funds to help make forfeiture operations more efficient.

Mr. President, these are a few of the improvements in this bill.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Delaware has some amendments that will conform this bill to the same provisions as contained in the crime package, and he will now offer those amendments.

Mr. President, I believe we have to adopt the committee amendments before the amendments of the Senator from Delaware would be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the committee amendment is agreed to and will be considered as original text.

AMENDMENT NO. 2696

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I send amendments to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) proposes an amendment numbered 2696.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendments be dispensed with and that they be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 36, line 19, delete "1983" and insert in lieu thereof "1984".

On page 48, line 21, delete "section 413" and insert in lieu thereof "sections 413 and 414".

On page 60, delete the quotation mark and second period on line 11, and insert after line 11 the following:

" '(p) The provisions of this section shall be liberally construed to effectuate its remedial purposes.'.".

On page 60, insert before line 12 the following:

" 'INVESTMENT OF ILLICIT DRUG PROFITS

" 'SEC. 414. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person who has received any income derived, directly or indirectly, from a violation of this title or title III punishable by imprisonment for more than one year in which such person has participated as a principal within the meaning of section 2 of title 18, United States Code, to use or invest, directly or indirectly, any part of such income, or the proceeds of such income, in acquisition of any interest in, or the establishment or operation of, any enterprise which is engaged in, or the activities of which affect, interstate or foreign commerce. A purchase of securities on the open market for purposes of investment, and without the intention of controlling or participating in the control of the issuer, or of assisting another to do so, shall not be unlawful under this section if the securities of the issuer held by the purchaser, the members of his immediate family, and his or their accomplices in any violation of this title or title III after such purchase do not amount in the aggregate to one percent of the outstanding securities of any one class, and do not confer, either in law or in fact, the power to elect one or more directors of the issuer.

" '(b) Whoever violates this section shall be fined not more than ($50,000) or imprisoned not more than (ten) years, or both.

" '(c) As used in this section, the term 'enterprise' includes any individual, partnership, corporation, association, or other legal entity, and any union or group of individuals associated in fact although not a legal entity.

" '(d) The provisions of this section shall be liberally construed to effectuate its remedial purposes.'.".

On page 62, line 11, delete "remove" and insert in lieu thereof "and remove".

On page 62, delete the quotation mark and second period on line 23, and insert after line 23 the following:

" '(j) In addition to the venue provided for in section 1395 of title 28, United States Code, or any other provision of law, in the case of property of a defendant charged with a violation that is the basis for forfeiture of the property under this section, a proceeding for forfeiture under this section may be brought in the judicial district in which the defendant owning such property is found or in the judicial district in which the criminal prosecution is brought.'.".

On page 63, line 13, delete "item" and insert in lieu thereof "items".

On page 63, delete the item after line 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

" 'Sec. 413. Criminal forfeitures.

" 'Sec. 414. Investment of illicit drug profits;'.".

On page 64, insert after line 2 the following:

"(b) Section 511(e) of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 881(e)) is amended by inserting before 'The proceeds from any sale under paragraph (2)' the following: 'The Attorney General shall ensure the equitable transfer pursuant to paragraph (1) of any forfeited property to the appropriate State or local law enforcement agency so as to reflect generally the contribution of any such agency participating directly in any of the acts which led to the seizure or forfeiture of such property. A decision by the Attorney General pursuant to paragraph (1) shall not be subject to review.'.".

On page 64, line 3, delete "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof "(c)".

On page 64, line 8, delete "subsection (j) of this section" and insert in lieu thereof "section 524(c) of title 28, United States Code".

On page 64, delete line 9 and all that follows through line 13 on page 67, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 302. Section 524 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

" '(c)(1) There is established in the United States Treasury a special fund to be known as the Department of Justice Assets Forfeiture Fund (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as the "fund") which shall be available to the Attorney General without fiscal year limitation in such amounts as may be specified in Appropriations Acts for the following purposes of the Department of Justice:

" '(A) the payment, at the discretion of the Attorney General, of any expenses necessary to seize, detain, inventory, safeguard, maintain, advertise, or sell property under seizure, detention, or forfeited pursuant to any law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice, or of any other necessary expenses incident to the seizure, detention, or forfeiture of such property; such payments may include payments for contract services and payments to reimburse any Federal, State, or local agency for any expenditures made to perform the foregoing functions;

" '(B) the payment of awards for information or assistance leading to a civil or criminal forfeiture under the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 800 et seq.) or a criminal forfeiture under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations, statute (18 U.S.C. 1961 et seq.), at the discretion of the Attorney General;

" '(C) the compromise and payment of valid liens and mortgages against property that has been forfeited pursuant to any law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice, subject to the discretion of the Attorney General to determine the validity of any such lien or mortgage and the amount of payment to be made; and

" '(D) disbursements authorized in connection with remission or mitigation procedures relating to property forfeited under any law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice.

" '(2) Any award paid from the fund for information concerning a forfeiture, as provided in paragraph (1)(B), shall be paid at the discretion of the Attorney General or his delegate, except that the authority to pay an award of $10,000 or more shall not be delegated to any person other than the Deputy Attorney General, the Associate Attorney General, the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, or the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration. Any award for such information shall not exceed the lesser of $150,000 or one quarter of the amount realized by the United States from the property forfeited.

" '(3) There shall be deposited in the fund all amounts from the forfeiture of property under any law enforcement or administered by the Department of Justice remaining after the payment of expenses for forfeiture and also authorized by law.

" '(4) Amounts in the fund which are not currently needed for the purpose of this section shall be kept on deposit or invested in obligations of, or guaranteed by, the United States.

" '(5) The Attorney General shall transmit to the Congress, not later than four months after the end of each fiscal year a detailed report on the amounts deposited in the fund and a description of expenditures made under this subsection.

" '(6) The provisions of this subsection relating to deposits in the fund shall apply to all property in the custody of the Department of Justice on or after the effective date of the Comprehensive Forfeiture Act of 1983.

" '(7) For fiscal years 1984, 1985, 1986, and 1987, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for the purposes described in paragraph (1). At the end of each fiscal year, any amount in the fund in excess of the amount appropriated shall be deposited in the General Fund of the Treasury of the United States, except that an amount not to exceed, $5,000,000 may be carried forward and available for appropriation in the next fiscal year.

" '(8) For the purposes of this subsection, property is forfeited pursuant to a law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice if it is forfeited pursuant to—

" '(A) any criminal forfeiture proceeding;

" '(B) any civil judicial forfeiture proceeding; or

" '(C) any civil administrative forfeiture proceeding conducted by the Department of Justice;

except to the extent that the seizure was effected by a Customs officer or that custody was maintained by the Customs Service in which case the provisions of section 613a of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1613a) shall apply.'.".

On page 72, insert after line 17 the following:

"The Secretary of the Treasury shall ensure the equitable transfer pursuant to paragraph (2) of any forfeited property to the appropriate State or local law enforcement agency so as to reflect generally the contribution of any such agency participating directly in any of the acts which led to the seizure or forfeiture of such property. A decision by the Secretary pursuant to paragraph (2) shall not be subject to review."

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, before passing the forfeiture bill, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and I would like to offer the same minor amendments to this bill that were made to the forfeiture title, title III, of the crime package that we passed yesterday. These amendments are considered to be noncontroversial and are acceptable to the managers of the bill. They include a further refinement of the Justice Department forfeiture fund, and some amendments proposed by Senator D'AMATO. Explanations of these amendments may be found in the RECORD of January 26, 1984.

Mr. President, in July 1980, as chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, I chaired hearings on the subject of the Government's efforts to obtain the assets of major drug traffickers. In April 1981, the General Accounting Office released a report that was done at my request entitled "Asset Forfeiture—A Seldom Used Tool in Combatting Drug Trafficking." The central conclusion of both of these endeavors was that since enactment in 1970 of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations statute, commonly known as RICO, and the Comprehensive Drug Prevention and Control Act, which contained the first Federal criminal forfeiture statutes, the Federal Government's record in taking the profit out of organized crime, especially drug trafficking, has been far below Congress expectations. For example, although drug trafficking was estimated to be a $60 billion a year business, in its report the GAO found that between 1970 and 1980 only $2 million in assets had been turned over to the U.S. Treasury. The GAO also concluded that a major reason for the failure of these statutes—which were in 1970 proclaimed as the ideal weapon for breaking the backs of sophisticated narcotics operations—was that the Justice Department had largely ignored the legislation. In addition, when Justice did get around to pursuing forfeitures, it ran into unanticipated legal snags. Mr. President, in the last 2 years the Justice Department has devoted substantially greater resources to forfeiture, and with impressive results. But the legal barriers remain. With enactment of this bill Justice will be able to embark on a new mission in the area of forfeiture, aimed at large-scale drug traffickers and organized crime.

This bill is intended to remove those legal barriers, simplifying and streamlining the process of forfeiture, while at the same time taking into account the requirements of due process.

The bill is divided into four parts. First, the bill would amend RICO. Most importantly, it would:

First, make clear that the proceeds of racketeering activity are subject to criminal forfeiture;

Second, provide a fuller definition of the types of property subject to RICO forfeiture;

Third, provide that title to forfeitable property vests in the United States upon commission of the act giving rise to forfeiture;

Fourth, add a section providing that if forfeitable property cannot be located, or has been transferred or sold, subsitute assets belonging to the defendant can be forfeited;

Fifth, provide judicial power to issue appropriate protective orders to maintain availability of potentially forfeitable property; and

Sixth, provide for orderly consideration of third-party claims, taking into account the requirements of due process.

The second major section of the bill would add a criminal forfeiture statute to the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act, which would in almost all respects parallel the RICO statute as amended.

Third, the bill would create a forfeiture fund for the Department of Justice to permit efficient administration of the forfeiture program.

Finally, the bill would amend the civil forfeiture provisions of the Tariff Act to allow the U.S. Customs Service and the Drug Enforcement Administration to process civil forfeiture actions more efficiently, and to allow those agencies to transfer forfeited property to State and local law enforcement agencies who assist them in order to boost Federal-State cooperation. It would also create a forfeiture fund for the U.S. Customs Service.

As many believed in 1970, I still believe that a strong forfeiture statute that is actively implemented is the most effective weapon we have for breaking the backs of sophisticated drug traffickers. I believe that this bill, coupled with a strong Federal effort, will serve that purpose.

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I urge the passage of S. 948, as amended, the Comprehensive Forfeiture Act, which is identical to the language of the recently passed Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984. Forfeiture procedure reform is long overdue and greatly needed to solve a problem that continues to get worse. This bill would improve governmental efficiency; it would reduce costs and increase revenues to the Government; it would also improve our drug interdiction and law enforcement capabilities.

Mr. President, as many of our Members know, the Coast Guard, the Customs Service, the Drug Enforcement Administration and other agencies seize over 9,000 vessels, vehicles and aircraft each year. Most of these vessels are used in the transportation of illegal aliens and narcotics. All of them are seized because they have been used in the commission of a crime. The Government machinery and the Federal law established to recycle these properties to their rightful owner or to a proper use is so antiquated that many of the vessels and other equipment diminish in value because of poor maintenance and vandelism. According to a recent GAO report, forfeited vehicles sold for only 58 percent of their value at the time of seizure. Boats sold for only 43 percent of their value at the time of seizure, and aircraft sold for only 35 percent of their value at the time of seizure.

S. 948, as amended, would permit most of the seized property to be forfeited and disposed of by an administrative process which would greatly reduce the amount of time required. Now even in an uncontested case, it takes an average of 18 months of court time. It would free up valuable court time, it would increase net receipts to the Government, and it would put the property back into useful service more quickly. It would make it possible for State and local governments that participated in the seizure of the property to acquire it, and it would set up a revolving fund to help finance the maintenance and security of the property, thereby helping to eliminate the requirement of law enforcement agencies to spend their funds intended to be used in the war against crime instead to secure and maintain seized property.

Mr. President, the bill before the Members has previously passed the Senate by 95 to 1. It has passed the House by 271 to 27. Identical language passed the Senate yesterday 91 to 1. The bill is supported by the administration, particularly OMB and all the affected law enforcement agencies. The language is supported by the General Services Administration, which currently operates the disposal program for surplus property.

I urge my colleagues to show their support once again for this important reform.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment (No. 2696) was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, if there be no further amendment to be proposed, I move that we go to third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the en-grossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

So the bill (S. 948), as amended, was passed, as follows:

S. 948

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

That this Act may be cited as the "Comprehensive Forfeiture Act of 1984".

TITLE I

SEC. 101. Section 1963 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1963. Criminal penalties

"(a) Whoever violates any provision of section 1962 of this chapter shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned not more than twenty years, or both, and shall forfeit to the United States, irrespective of any provision of State law—

"(1) any interest the person has acquired or maintained in violation of section 1962;

"(2) any—

"(A) interest in;

"(B) security of;

"(C) claim against; or

"(D) property or contractual right of any kind affording a source of influence over; any enterprise which the person has established, operated, controlled, conducted, or participated in the conduct of, in violation of section 1962; and

"(3) any property constituting, or derived from, any proceeds which the person obtained, directly or indirectly, from racketeering activity or unlawful debt collection in violation of section 1962.

The court, in imposing sentence on such person shall order, in addition to any other sentence imposed pursuant to this section, that the person forfeit to the United States all property described in this subsection.

"(b) Property subject to criminal forfeiture under this section includes—

"(1) real property, including things growing on, affixed to, and found in land; and

"(2) tangible and intangible personal property, including rights, privileges, interests, claims, and securities.

"(c) All right, title, and interest in property described in subsection (a) vests in the United States upon the commission of the act giving rise to forfeiture under this section. Any such property that is subsequently transferred to a person other than the defendant may be the subject of a special verdict of forfeiture and thereafter shall be ordered forfeited to the United States, unless the transferee establishes in a hearing pursuant to subsection (m) that he is a bona fide purchaser for value of such property who at the time of purchase was reasonably without cause to believe that the property was subject to forfeiture under this section.

"(d) If any of the property described in subsection (a)—

"(1) cannot be located;

"(2) has been transferred to, sold to, or deposited with, a third party;

"(3) has been placed beyond the jurisdiction of the court;

"(4) has been substantially diminished in value by any act or omission of the defendant; or

"(5) has been commingled with other property which cannot be divided without difficulty;

the court shall order the forfeiture of any other property of the defendant up to the value of any property described in paragraphs (1) through (5).

"(e)(1) Upon application of the United States, the court may enter a restraining order or injunction, require the execution of a satisfactory performance bond, or take any other action to preserve the availability of property described in subsection (a) for forfeiture under this section—

"(A) upon the filing of an indictment or information charging a violation of section 1962 of this chapter and alleging that the property with respect to which the order is sought would, in the event of conviction, be subject to forfeiture under this section; or

"(B) prior to the filing of such an indictment or information, if, after notice to persons appearing to have an interest in the property and opportunity for a hearing, the court determines that—

"(i) there is a substantial probability that the United States will prevail on the issue of forfeiture and that failure to enter the order will result in the property being destroyed, removed from the jurisdiction of the court, or otherwise made unavailable for forfeiture; and

"(ii) the need to preserve the availability of the property through the entry of the requested order outweighs the hardship on any party against whom the order is to be entered:

Provided, however, That an order entered pursuant to subparagraph (B) shall be effective for not more than ninety days, unless extended by the court for good cause shown or unless an indictment or information described in subparagraph (A) has been filed.

"(2) A temporary restraining order under this subsection may be entered upon application of the United States without notice or opportunity for a hearing when an information or indictment has not yet been filed with respect to the property, if the United States demonstrates that there is probable cause to believe that the property with respect to which the order is sought would, in the event of conviction, be subject to forfeiture under this section and that provision of notice will jeopardize the availability of the property for forfeiture. Such a temporary order shall expire not more than ten days after the date on which it is entered, unless extended for good cause shown or unless the party against whom it is entered consents to an extension for a longer period. A hearing requested concerning an order entered under this paragraph shall be held at the earliest possible time, and prior to the expiration of the temporary order.

"(3) The court may receive and consider, at a hearing held pursuant to this subsection, evidence and information that would be inadmissible under the Federal Rules of Evidence.

"(f) Upon conviction of a person under this section, the court shall enter a judgment of forfeiture of the property to the United States and shall also authorize the Attorney General to seize all property ordered forfeited upon such terms and conditions as the court shall deem proper. Following the entry of an order declaring the property forfeited, the court may, upon application of the United States, enter such appropriate restraining orders or injunctions, require the execution of satisfactory performance bonds, appoint receivers, conservators, appraisers, accountants, or trustees, or take any other action to protect the interest of the United States in the property ordered forfeited. Any income accruing to, or derived from, an enterprise or an interest in an enterprise which has been ordered forfeited under this section may be used to offset ordinary and necessary expenses to the enterprise which are required by law, or which are necessary to protect the interests of the United States or third parties.

"(g) Following the seizure of property ordered forfeited under this section, the Attorney General shall direct the disposition of the property by sale or any other commercially feasible means, making due provision for the rights of any innocent persons. Any property right or interest not exercisable by, or transferable for value to, the United States shall expire and shall not revert to the defendant, nor shall the defendant or any person acting in concert with or on behalf of the defendant be eligible to purchase forfeited property at any sale held by the United States. Upon application of a person, other than the defendant or a person acting in concert with or on behalf of the defendant, the court may restrain or stay the sale or disposition of the property pending the conclusion of any appeal of the criminal case giving rise to the forfeiture, if the applicant demonstrates that proceeding with the sale or disposition of the property will result in irreparable injury, harm or loss to him. Notwithstanding 31 U.S.C. 3302(b), the proceeds of any sale or other disposition of property forfeited under this section and any moneys forfeited shall be used to pay all proper expenses for the forfeiture and the sale, including expenses of seizure, maintenance and custody of the property pending its disposition, advertising and court costs. The Attorney General shall deposit in the Treasury any amounts of such proceeds or moneys remaining after the payment of such expenses.

"(h) With respect to property ordered forfeited under this section, the Attorney General is authorized to—

"(1) grant petitions for mitigation or remission of forfeiture, restore forfeited property to victims of a violation of this chapter, or take any other action to protect the rights of innocent persons which is in the interest of justice and which is not inconsistent with the provisions of this chapter;

"(2) compromise claims arising under this section;

"(3) award compensation to persons providing information resulting in a forfeiture under this section;

"(4) direct the disposition by the United States of all property ordered forfeited under this section by public sale or any other commercially feasible means, making due provision for the rights of innocent persons; and

"(5) take appropriate measures necessary to safeguard and maintain property ordered forfeited under this section pending its disposition.

"(i) The Attorney General may promulgate regulations with respect to—

"(1) making reasonable efforts to provide notice to persons who may have an interest in property ordered forfeited under this section;

"(2) granting petitions for remission or mitigation of forfeiture;

"(3) the restitution of property to victims of an offense petitioning for remission or mitigation of forfeiture under this chapter;

"(4) the disposition by the United States of forfeited property by public sale or other commercially feasible means;

"(5) the maintenance and safekeeping of any property forfeited under this section pending its disposition; and

"(6) the compromise of claims arising under this chapter.

Pending the promulgation of such regulations, all provisions of law relating to the disposition of property, or the proceeds from the sale thereof, or the remission or mitigation of forfeitures for violation of the customs laws, and the compromise of claims and the award of compensation to informers in respect of such forfeitures shall apply to forfeitures incurred, or alleged to have been incurred, under the provisions of this section, insofar as applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions hereof. Such duties as are imposed upon the Customs Service or any person with respect to the disposition of property under the customs law shall be performed under this chapter by the Attorney General.

"(j) Except as provided in subsection (m), no party claiming an interest in property subject to forfeiture under this section may—

"(1) intervene in a trial or appeal of a criminal case involving the forfeiture of such property under this section; or

"(2) commence an action at law or equity against the United States concerning the validity of his alleged interest in the property subsequent to the filing of an indictment or information alleging that the property is subject to forfeiture under this section.

"(k) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to enter orders as provided in this section without regard to the location of any property which may be subject to forfeiture under this section or which has been ordered forfeited under this section.

"(l) In order to facilitate the identification or location of property declared forfeited and to facilitate the disposition of petitions for remission or mitigation of forfeiture, after the entry of an order declaring property forfeited to the United States the court may, upon application of the United States, order that the testimony of any witness relating to the property forfeited be taken by deposition and that any designated book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material not privileged be produced at the same time and place, in the same manner as provided for the taking of depositions under Rule 15 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

"(m)(1) Following the entry of an order of forfeiture under this section, the United States shall publish notice of the order and of its intent to dispose of the property for at least seven successive court days in such manner as the Attorney General may direct. The Government may also, to the extent practicable, provide direct written notice to any person known to have alleged an interest in the property that is the subject of the order of forfeiture as a substitute for published notice as to those persons so notified.

"(2) Any person, other than the defendant, asserting a legal interest in property which has been ordered forfeited to the United States pursuant to this section may, within thirty days of the final publication of notice or his receipt of notice under paragraph (1), whichever is earlier, petition the court for a hearing to adjudicate the validity of his alleged interest in the property. The hearing shall be held before the court alone, without a jury.

"(3) The petition shall be signed by the petitioner under penalty of perjury and shall set forth the nature and extent of the petitioner's right, title, or interest in the property, the time and circumstances of the petitioner's acquisition of the right, title, or interest in the property, any additional facts supporting the petitioner's claim, and the relief sought.

"(4) The hearing on the petition shall, to the extent practicable and consistent with the interests of justice, be held within thirty days of the filing of the petition. The court may consolidate the hearing on the petition with a hearing on any other petition filed by a person other than the defendant under this subsection.

"(5) At the hearing, the petitioner may testify and present evidence and witnesses on his own behalf, and cross-examine witnesses who appear at the hearing. The United States may present evidence and witnesses in rebuttal and in defense of its claim to the property and cross-examine witnesses who appear at the hearing. In addition to testimony and evidence presented at the hearing, the court shall consider the relevant portions of the record of the criminal case which resulted in the order of forfeiture.

"(6) If, after the hearing, the court determines that the petitioner has established by a preponderance of the evidence that—

"(A) the petitioner has a legal right, title, or interest in the property, and such right, title, or interest renders the order of forfeiture invalid in whole or in part because the right, title, or interest was vested in the petitioner rather than the defendant or was superior to any right, title, or interest of the defendant at the time of the commission of the acts which gave rise to the forfeiture of the property under this section; or

"(B) the petitioner is a bona fide purchaser for value of the right, title, or interest in the property and was at the time of purchase reasonably without cause to believe that the property was subject to forfeiture under this section;

the court shall amend the order of forfeiture in accordance with its determination.

"(7) Following the court's disposition of all petitions filed under this subsection, or if no such petitions are filed following the expiration of the period provided in paragraph (2) for the filing of such petitions, the United States shall have clear title to property that is the subject of the order of forfeiture and may warrant good title to any subsequent purchaser or transferee.".

TITLE II

SEC. 201. Part D of title II of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 841 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section 413 and 414:

"CRIMINAL FORFEITURES

"PROPERTY SUBJECT TO CRIMINAL FORFEITURE

"SEC. 413. (a) Any person convicted of a violation of this title or title III punishable by imprisonment for more than one year shall forfeit to the United States, irrespective of any provision of State law—

"(1) any property constituting, or derived from, any proceeds the person obtained, directly or indirectly, as the result of such violation;

"(2) any of the person's property used, or intended to be used, in any manner or part, to commit, or to facilitate the commission of, such violation; and

"(3) in the case of a person convicted of engaging in a continuing criminal enterprise in violation of section 408 of this title (21 U.S.C. 848), the person shall forfeit, in addition to any property described in paragraph (1) or (2), any of his interest in, claims against, and property or contractual rights affording a source of control over, the continuing criminal enterprise.

The court, in imposing sentence on such person, shall order, in addition to any other sentence imposed pursuant to this title or title III, that the person forfeit to the United States all property described in this subsection.

"MEANING OF TERM 'PROPERTY'

"(b) Property subject to criminal forfeiture under this section includes—

"(1) real property, including things growing on, affixed to, and found in land; and

"(2) tangible and intangible personal property, including rights, privileges, interests, claims, and securities.

"THIRD PARTY TRANSFERS

"(c) All right, title, and interest in property described in subsection (a) vests in the United States upon the commission of the act giving rise to forfeiture under this section. Any such property that is subsequently transferred to a person other than the defendant may be the subject of a special verdict of forfeiture and thereafter shall be ordered forfeited to the United States, unless the transferee establishes in a hearing pursuant to subsection (o) that he is a bona fide purchaser for value of such property who at the time of purchase was reasonably without cause to believe that the property was subject to forefeiture under this section.

"(d) If any of the property described in subsection (a)—

"(1) cannot be located;

"(2) has been transferred to, sold to, or deposited with a third party;

"(3) has been placed beyond the jurisdiction of the court;

"(4) has been substantially diminished in value by any act or omission of the defendant; or

"(5) has been commingled with other property which cannot be divided without difficulty;

the court shall order the forfeiture of any other property of the defendant up to the value of any property described in paragraphs (1) through (5).

"REBUTTABLE PRESUMPTION

"(e) There is a rebuttable presumption at trial that any property of a person convicted of a felony under this title or title III is subject to forfeiture under this section if the United States establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that—

"(1) such property was acquired by such person during the period of the violation of this title or title III or within a reasonable time after such period; and

"(2) there was no likely source for such property other than the violation of this title or title III.

"PROTECTIVE ORDERS

"(f)(1) Upon application of the United States, the court may enter a restraining order or injunction, require the execution of a satisfactory performance bond, or take any other action to preserve the availability of property described in subsection (a) for forfeiture under this section—

"(A) upon the filing of an indictment or information charging a violation of this title or title III for which criminal forfeiture may be ordered under this section and alleging that the property with respect to which the order is sought would, in the event of conviction, be subject to forfeiture under this section; or

"(B) prior to the filing of such an indictment or information, if, after notice to persons appearing to have an interest in the property and opportunity for a hearing, the court determines that—

"(i) there is a substantial probability that the United States will prevail on the issue of forfeiture and that failure to enter the order will result in the property being destroyed, removed from the jurisdiction of the court, or otherwise made unavailable for forfeiture; and

"(ii) the need to preserve the availability of the property through the entry of the requested order outweighs the hardship on any party against whom the order is to be entered:

Provided, however, That an order entered pursuant to subparagraph (B) shall be effective for not more than ninety days, unless extended by the court for good cause shown or unless an indictment or information described in subparagraph (A) has been filed.

"(2) A temporary restraining order under this subsection may be entered upon application of the United States without notice or opportunity for a hearing when an information or indictment has not yet been filed with respect to the property, if the United States demonstrates that there is probable cause to believe that the property with respect to which the order is sought would, in the event of conviction, be subject to forfeiture under this section and that provision of notice will jeopardize the availability of the property for forfeiture. Such a temporary order shall expire not more than ten days after the date on which it is entered, unless extended for good cause shown or unless the party against whom it is entered consents to an extension for a longer period. A hearing requested concerning an order entered under this paragraph shall be held at the earliest possible time and prior to the expiration of the temporary order.

"(3) The court may receive and consider, at a hearing held pursuant to this subsection, evidence and information that would be inadmissible under the Federal Rules of Evidence.

"WARRANT OF SEIZURE

"(g) The Government may request the issuance of a warrant authorizing the seizure of property subject to forfeiture under this section in the same manner as provided for a search warrant. If the court determines that there is probable cause to believe that the property to be seized would, in the event of conviction, be subject to forfeiture and that an order under subsection (f) may not be sufficient to assure the availability of the property for forfeiture, the court shall issue a warrant authorizing the seizure of such property.

"EXECUTION

"(h) Upon entry of an order of forfeiture under this section, the court shall authorize the Attorney General to seize all property ordered forfeited upon such terms and conditions as the court shall deem proper. Following entry of an order declaring the property forfeited, the court may, upon application of the United States, enter such appropriate restraining orders or injunctions, require the execution of satisfactory performance bonds, appoint receivers, conservators, appraisers, accountants, or trustees, or take any other action to protect the interest of the United States in the property ordered forfeited. Any income accruing to or derived from property ordered forfeited under this section may be used to offset ordinary and necessary expenses to the property which are required by law, or which are necessary to protect the interests of the United States or third parties.

"DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY

"(i) Following the seizure of property ordered forfeited under this section, the Attorney General shall direct the disposition of the property by sale or any other commercially feasible means, making due provision for the rights of any innocent persons. Any property right or interest not exercisable by, or transferable for value to, the United States shall expire and shall not revert to the defendant, nor shall the defendant or any person acting in concert with him or on his behalf be eligible to purchase forfeited property at any sale held by the United States. Upon application of a person, other than the defendant or a person acting in concert with him or on his behalf, the court may restrain or stay the sale or disposition of the property pending the conclusion of any appeal of the criminal case giving rise to the forfeiture, if the applicant demonstrates that proceeding with the sale or disposition of the property will result in irreparable injury, harm, or loss to him.

"AUTHORITY OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

"(j) With respect to property ordered forfeited under this section, the Attorney General is authorized to—

"(1) grant petitions for mitigation or remission of forfeiture, restore forfeited property to victims of a violation of this chapter, or take any other action to protect the rights of innocent persons which is in the interest of justice and which is not inconsistent with the provisions of this section;

"(2) compromise claims arising under this section;

"(3) award compensation to persons providing information resulting in a forfeiture under this section;

"(4) direct the disposition by the United States, in accordance with the provisions of section 511(e) of this title (21 U.S.C. 881(e)), of all property ordered forfeited under this section by public sale or any other commercially feasible means, making due provision for the rights of innocent persons; and

"(5) take appropriate measures necessary to safeguard and maintain property ordered forfeited under this section pending its disposition.

"APPLICABILITY OF CIVIL FORFEITURE PROVISIONS

"(k) Except to the extent that they are inconsistent with the provisions of this section, the provisions of section 511(d) of this title (21 U.S.C. 881(d)) shall apply to a criminal forfeiture under this section.

"BAR ON INTERVENTION

"(l) Except as provided in subsection (o), no party claiming an interest in property subject to forfeiture under this section may—

"(1) intervene in a trial or appeal of a criminal case involving the forfeiture of such property under this section; or

"(2) commence an action at law or equity against the United States concerning the validity of his alleged interest in the property subsequent to the filing of an indictment or information alleging that the property is subject to forfeiture under this section.

"JURISDICTION TO ENTER ORDERS

"(m) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to enter orders as provided in this section without regard to the location of any property which may be subject to forfeiture under this section or which has been ordered forfeited under this section.

"DEPOSITIONS

"(n) In order to facilitate the identification and location of property declared forfeited and to facilitate the disposition of petitions for remission or mitigation of forfeiture, after the entry of an order declaring property forfeited to the United States, the court may, upon application of the United States, order that the testimony of any witness relating to the property forfeited be taken by deposition and that any designated book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material not privileged be produced at the same time and place, in the same manner as provided for the taking of depositions under Rule 15 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

"THIRD PARTY INTERESTS

"(o)(1) Following the entry of an order of forfeiture under this section, the United States shall publish notice of the order and of its intent to dispose of the property for at least seven successive court days in such manner as the Attorney General may direct. The Government may also, to the extent practicable, provide direct written notice to any person known to have alleged an interest in the property that is the subject of the order of forfeiture as a substitute for published notice as to those persons so notified.

"(2) Any person, other than the defendant, asserting a legal interest in property which has been ordered forfeited to the United States pursuant to this section may, within thirty days of the final publication of notice or his receipt of notice under paragraph (1), whichever is earlier, petition the court for a hearing to adjudicate the validity of his alleged interest in the property. The hearing shall be held before the court alone, without a jury.

"(3) The petition shall be signed by the petitioner under penalty of perjury and shall set forth the nature and extent of the petitioner's right, title, or interest in the property, the time and circumstances of the petitioner's acquisition of the right, title, or interest in the property, any additional facts supporting the petitioner's claim, and the relief sought.

"(4) The hearing on the petition shall, to the extent practicable and consistent with the interests of justice, be held within thirty days of the filing of the petition. The court may consolidate the hearing on the petition with a hearing on any other petition filed by a person other than the defendant under this subsection.

"(5) At the hearing, the petitioner may testify and present evidence and witnesses on his own behalf, and cross-examine witnesses who appear at the hearing. The United States may present evidence and witnesses in rebuttal and in defense of its claim to the property and cross-examine witnesses who appear at the hearing. In addition to testimony and evidence presented at the hearing, the court shall consider the relevant portions of the record of the criminal case which resulted in the order of forfeiture.

"(6) If, after the hearing, the court determines that the petitioner has established by a preponderance of the evidence that—

"(A) the petitioner has a legal right, title, or interest in the property, and such right, title, or interest renders the order of forfeiture invalid in whole or in part because the right, title, or interest was vested in the petitioner rather than the defendant or was superior to any right, title, or interest of the defendant at the time of the commission of the acts which gave rise to the forfeiture of the property under this section; or the court shall amend the order of forfeiture in accordance with its determination.

"(B) the petitioner is a bona fide purchaser for value of the right, title, or interest in the property and was at the time of purchase reasonably without cause to believe that the property was subject to forfeiture under this section;

"(7) Following the court's disposition of all petitions filed under this subsection, or if no such petitions are filed following the expiration of the period provided in paragraph (2) for the filing of such petitions, the United States shall have clear title to property that is the subject of the order of forfeiture and may warrant good title to any subsequent purchaser or transferee.

"(p) The provision of this section shall be liberally construed to effectuate its remedial purposes.".

"INVESTMENT OF ILLICIT DRUG PROFITS

"SEC. 414. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person who has received any income derived, directly or indirectly, from a violation of this title or title III punishable by imprisonment for more than one year in which such person has participated as a principal within the meaning of section 2 of title 18, United States Code, to use or invest, directly or indirectly, any part of such income, or the proceeds of such income, in acquisition of any interest in, or the establishment or operation of, any enterprise which is engaged in, or the activities of which affect, interstate or foreign commerce. A purchase of securities on the open market for purposes of investment, and without the intention of controlling or participating in the control of the issuer, or of assisting another to do so, shall not be unlawful under this section if the securities of the issuer held by the purchaser, the members of his immediate family, and his or their accomplices in any violation of this title or title III after such purchase do not amount in the aggregate to 1 percent of the outstanding securities of any one class, and do not confer, either in law or in fact, the power to elect one or more directors of the issuer.

"(b) Whoever violates this section shall be fined not more than $50,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both.

"(c) As used in this section, the term 'enterprise' includes any individual, partnership, corporation, association, or other legal entity, and any union or group of individuals associated in fact although not a legal entity.

"(d) The provisions of this section shall be liberally construed to effectuate its remedial purposes.".

SEC. 202. Section 304 of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 824) is amended by adding at the end of subsection (f) the following sentence: "All right, title, and interest in such controlled substances shall vest in the United States upon a revocation order becoming final.".

and

(b) by adding immediately after

"Sec. 1016. Authority of Secretary of the Treasury."

the following new item:

"Sec. 1017. Criminal forfeitures.".

TITLE III

SEC. 301. (a) Section 511(e)(1) of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 881(e)(1)) is amended by adding after "retain the property for official use" the following: "or transfer the custody or ownership of any forfeited property to any Federal, State, or local agency pursuant to section 616 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1616)".

(b) Section 511(e) of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 881(e)) is amended by inserting before "The proceeds from any sale under paragraph (2) "the following: "The Attorney General shall ensure the equitable transfer pursuant to paragraph (1) of any forfeited property to the appropriate State or local law enforcement agency so as to reflect generally the contribution of any such agency participating directly in any of the acts which led to the seizure or forfeiture of such property. A decision by the Attorney General pursuant to paragraph (1) shall not be subject to review.".

(c) Section 511(e) of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 881(e)) is further amended by striking out "the general fund of the United States Treasury" in the sentence beginning "The Attorney General shall" and inserting in lieu thereof "accordance with section 524(c) of title 28, United States Code".

SEC. 302. Section 524 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(c)(1) There is established in the United States Treasury a special fund to be known as the Department of Justice Assets Forfeiture Fund (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as the 'fund' which shall be available to the Attorney General without fiscal year limitation in such amounts as may be specified in Appropriations Acts for the following purposes of the Department of Justice:

"(A) the payment, at the discretion of the Attorney General, of any expenses necessary to seize, detain, inventory, safeguard, maintain, advertise, or sell property under seizure, detention, or forfeited pursuant to any law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice, or of any other necessary expenses incident to the seizure, detention, or forfeiture of such property; such payments may include payments for contract services and payments to reimburse any Federal, State, or local agency for any expenditures made to perform the foregoing functions;

"(B) the payment of awards for information or assistance leading to a civil or criminal forfeiture under the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 800 et seq.) or a criminal forfeiture under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations statute (18 U.S.C. 1961 et seq.), at the discretion of the Attorney General;

"(C) the compromise and payment of valid liens and mortgages against property that has been forfeited pursuant to any law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice, subject to the discretion of the Attorney General to determine the validity of any such lien or mortgage and the amount of payment to be made; and

"(D) disbursements authorized in connection with remission or mitigation procedures relating to property forfeited under any law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice.

"(2) Any award paid from the fund for information concerning a forfeiture, as provided in paragraph (1)(B), shall be paid at the discretion of the Attorney General or his delegate, except that the authority to pay an award $10,000 or more shall not be delegated to any person other than the Deputy Attorney General, the Associate Attorney General, the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, or the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration. Any award for such information shall not exceed the lesser of $150,000 or one-fourth of the amount realized by the United States from the property forfeited.

"(3) There shall be deposited in the fund all amounts from the forfeiture of property under any law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice remaining after the payment of expenses for forfeiture and sale authorized by law.

"(4) Amounts in the fund which are not currently needed for the purpose of this section shall be kept on deposit or invested in obligations of, or guaranteed by, the United States.

"(5) The Attorney General shall transmit to the Congress, not later than four months after the end of each fiscal year a detailed report on the amounts deposited in the fund and a description of expenditures made under this subsection.

"(6) The provisions of this subsection relating to deposits in the fund shall apply to all property in the custody of the Department of Justice on or after the effective date of the Comprehensive Forfeiture Act of 1983.

"(7) For fiscal years 1984, 1985, 1986, and 1987, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for the purposes described in paragraph (1). At the end of each fiscal year, any amount in the fund in excess of the amount appropriated shall be deposited in the General Fund of the Treasury of the United States, except that an amount not to exceed $5,000,000 may be carried forward and available for appropriation in the next fiscal year.

"(8) For the purposes of this subsection, property is forfeited pursuant to a law enforced or administered by the Department of Justice if it is forfeited pursuant to—

"(A) any criminal forfeiture proceeding;

"(B) any civil judicial forfeiture proceeding; or

"(C) any civil administrative forfeiture proceeding conducted by the Department of Justice; Except to the extent that the seizure was effected by a Customs officer or that custody was maintained by the Customs Service in which case the provisions of section 613a of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1613a) shall apply.".

TITLE IV

SEC. 401. Section 607 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1607) is amended to read as follows:

"§ 607. Seizure; value $100,000 or less, prohibited articles, transporting conveyances

"(a) If—

"(1) the value of such seized vessel, vehicle, aircraft, merchandise, or baggage does not exceed $100,000;

"(2) such seized merchandise consists of articles the importation of which is prohibited; or

"(3) such seized vessel, vehicle, or aircraft was used to import, export, or otherwise transport or store any controlled substances; the appropriate customs officer shall cause a notice of the seizure of such articles and the intention to forfeit and sell or otherwise dispose of the same according to law to be published for at least three successive weeks in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct. Written notice of seizure together with information on the applicable procedures shall be sent to each party who appears to have an interest in the seized article.

"(b) As used in this section, the term 'controlled substance' has the meaning given that term in section 102 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 802).".

SEC. 402. Section 608 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1608) is amended in the second sentence by inserting after "penal sum of" the following: "$5,000 or 10 per centum of the value of the claimed property, whichever is lower, but not less than,".

SEC. 403. Section 609 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1609) is amended by striking out "after deducting the actual expenses of seizure, publication, and sale in the Treasury of the United States." and inserting in lieu thereof "after deducting expenses enumerated in section 613 of this Act into the Customs Forfeiture Fund.".

SEC. 404. Section 610 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1610) is amended by striking out "If the value of any vessel, vehicle, merchandise, or baggage so seized is greater than $10,000," and substituting in lieu thereof the following: "If any vessel, vehicle, aircraft, merchandise, or baggage is not subject to the procedure set forth in section 607,".

SEC. 405. Section 612 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1612) is amended by—

(1) inserting "aircraft," immediately after "vehicle," wherever it appears in the section;

(2) striking out "and the value of such vessel, vehicle, merchandise, or baggage as determined under section 606 does not exceed $10,000," in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and the article is subject to the provisions of section 607 of this Act,"; and

(3) striking out "If such value of such vessel, vehicle, merchandise, or baggage exceeds $10,000," in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "If the article is not subject to the provisions of section 607 of this Act,".

SEC. 406. Section 613(a)(3) of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1613(a)(3)) is amended to read as follows:

"(3) The residue shall be deposited in the Customs Forfeiture Fund.".

SEC. 407. The Tariff Act of 1930 is amended by adding a new section immediately after section 613 (19 U.S.C. 1613) to read as follows:

"§ 613a. Customs Forfeiture Fund

"(a) There is hereby established in the Treasury of the United States a special fund for the United States Customs Service that shall be entitled the 'Customs Forfeiture Fund' (hereinafter referred to in this section as the 'fund'). This fund shall be available without fiscal year limitation in such amounts as may be specified in appropriations Acts for the following purposes of the United States Customs Service—

"(1) the payment of all proper expenses of the seizure or detention or the proceedings of forfeiture and sale (not otherwise recovered under section 613(a)) including but not limited to, expenses of inventory, security, maintaining the custody of the property, advertising and sale, and if condemned by the court and a bond for such costs was not given, the costs as taxed by the court; and

"(2) the payment of awards of compensation to informers under section 619 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

"(b) There shall be deposited in the fund all proceeds from the sale or other disposition of property forfeited under, and any currency or monetary instruments seized and forfeited under, the laws enforced or administered by the United States Customs Service.

"(c) Amounts in the fund which are not currently needed for the purposes of this section shall be kept on deposit or invested in obligations of, or guaranteed by, the United States.

"(d) The Commissioner of the Customs shall transmit to the Congress, not later than four months after the end of each fiscal year a detailed report on the amounts deposited in the fund and a description of expenditures made under this section.

"(e) The provisions of this section relating to deposits in the fund shall apply to all property in the custody of the United States Customs Service on or after the effective date of the Comprehensive Forfeiture Act of 1983.

"(f) For the purposes described in subsection (a), there are authorized to be appropriated from the fund for fiscal year 1984 not more than $10,000,000, for fiscal year 1985 not more than $15,000,000, for fiscal year 1986 not more than $20,000,000, and for fiscal year 1987 not more than $20,000,000. Amounts in the fund in excess of the amounts appropriated at the end of each fiscal year shall be deposited in the General Fund of the Treasury of the United States. At the end of the last fiscal year for which appropriations from the fund are authorized by this Act, the fund shall cease to exist and any amount then remaining in the fund shall be deposited in the General Fund of the Treasury of the United States.".

SEC. 408. A new section 616 is added to the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1616) to read as follows:

"§ 616. Disposition of forfeited property

"(a) Notwithstanding any other provision of the law, the Commissioner is authorized to retain forfeited property, or to transfer such property on such terms and conditions as he may determine to—

"(1) any other Federal agency; or

"(2) any State or local law enforcement agency which participated directly in any of the acts which led to the seizure or forfeiture of the property.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall ensure the equitable transfer pursuant to paragraph (2) of any forfeited property to the appropriate State or local law enforcement agency so as to reflect generally the contribution of any such agency participating directly in any of the acts which led to the seizure or forfeiture of such property. A decision by the Secretary pursuant to paragraph (2) shall not be subject to review. The United States shall not be liable in any action arising out of the use of any property the custody of which was transferred pursuant to this section to any non-Federal agency.

"(b) The Secretary of the Treasury may order the discontinuance of any forfeiture proceedings under this Act in favor of the institution of forfeiture proceedings by State or local authorities under an appropriate State or local statute. After the filing of a complaint for forfeiture under this Act, the Attorney General may seek dismissal of the complaint in favor of forfeiture proceedings under State or local law.

"(c) Whenever forfeiture proceedings are discontinued by the United States in favor of State or local proceedings, the United States may transfer custody and possession of the seized property to the appropriate State or local official immediately upon the initiation of the proper actions by such officials.

"(d) Whenever forfeiture proceedings are discontinued by the United States in favor of State or local proceedings, notice shall be sent to all known interested parties advising them of the discontinuance or dismissal. The United States shall not be liable in any action arising out of the seizure, detention, and transfer of seized property to State or local officials.".

SEC. 409. Section 619 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1619) is amended by—

(a) striking out "$50,000" each time it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$150,000"; and

(b) adding at the end thereof "In no event shall the Secretary delegate the authority to pay an award under this section in excess of $10,000 to an official below the level of the Commissioner of Customs.".

SEC. 410. The Tariff Act of 1930 is amended by adding a new section 589, to read as follows:

"§ 589. Arrest authority of customs officers

"Subject to the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, an officer of the Customs Service as defined in section 401(i) of this Act, as amended, may—

"(1) carry a firearm;

"(2) execute and serve any order, warrant, subpena, summons, or other process issued under the authority of the United States;

"(3) make an arrest without a warrant for any offense against the United States committed in the officer's presence or for a felony, cognizable under the laws of the United States committed outside the officer's presence if the officer has reasonable grounds to believe that the person to be arrested has committed or is committing a felony; and

"(4) perform any other law enforcement duty that the Secretary of the Treasury may designate.".

(b) Section 7607 of the Internal Revenue Act of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 7607) is repealed.

SEC. 411. Sections 602, 605, 606, 608, 609, 611, 613, 614, 615, 618, and 619 (19 U.S.C. 1602, 1605, 1606, 1608, 1609, 1611, 1613, 1614, 1615, 1618, and 1619) of the Tariff Act of 1930 are amended by inserting the word "aircraft," immediately after the words "vehicle" or "vehicles," wherever they appear.

SEC. 412. Section 644 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1644) is amended to read as follows:

"§ 644. Application of the Federal Aviation Act and section 1518(d) of title 33

"(a) The authority vested by section 1109 of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1509) in the Secretary of the Treasury, by regulation to provide for the application to civil air navigation of the laws and regulations relating to the administration of customs, and of the laws and regulations relating to the entry and clearance of vessels, shall extend to the application in like manner of any of the provisions of this Act, or of the Anti-Smuggling Act of 1935, or of any regulations promulgated hereunder.

"(b) For purposes of section 1518(d) of Title 33, the term 'customs laws administered by the Secretary of the Treasury' shall mean this chapter and any other provisions of law classified to this title.".

SEC. 413. The Tariff Act of 1930 is amended by adding a new section 600 to read as follows:

"§ 600. Application of the customs laws to other seizures by customs officers

"The procedures set forth in sections 602 through 619 of this Act (19 U.S.C. 1602 through 1619) shall apply to seizures of any property effected by customs officers under any law enforced or administered by the Customs Service unless such law specifies different procedures.".

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I express my appreciation to Senator BIDEN, who has worked with me on these matters, the ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee.

On Monday I believe we go into habeas corpus and other matters. At that time we will take up other crime bills.

I also wish to express my appreciation to the able majority leader for his fine assistance and cooperation in getting these bills up and for his assistance in helping us to pass them. We wish to deeply express our gratitude to him and also to the minority leader for allowing these bills to come up with his cooperation.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, if we can move as rapidly on what remains on this criminal calendar, if you will, as we have the last 2 days, we will be in good shape. I am anxious to get to them on Monday.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, now I shall make an announcement that no doubt Members have waited for with some expectation. There will be no more rollcall votes today.

Mr. President, on yesterday and perhaps this morning I announced we hoped also to do the drug czar bill today. There are negotiations in progress on the form and substance of that measure that might expedite the consideration of the bill Monday. So, the leadership chose to bring that matter up today.

Next week, however, we will have a busy week to finish the so-called ancillary bills to the criminal package. We must deal with the Specter career criminal bill, habeas corpus, drug czar, exclusionary rule, Federal tort claims, and death penalty.

I expect we will be a good part of next week, maybe all of next week, doing these things, but it is the intention of the leadership to try to do all of those.

Mr. President, we also must deal with Export Administration, and I hope that by the first of the week we can have a better idea about what we are going to do and when we are going to do it.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period now for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 3 p.m., in which Senators may speak for not more than 10 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. president, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1984

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it would be my intention to ask the Senate to adjourn today instead of recess. But first I would like to propound a unanimous-consent request for the consideration of the minority leader and other Senators with respect to that.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, if the Senate adjourns today, when it reconvenes on Monday, February 6, the reading of the Journal be dispensed with; that no resolutions come over under the rule; that the call of the Calendar be dispensed with; and that following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order that there be a special order in favor of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska (Mr. EXON), of not to exceed 15 minutes, to be followed in turn by a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 12 noon, in which Senators may speak for not more than 10 minutes each; and provided further that the morning hour shall be deemed to have expired.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I do not object, would the distinguished majority leader provide an additional 15 minutes order for me?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President, I amend the request in that respect.

Mr BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 11 A.M., MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1984

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in adjournment until the hour of 11 a.m. on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there is only one item on today's calendar of business that appears to be cleared on both sides. I would inquire of the minority leader if he is prepared to consider House Concurrent Resolution 220, which is Calendar Order No. 632 at this time.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am glad to answer in the affirmative.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

CONDEMNING THE TURKISH FEDERATED STATE OF CYPRUS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 220.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 220) condemning the action of the so-called "Turkish Federated State of Cyprus" in declaring itself to be an independent state on Cyprus on November 15, 1983.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

NEGOTIATING A FAIR AND PERMANENT SETTLEMENT ON CYPRUS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the general intent of this resolution, but it should not be taken as a criticism of the present governments of Turkey or Greece. There have been some conflicting reports for example, regarding the knowledge available to the Turkish leadership concerning the plan of action by the Turkish Cypriot leader, Mr. Rayf Denktash, to unilaterally declare an independent Turkish State on Cyprus last November, 1983. Nevertheless, it would appear that this action was taken independently by Mr. Denktash, and without the prior knowledge of the Turkish Government.

I would also point out that the present Turkish Government, a representative democracy formed as a result of elections held this past November, came to power after the events condemned by this resolution occurred.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, the action taken by Mr. Denktash is regrettable and should be corrected through appropriate actions taken by all sides to this controversy. The Secretary General of the United Nations, Mr. Javier Perez de Cuellar, has been actively involved in recent weeks in brokering a series of proposals and counterproposals by the leaders of both Cypriot communities—Greek and Turkish—to move toward the goal of a unified government for all of Cyprus which would protect the rights and interests of both communities. The Turkish Cypriots made a series of proposals on December 2, 1983, and those proposals have been met with the offer of a comprehensive framework by the Greek Cypriot leadership. Although the process of negotiation has a long way to go, this movement is healthy, in the right direction, and should be encouraged in every way possible by the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, United States interests in the eastern Mediterranean are critical—they are intimately related to the vitality of NATO, and to the influence and prestige of the United States in the Middle East. Greece and Turkey are both important NATO countries, both critical to deterring Soviet designs on the Middle East and Mediterranean. I have been pleased to note that a series of recent developments strengthens U.S. relations with both nations. This past September 8, the United States signed a 5-year Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement with Greece which guarantees unchanged American access to the current system of military bases in Greece. This agreement was vociferously opposed by the Communist Party and other left-wing elements in Greece, and the government of Prime Minister Papandreou was under great pressure to abandon the arrangement. Denial of American access to our bases in Greece would have been a bad blow to the capabilities and integrity of NATO.

In addition, relations with Turkey are continuing to develop well. On November 29, 1982, the United States and Turkey signed a memorandum of understanding that would allow the United States to modernize existing Turkish air force bases and establish several new bases. The agreement will also permit us to airlift troops to those bases in times of a NATO-designated crisis. I was particularly pleased that the Appropriations Committee accepted a proposal that I made last year to fund the construction of a new fighter base in eastern Turkey, at the town of Mus, which is well within striking distance of historic Russian invasion routes into Iran. This base would house both Turkish and U.S. fighter squadrons in the event of a crisis.

I would also point out to my colleagues that an additional United States-Turkish agreement was signed in late November 1983 in which the United States was granted rights to use the southern Turkish airbase of Incirlik for purposes of resupplying our troops participating in the multinational force in Lebanon. The agreement permits the movement of 600 men and 350,000 lbs. of equipment through Incirlik every month for purposes of supporting our Lebanon operations. This is the first time that the Turks have allowed us to use any facility in Turkey for any purpose outside the NATO framework.

Turkey's military government, in power since it took control from an incapacitated parliament in 1980, announced and stuck by a schedule for a return to what it has termed a controlled democracy. The generals felt the only way to bring Turkey out of the political turmoil and chaos it had experienced in the late seventies was to refashion the political system and stabilize the economic system. The program apparently met with strong popular support, eliminated the dangerous level of internal terrorist activity that had developed in the late 1970's and stabilized the economy. The elections of last November, although limited in their range of political participation, are to be welcomed and the process of restoring democracy should be applauded.

Greece is an important NATO country. Turkey is an ally of growing importance which is playing significant peacekeeping roles in the Middle East—for example, as a mediator in the Iran-Iraq conflict. The recent series of defense agreements with both nations must be preserved. Good relations with both nations are vital to us.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am pleased to see that some diplomatic movement between the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities is now occurring and that the goal of a unified Cyprus is still alive. Positive actions by the United States to encourage this process, particularly through the good offices of the United Nations, are to be encouraged.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise this afternoon to express my sense of shock and outrage over the announced establishment of a Turkish Republic on Cyprus. This action, undertaken by Rauf Denktash, leader of the Turkish Cypriots, clearly has been designed to drive a wedge between the people of Cyprus and to undermine the legitimate government of President Spyros Kyprianou.

During July 1974, an estimated 40,000 Turkish troops invaded Cyprus. More than 200,000 Greek Cypriots were displaced as a result of that illegal invasion. Today, nearly a decade later, a Turkish force of more than 20,000 remains on the island.

The continued presence of these troops on Cyprus is a flagrant violation of the sovereignty of the Cypriot Government. It must be condemned. In addition, the unilateral declaration of independence proclaimed earlier this week can serve only to further frustrate efforts to bring about a peaceful resolution of hostilities on Cyprus.

Of particular concern is the wholehearted support expressed by the Government of Turkey for the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus. The United States has been joined by Greece and a number of other important allies in decrying the action taken by the Turkish Cypriots. I have joined as a cosponsor of the pending resolution which calls for the removal of all Turkish troops from Cyprus, as well as the reunification of that nation.

Mr. President, I urge the adoption of this important resolution as a clear demonstration of our continued support and commitment to Cyprus.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 220. On November 15, 1983, the so-called assembly of the Turkish Federation of Cyprus declared that portion of Cyprus which is occupied by Turkish troops, to be a free and independent state. That illegal act of secession from the Republic of Cyprus was roundly condemned by this Senate, by the U.S. Government, and by most responsible members of the international community. Such an act, if permitted to stand, would violate the physical integrity of Cyprus, and destroy its future ability to reenter the ranks of nations as a unified, democratic society.

This desperate act of attempted bifurcation of Cyprus is but the culmination of a decade of turmoil, dashed hopes, and deep frustration on that troubled island. It is the tragic culmination of a political process that began with the Turkish invasion of Cyprus in 1974, 10 years later Turkish occupation continues over 40 percent of the island Republic. Neither a congressional embargo against arms sales to Turkey, adopted in 1975 and repealed in 1978, nor United Nations-sponsored bicommunal talks aimed at a political resolution has yielded much by way of a progress toward reintegration on Cyprus.

With the surprise election of a new civilian government in Turkey, led by Turgot Ozal and his Motherland party, last November, many of us had hoped for a more conciliatory policy in Ankara. Regrettably, to date, that has not been the case. Turkey's recognition of the illegal delaration of independence continues. We can only hope, Mr. President, that as Prime Minister Ozal's government takes hold, it may yet turn its attention to this most vexing problem, and join with the other interested parties in working for a fair resolution of the Cyprus dilemma.

As a first step, Turkey, the only nation to provide recognition to the illegal independent Turkish Cypriot entity, should withdraw its recognition. Such a move, coupled with full implementation of U.N. Resolution 541, which was adopted on November 18, and calls for the reversal of the declaration of independence could significantly contribute to a climate of cooperation and accommodation in Cyprus.

On January 11, Cypriot President Spyros Kyprianou unveiled a detailed proposal for both a constitutional and territorial settlement for Cyprus. His thoughtful proposals include a power-sharing arrangement that would allow for a Greek Cypriot President and a Turkish Cypriot Vice-President, a final territorial arrangement that would allow maximum local autonomy, while preserving the integrity of the Republic itself. These proposals from Mr. Kyprianou are fair ones and deserve a more thoughtful response from Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot community as well. U.N. Secretary General Perez-Cuellar took these proposals with him to the recently held Islamic conference in Casablanca where he discussed them with Mr. Denktash, the leader of the Turkish Cypriot community, and with President Evren of Turkey. We all await their further response to his suggestions for further talks.

Meanwhile, Mr. President, the problem of Cyprus festers. It will not go away by wishing it so. And as long as it is allowed to fester, it will erode the stability of the vital southern flank of our NATO alliance. The events of the past 2 months have not only challenged the complacency of the international community on this issue, but also offered a rare opportunity for a diplomatic breakthrough. In this regard, the United States must not slacken its resolve to resist, and ultimately reverse, the unilateral and illegal declaration of independence, and to move all parties to the negotiating table for a fair and lasting resolution of the Cyprus problem.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I join in strong support of House Concurrent Resolution 220, which condemns the illegal declaration of independence by the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus.

This unjustified action is an unacceptable violation of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus. It is illegal. It preempts negotiations to resolve the dispute on Cyprus. It must be strongly opposed by the United States, by our allies and by all nations in the world community.

I urge the administration to give the tragic situation in Cyprus a higher priority in our Nation's foreign policy. We must insure that more effective efforts are made to achieve a peaceful settlement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 220) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, next I have a Senate resolution dealing with the representation of Galen Reser in Civil Action No. 83-3819 and it is to authorize testimony and representation. I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to consider that Senate resolution at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORIZING TESTIMONY AND REPRESENTATION OF A SENATE EMPLOYEE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I send the resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 334) authorizing testimony and representation of Galen Reser in the case of Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Company v. George P. Schultz, et al. Civil Action No. 83-3819.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the plaintiff in a civil case, Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Co. v. George P. Shultz, et al., Civil Action No. 83-3819, currently pending in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, has subpenaed Galen Reser, an employee of Senator PERCY's office, to provide testimony and documents at a hearing on a preliminary injunction. This resolution authorizes Mr. Reser to provide the nonprivileged testimony and documents, and directs the Senate Legal Counsel to represent Mr. Reser in this case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 334) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 334

Whereas the case of Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Company v. George P. Shultz, et al., Civil Action No. 83-3819, is pending in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia;

Whereas the plaintiff has subpoenaed Galen Reser, an employee of Senator

Percy's office, to testify and to produce documents;

Whereas by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas when it appears that testimony of an employee of the Senate, and documents, papers, and records under the control of or in the possession of the Senate are needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of the Senate;

Whereas pursuant to section 703(a) and 704(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. 288b(a) and 288c(a) (1982), the Senate may direct its counsel to defend the members and employees of the Senate in any proceeding with respect to any subpoena relating to their official responsibilities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to represent Galen Reser in the case of Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Company v. George P. Shultz et al.;

SEC. 2. That Galen Reser is authorized to testify and to produce subpoenaed documents in the case of Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Company v. George P. Shultz, et al., except for such testimony and documents as the Senate Legal Counsel or his representative determines are privileged from disclosure.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

THE EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on today's Executive Calendar, there is one item that appears cleared for action by unanimous consent under Federal Home Loan Bank Board and two nominations placed on the Secretary's desk in the Air Force. I inquire of the minority leader if he is prepared to consider all or any portion of those nominations at this time.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, we, on this side, are ready to proceed with all nominations on the calendar.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am afraid I am not prepared to consider all of them, but I do now ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session for the purpose of considering Calendar Order No. 447, the nomination of Mary A. Grigsby to be a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and those nominations in the Air Force placed on the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK BOARD

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the nomination.

The bill clerk proceeded to read the nomination of Mary A. Grigsby, of Texas, to be a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, it is my distinct pleasure to recommend that the Senate follow the lead of the Senate Banking Committee and approve the nomination of Mary A. Grigsby to be a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

Mary Grigsby knows the savings and loan business from the ground up. She started with Houston First Savings as a bookkeeper and worked her way up, becoming the president of the organization in 1971. She has most recently been serving as vice chairman of the board of United Savings, the second largest savings and loan in the State of Texas. She has also held many other industry-related positions, including serving as president of the Texas Savings and Loan League and as a member of the board of the Federal Home Loan Bank of Little Rock.

The Federal Home Loan Bank Board has the responsibility for supervising and assuring the soundness of over 3,000 savings and loan associations throughout America. Mary Grigsby's abilities and experience will enable her to play an active and positive role in the continued progress of this vital segment of our financial industry. The past few years have seen unprecedented strains placed on our financial system, and especially on the savings and loan industry. The current era of financial deregulation is placing additional strains on all our financial institutions. At the same time, there is still a continual need for home mortgage financing—the traditional specialty of the the savings and loan association.

In today's challenging climate, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board needs experienced, forward-looking leadership. Mary Grigsby has long been supplying such leadership in Texas. Mary has proven her ability to work out practical, bipartisan solutions to problems, and I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague from Texas, Senator TOWER, in wholeheartedly recommending her for confirmation to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

NOMINATIONS PLACED ON THE SECRETARY'S DESK IN THE AIR FORCE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations placed on the Secretary's desk be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc and confirmed en bloc.

The nominations considered and confirmed en bloc are as follows:

Air Force nominations beginning Paul W. Bishop, and ending Jacquelyn D. Reid, which nominations were received by the Senate and appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 18, 1983.

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination of Mary A. Grigsby was confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nominees placed on the Secretary's desk were confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I now ask that the President be immediately notified that the Senate has given its consent to these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is to ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is to ordered.

THE HISTORY OF THE SENATE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I understand that the distinguished minority leader is now prepared to deliver another statement in the series of statements he has made on the history of the Senate.

I do not want to embellish the matter too much, but I wanted to observe once more that what we are witnessing here in this growing list of speeches on the history of the Senate has become the definitive history of the Senate of the United States and in due course it will be printed as a Senate document, probably running to several volumes.

It is a scholarly work. It is destined to be the standard reference work for scholars, students, and historians who will study this institution and its special relationship to the rest of the Government.

I say these things because I want to express my admiration for the work that the minority leader is doing, and to express the appreciation, I am sure, of every Senator for this ongoing, monumental project.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

In order to accommodate that, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the transaction of routine morning business be extended today to whatever length may be required for the presentation of this statement today by the minority leader without restriction as to time, and I further ask unanimous consent that when he concludes that statement that the Chair place the Senate in adjournment pursuant to the order previously entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for his remarks, which were very gracious. I appreciate more than I can say the majority leader accommodating me on these statements, always accommodating me. I appreciate the cooperation he has steadfastly shown to me in making provision for me to make these statements.

I have at all times intended that they would be made at a time when there was no business to be transacted in the Senate. I have always also indicated that anytime a Senator comes into the Chamber and wishes to speak, I will yield time to the Member. If the majority leader has further business to transact, I will certainly yield the floor at that time.

Mr. President, I am not only flattered but I am encouraged by the majority leader's statement. I hope these statements do and will live up to his expressions concerning them.

I know of no extended series of statements on the Senate from an insider, except that Journal which was written by Senator Maclay during the first 2 years of the Senate when its doors were closed.

Senator Maclay was not reelected. He was quite acerbic as he talked about other Members. He seemed to find nothing good to say about any of them.

But for that Journal I suppose we would not have very much information concerning the first 2 years of the Senate as an institution operated under the Constitution.

I am sorry to note that he was not reelected after that first 2 years.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President I, too, have observed that without that we would not know much about the earliest days of the Senate, and maybe we do not know much about it anyway.

I have a few copies of the Congressional Globe in my office that go back to the earliest days of the publication, but they were well after the Senate had established itself as an institution in Government.

I also would note that official minutes and records of important and historic events are very rare indeed during our formative years.

I am advised, and I believe this is correct, that among the first actions taken by the Constitutional Convention was a resolution first to close the doors to the public and second to direct no minutes of the proceedings would be kept.

I cannot imagine what would happen in today's circumstances if any public institution were to do that. It would violate the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act and the sunshine laws. But our early Founding Fathers were not overly fastidious about guaranteeing public access to the deliberations.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. President, this is the 64th statement in the series which began on March 20, 1980.

THE UNITED STATES SENATE

THE SENATE IN THE PROGRESSIVE ERA, 1901-1912

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, at the close of the Fifty-Sixth Congress, on March 2, 1901, members of the House of Representatives, the Supreme Court, the cabinet, high-ranking military officers and other dignitaries filed into the Senate chamber to witness the swearing in of the new vice president of the United States, forty-two-year-old Theodore Roosevelt. The young vice president was a familiar face to most of those in attendance. For many years he had resided in Washington as chairman of the Civil Service Commission and later as assistant secretary of the Navy. During the war with Spain in 1898 Roosevelt had led his Rough Riders to glory at the battle of San Juan Hill. Triumphantly he returned to be elected governor of New York. He was a cowboy and a scholar, a physical fitness advocate and a naturalist, a reformer and a party loyalist. Above all, young "Teddy" Roosevelt was an unpredictable and impetuous enthusiast for numerous ideas and causes, who made the elders of his party quite nervous. At the Republican convention in 1900 they found the perfect place to temper his ardor: they nominated him for vice president. With a little luck, they felt, he would never be heard from again.

Vice President Roosevelt did not deliver his inaugural address until the opening of the Fifty-Seventh Congress, on March 4. We can imagine him standing in this chamber at the presiding officer's desk. His pince nez glasses perched on his nose, his high pitched voice, his arm pointing skyward for gesture, addressing the members of the Senate. "Senators," he told them, "the history of free government is in large part the history of those representative legislative bodies in which, from the earliest times, free government has found its loftiest express . . . . A great work lies ready to the hand of this generation; and thrice happy is the generation that to it is given such a work to do. A leading part in the work must be taken by this august and powerful legislative body over which I have been called to preside. Most deeply do I appreciate the privilege of my position, for high indeed is the honor of presiding over the American Senate at the beginning of the twentieth century." [1]

Those were fine words, Mr. President, but, in fact, Theodore Roosevelt presided over the Senate only 6 days, during the special session of the 57th Congress. The Senate adjourned on March 9 and did not return to regular session until December 2, 1901. In the interim, President William McKinley was assassinated in September at the Pan-American Exposition in Buffalo. The president had been shaking hands on a receiving line when a slim young man with a bandaged hand stepped up. The bandage concealed a pistol, which he fired twice at the president. President McKinley lingered a week before he died of gangrene and infection—apparently as much a victim of medical incompetency as of assassination. His last words were the title of that old hymn, "Nearer My God To Thee."

The president's assassin was a self-proclaimed anarchist, Leon Czolgosz, who opposed all men in power and authority. The son of Russian Poles who had come to the United States 42 years earlier, Czolgosz had been deeply influenced by labor unrest in the coal fields of Pennsylvania and West Virginia. The treatment of Slavic miners in the Latimer Mines Massacre in 1897 particularly strengthened his anarchistic tendencies.

It is instructive to note the "terrible swift sword" of justice in those days. Czolgosz went on trial on September 23, 9 days after McKinley died. He was convicted of murder the next day, and electrocuted 1 month and 6 days later, on October 29, 1901.

Former President Grover Cleveland eulogized President McKinley. "All our people loved their dead president," said Cleveland. "His kindly nature and lovable traits of character, and his amiable consideration for all about him will long live in the minds and hearts of his countrymen." Parenthetically, it is interesting to note that Cleveland, whose operation for cancer of the mouth in 1893, which I described in my last address, outlived his successor. Former President Cleveland retired to a home near the Princeton University campus, where he died in 1908 at the age of 71, from ailments unrelated to that disease which nearly claimed his life during his presidency.

Now, with McKinley dead, "that damned cowboy," as Senator Mark Hanna called him, was in the White House. And the first order of the new session was to receive the message of the president of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt. Running over thirty thousand words, Roosevelt's message filled twelve pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Some called it a conservative message, and a continuance of McKinley's program, but in it we can see the seeds of a new activist administration by a progressive president. Roosevelt asserted that the old laws and customs concerning the concentration and distribution of wealth were "no longer sufficient." He saw trouble ahead in the development of large-scale industry, and called for national supervision of corporations, a new cabinet department for Commerce and Industries, and revision of the Interstate Commerce Commission Act to equalize railroad rates for all shippers. He advocated protection of our natural resources, protection of forest reserves, and reclamation and settlement of arid lands.[2] Here was the beginning of one of the greatest periods of reform in American history. Theodore Roosevelt was the prototype of what political scientists call a "positive-activist" president. He altered public expectation of what a chief executive should do, and how he should lead. He changed the way the press reported on the presidency. He began a shift of power and attention from Capitol Hill to the White House that culminated in the "Imperial Presidency" of our own time. Quite a difference from the words of the youthful vice president who expected to preside over the "august and powerful" Senate.

Theodore Roosevelt grew to such a monumental figure, both during his own lifetime and in the histories and folktales ever since—with his gleaming teeth, "big stick," and even the Teddy Bear, named for him—that he obscures our view of how "august and powerful" the United States Senate really was during his term, how mightily he had to struggle to enact his programs, and how frequently he had to compromise with the conservative senators who controlled this body. The purpose of my remarks today, in my continuing series of addresses on the history of the United States Senate, is to focus on the powerful leaders of the Senate of that era and on the great struggle that took place in this chamber between the defenders of the status quo and the champions of reform.

Historians say that four men ruled the Senate in those first years of the twentieth century. "The Four," were Nelson W. Aldrich of Rhode Island, William B. Allison of Iowa, Orville H. Platt of Connecticut, and John C. Spooner of Wisconsin. Visitors to the office of the Majority Leader will notice a large photograph of The Four, seated together in wicker chairs and rockers on the porch at Senator Aldrich's estate in Newport, Rhode Island, in 1903, attesting that they were close personal friends who socialized in private as well as collaborated in public. Professor Horace Samuel Merrill and Marion Galbraith Merrill have written a spirited analysis of The Senate Four in their book, The Republican Command, 1897-1913. The Merrills describe these powerful senators as "hard-working, knowledgeable, experienced, professional politicians . . . The Four educated each other, helped each other, protected each other . . . The Four arrived at their collective decisions through frequent informal conferences among themselves, often held in Platt's simple but comfortable apartment." Long-time New York Times reporter Charles Willis Thompson, who covered the Senate at the turn of the century, corroborates the Merrills' assessment. "The four bosses of the Senate can and do control that body," Thompson wrote. "This means that these four men can block and defeat anything that the president or the House may desire." [3]

Senator Aldrich chaired the Senate Finance Committee, Allison was the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Spooner chaired the Rules Committee, and Platt chaired the Committee on Cuba. All four were members of Aldrich's Finance Committee. "They ruled as they pleased and wielded the rubber stamps they appropriated from the committee rooms," the Merrills noted. As one Republican senator wrote to William Allison: "I consider the interests of the government as embodied in you and in Senator Aldrich. What you say goes. Kindly keep me posted as to what you do, so that I may not go astray." [4]

Nelson Aldrich, by the way, was the grandfather of former Vice President Nelson Aldrich Rockefeller, and the great-grandfather of the current governor of West Virginia, Jay Rockefeller. Senator Aldrich was perhaps the most powerful member of The Four. A handsome man with piercing eyes and a flowing white mustache, Aldrich had started out as a grocery store clerk in a Rhode Island mill town, advancing quickly through business and politics until he became a millionaire through his consolidation of the street railways in Providence, Rhode Island. In 1881 he was elected to the Senate where he became a member of the Finance Committee. Working his way up through the seniority system, Aldrich became chairman of the committee in 1898, but he had become a power in the committee and on the Senate floor years before. The Finance Committee controlled all tariff legislation, which was the center of so much political attention and controversy during the late nineteenth century. On the Finance Committee, Aldrich represented northeastern industrial and manufacturing interests. He spent his early years in the Senate studying financial questions carefully and reading widely on issues of political economy.

For nearly two decades before Aldrich became chairman, Senator Justin Morrill of Vermont chaired the Finance Committee. But Morrill was more interested in theory than in details, and it was Nelson Aldrich who devoted himself to the intricacies of each tariff bill. When a tariff bill came in from the House, Aldrich would go over each of its schedules, leaving his mark on nearly every area. Observers said that he had almost as much influence in shaping the Democratic Wilson-Gorman tariff as he did over Republican tariffs. Needless to say, Aldrich's importance was soon recognized by other senators and by various industrial interests seeking to shape the tariff rates. By 1901 a leading Washington correspondent called Aldrich "the most influential man in Congress." He was also known as "the boss of the Senate."[5]

Despite these titles, the average visitor in the Senate galleries might never have picked out Nelson Aldrich as the dominant force in the Senate. In a chamber where one could listen to such renowned orators as Albert J. Beveridge, Chauncey Depew, and "Pitchfork Ben" Tillman, one practically never heard Senator Aldrich give an address. "He has no aspirations to shine as an orator," wrote journalist Louis Coolidge. "When he makes a speech in the Senate it is on some dry financial subject and its sole purpose is to supply his side with ammunition. He never jumps into a rough-and-tumble debate, but he has a way of asking questions, or making statements, which are disconcerting to the other side. He is quite ready to let others have all the spectacular advantages."[6]

While Aldrich satisfied himself with committee and cloakroom activities, it was Senator John Coit Spooner of Wisconsin who served as the orator of The Four. Spooner possessed a brilliant legal mind and boasted a successful career as a railroad lawyer and lobbyist before his election to the Senate. He was a favorite of the galleries and was often compared to Stephen A. Douglas, because of his skill in debate and his ability to draft compromises. Although never the power that Aldrich was, Spooner assured his place in the Senate Republican leadership by making his legal and constitutional knowledge available to the non-lawyer Aldrich. One news correspondent reported entering the Rules Committee, which Spooner chaired, and finding books scattered everywhere on the floor. When asked what happened, Spooner replied: "Oh, I have been trying to get some law into Aldrich."[7]

William B. Allison of Iowa, the "sage old pilot of the Senate," was at home equally in the committee room or on the Senate floor. His service in Congress dated back to the Civil War, and his total tenure in the Senate of thirty-five years and five months puts him eleventh on the list of the longest serving United States senators in history (recently he was surpassed in years of service by our distinguished colleague, who was on the floor just a minute ago, Senator John C. Stennis). Allison is the absolute record-holder as the longest serving committee chairman, having chaired the Appropriations Committee for twenty-five years, from 1881 to 1893, and from 1895 to 1908. (The record for the longest consecutive service as chairman, twenty-two years, is shared by former Senator Warren Magnuson, as chairman of the Commerce Committee, and former Senator James Eastland, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee.)

Allison, with his massive leonine head, immense forehead, and mass of gray hair, was frequently referred to as "the Old Fox." He rarely gave his opinion on any subject to the press, which might account for the length of his Senate career. Although he represented a predominantly rural, agricultural state, Allison spoke for the business, industrial, and railroad interests. He defended the protective tariff and used his powerful positions on both the Appropriations and Finance committees to try to defuse the emotional currency issues of the day. It is a credit to Allison's political skills that he managed to juggle such vastly different constituencies for so many years. "He never made a false step politically," wrote the Merrills. "He moved with such cautious surety that it was widely said that he could walk on eggs ffrom Des Moines to Washington without breaking one of them, or the length of a piano keyboard without making a sound, or glide across the Senate floor in wooden shoes making no more noise than a fly on the ceiling."[8]

The genial Orville Platt of Connecticut was a mild, stately old gentleman with a long white beard, an old New England Yankee who possessed "the face and manner of a pastor emeritus." Platt's biographer appropriately named the book "An Old-Fashioned Senator." Platt had the reputation of being the most constructive legislator of The Four. He was interested in reform of the Senate rules. He wanted to reduce or abolish the many closed-door executive sessions of the Senate—they had more of the closed-door sessions in those days than we do in our day—and he wanted to establish a cloture rule to cut off filibusters. Unlike Aldrich, Allison, and Spooner, Platt's name was more popularly associated with foreign policy than domestic policy. He was the author of the famous "Platt Amendment" in 1901 which made Cuba a virtual protectorate of the United States for the next thirty years. On tariff, currency, and general business issues, Platt added his sage advice and loyal support to the rest of The Four. When Platt died in 1905, Senator Aldrich recalled that "in every phase of my work here I found his counsel most helpful. In his death I am conscious of the loss of a dear friend, who was, all in all the best man I ever knew."[9]

There were other influential senators of the era, men such as Henry Cabot Lodge, Sr., Eugene Hale, and Mark Hanna, but in truth they were lieutenants to The Four and remained in secondary positions so long as Aldrich, Allison, Spooner, and Platt called the shots. These were the "august and powerful" senators with whom the brash young President Theodore Roosevelt would have to deal if he wished to enact his legislative program.

Mr. President, Theodore Roosevelt is a particularly difficult president to assess because he has achieved almost folk hero status. He looms large in the history books, following as he did after a string of rather dowdy and forgettable chief executives. We remember him as perhaps the first modern president. Those of us who participated in the Panama Canal Treaty debates in 1978 got a healthy dose of Theodore Roosevelt and his role in acquiring control over the Canal Zone. Now, in the midst of renewed interests in Central American affairs, we are reminded of his "Roosevelt Corollary" of 1904, justifying American intervention in the Caribbean as "an international police power." By contrast to this interventionism and his more bellicose Rough Rider image, we also recall that he was the first American to win the Nobel Peace Prize for his work in negotiating the Portsmouth Peace Treaty which ended the Russo-Japanese War.

In domestic affairs, Roosevelt was equally active. In 1902 he sided with striking coal miners to bring an end to the anthracite coal strike. That same year he ordered prosecution of the Northern Securities Company, symbolizing a more aggressive Federal antitrust program. He endorsed such landmark legislation as the Newlands Reclamation Act to provide irrigation for arid states of the West; the Elkins Act to end railroad rebates; the Hepburn Act to strengthen the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission in regulating railroads; the Pure Food and Drug Act and the Meat Inspection Act to protect American consumers; and the Aldrich-Vreeland Act setting up a national banking system and paving the way for the Federal Reserve Board. In addition, his annual messages to Congress contained virtually a catalogue of progressive reforms and demands, many of which were not enacted for decades to come.[10]

All these were notable accomplishments, but the questions I should like to address today are: How much was Roosevelt's reform program shaped by his dealings and compromises with the conservative leaders of the Senate? How far was he willing to go, and how soon was he willing to retreat on an issue? Roosevelt saw himself as a man of the political center, fending off on one side the plutocrats who controlled the great wealth and power of American industry, and on the other side the masses, with their radical and destabilizing demands. He projected this same dichotomy onto the Congress, as he wrote to his son in 1903: "I am having a terrific time trying to get various things through Congress and I pass my days in a state of exasperation, first with the fools who do not want to do any of the things that ought to be done, and, second, with the equally obnoxious fools who insist upon so much that they cannot get anything." Here he divided the Congress, overwhelmingly controlled by members of his own party, between the "Old Guard" who resisted change, and the progressive insurgents who were more ready to fight and lose than to compromise their principles. We think of Roosevelt as a reform president, but he was really a consensus president, cautiously waiting to act until he had public opinion and support in his corner, willing to accept "half a loaf" rather than none. When Roosevelt and his program are seen in this light, we can more readily perceive the influence that Congress—and particularly the struggle between conservative and progressive forces in Congress—had on his programs.[11]

For example, Roosevelt moved cautiously on the controversial issues of currency and tariff reform, sidestepping the demands of reformers and standing with the Old Guard in delaying or avoiding altogether changes in the law through both panics of 1903 and 1907. There was considerable public pressure to reduce the high tariff rates set by the Dingley Tariff of 1897. Agrarian reformers argued that high rates for industrial products discriminated against farmers by increasing the cost they paid for consumer goods, and at the same time fostered the growth of industrial trusts.

The tariff had also become a symbol of political corruption, as lobbyists worked feverishly to raise the rates for those producers who hired them. Certain members of Congress were identified with certain industries, whether pig iron, or textiles, or sugar, and built their campaign chests by working to keep rates high. By 1904 a national consensus seemed to be building for a general reduction in the tariffs, and certainly reform elements favored this solution. The New York Evening Post interviewed a thousand people listed in Who's Who on their views on tariff legislation, and ten to one they favored revision. Important members of the Republican party, notably former Secretary of War Elihu Root (who was shortly to become Secretary of State), argued with the president in favor of reduction of the tariff; and privately in his correspondence, Roosevelt agreed.

The Senate Four, Speaker of the House Joe Cannon, and other congressional leaders disagreed with this sentiment. "I see the newspaper correspondents are fixing things all up," Senator Platt wrote to Senator Aldrich, "for President Roosevelt to call a special session of Congress to revise the tariff." However, Platt insisted that "it is a time to go slow." Platt also objected to Roosevelt's consideration of creating a joint commission of experts to revise the tariff. As Platt wrote to Aldrich, "You know as well as I do, that a joint commission composed as suggested would be entirely valueless, so far as getting our ideas accepted is concerned." With congressional leaders of his party preferring to "stand pat" on the tariff issue, Roosevelt was reluctant to act. He hesitated to use his recent victory in the 1904 presidential election as leverage for confronting Congress. He decided against calling a special session. He did not ask for tariff revision. The high tariff remained unchanged throughout his presidency. The protectionists had won the war without fighting a battle.[12]

There was danger inherent in adopting a cautious policy, however; press surveys showed dissatisfaction with lack of legislative results in the stalemate between "an aggressive administration and a reluctant Senate." Roosevelt had been able to build a public image as a dynamic reform president through his executive acts, but he needed to build a legislative program if he wished to achieve any long-range reforms of the system. When Roosevelt decided to make his stand, it was on railroad rate regulation rather than a revision of the tariff.

For many years, reformers had denounced the practice of railroad rebating, in which large shippers were able to extract a rebate or reduction in fees for shipping their products on one railroad as opposed to another (and we are talking about an era in which there was intense competition between railroad lines). Naturally, this discriminated against smaller shippers who paid a higher rate. In his message to Congress on December 6, 1904, Theodore Roosevelt stated that "above all else we must strive to keep the highways of commerce open to all on equal terms; and to do this it is necessary to put a complete stop to all rebates." Roosevelt did not go so far as to propose that the Interstate Commerce Commission be given authority to set railroad rates, but he requested that it be vested with the power to review the reasonability of rates. "In my judgment the most important legislative act now needed as regards the regulation of corporations is this act to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to revise rates and regulations," Roosevelt concluded.[13]

Throughout 1905 the Republican Congress largely ignored Roosevelt's domestic program, but the president persisted. Again in his annual message in December 1905 he revived the railroad regulation proposal. Conservative newspapers denounced the plan as "centralization," but Roosevelt did receive considerable help from the "muckraking" magazines popular at that time. These journals fired up public sentiment against railroad monopoly and corruption, often using material secretly provided them by the White House.[14]

Examining Roosevelt's proposal, the New York Sun predicted that "the House may go through the form of moulding a hasty measure, but the Senate will not; no railway rates bill will be passed by the Fifty-Ninth Congress." This seemed like a safe assumption. Indeed, the railroad bill sailed easily through the House—where it became known as the "Hepburn bill" for Iowa Congressman William P. "Pete" Hepburn, chairman of the House Interstate Commerce Committee—and predictably it ran into stiff opposition in the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee. The chairman of the Senate committee was Stephen B. Elkins of West Virginia, a railroad investor and owner. As the journalist Mark Sullivan commented: "By every rule, precedent, and propriety, if the Republicans were going to work in normal harmony with their own president, it was Chairman Elkins' function to take charge of the bill, to give it his sponsorship and even his name, to pilot it through the committee, and thereafter to steer it through the Senate. But Elkins disavowed the measure, thereby making it a nameless orphan, and, from the offical Republican point of view, a tainted outcast."[15]

By the way, there is a beautiful community located in the mountains of West Virginia named Elkins, and my senior colleague, Senator Randolph, hails from Elkins. That is where his voting residence is located, and we are all very proud of Senator Jennings Randolph and have tremendous respect for him.

With Senator Elkins keeping at arms' length from the bill, the real tactician on the committee was Senator Nelson Aldrich; a man philosophically and politically opposed to government regulations of railroad rates. Realizing that a coalition of Democrats and progressive Republicans had the votes to report out the Hepburn bill, Aldrich set about to sabotage it. He convinced the committee to report the bill out without endorsement, and also arranged that committee members be permitted to add unlimited amendments to the bill on the floor. Thus they could smother it without killing it outright.

Aldrich had an even bolder legislative tactic up his sleeve. Since Senator Elkins had declined to serve as floor manager, and the next ranking Republican, Shelby M. Cullom, was ill, the progressive Republican Jonathan Dolliver of Iowa stood next in line. Dolliver was more than eager for the opportunity to manage the president's railroad bill. But Aldrich agrued that since the majority of Republicans on the committee did not support the bill it would be more honorable to allow the Democrats to take responsibility for it. The committee accepted Aldrich's motion, and Senator Benjamin Tillman, Democrat of South Carolina, found himself manager of the bill. "Somebody, by some hocus pocus—I hardly know how it happened—came to us unexpectedly and in a great hurry dumped this baby in my arms," Tillman observed. "I am suspicious of the paternity of the brat."[16]

Aldrich had conceived a stunning masterstroke. There was no other senator with whom Theodore Roosevelt would be more loath to work than "Pitchfork Ben" Tillman. A product of the Populist Movement, Tillman was a farmer-agitator turned politican who won his nickname by promising to go to Washington and stick his pitchfork into conservative president Grover Cleveland. From all accounts Tillman could be crude in manner, inflammatory in rhetoric, and sloppy in dress. He also possessed a most unparliamentary manner, as he demonstrated one day in 1902 by swinging his fist into the face of his colleague from South Carolina, John McLaurin, while they stood on the Senate floor. McLaurin responded with a blow to Tillman's nose, drawing blood, before the doorkeepers and other senators managed to separate them. As a result of this shocking incident, the Senate censured both Tillman and McLaurin, and President Roosevelt publicly withdrew an invitation to Tillman to attend a state dinner at the White House.

Roosevelt's public rebuke stung Tillman to the quick, and thereafter the senator never missed an opportunity to assail the president and his program. Now here were these two antagonists thrown together in common battle for railroad reform. As Tillman's biographer, Francis Simpkins, has written: "A Republican committee had placed the president's favorite measure in the hands of a Democratic senator who was a sworn enemy of the chief executive and had openly questioned the bill's wisdom. The appointment seemed unbelievable, a paradox, a weird practical joke; but it was a fact."

Yet, crafty maneuvers have a tendency to backfire on their creators. Much to Senator Aldrich's surprise—everyone's surprise—Senator Tillman and President Roosevelt swallowed their pride and worked together harmoniously in the bill's behalf. Roosevelt wanted, and needed, the legislative victory. Tillman also took his new responsibility very seriously. As a member of the minority he had been excluded from power and influence in the Senate, and as Professor Simpkins noted: "Given the opportunity, he earnestly strove to be a positive force." Tillman himself explained: "I don't propose that this thing shall be turned into a circus with me as a clown." [17]

This turn of events forced Aldrich to rethink his strategy, but once again he proved the master of the situation. Having split Replublican ranks by appointing a Democratic floor manager, Aldrich now called a party caucus to convince his colleagues to the need for party unity and the necessity of reaching a legislative compromise. Here Aldrich was assisted by two factors: first the Democratic ranks were split. Some Democratic senators had announced their opposition to the bill, demonstrating that Tillman could not offer a solid bloc of votes in its favor. Second, the president had recently made a dramatic peace overture to the conservative leaders of his party in the Senate.

President Roosevelt, as I have said, had been working hand-in-glove with a group of crusading magazine writers—Lincoln Steffans, Ray Stannard Baker, Mark Sullivan, and a long list of others—who were using their investigative reporting to stimulate a national progressive reform movement. Generally their articles supported Roosevelt, and his program, but in the spring of 1906 he feared they were going too far, causing too much discontent and popular unrest, and undermining his own political party. What disturbed Roosevelt most was a series of articles published in Cosmopolitan magazine (then owned by William Randolph Hearst), entitled, "Treason of the Senate." Written by David Graham Phillips, the series of exposes denounced the leaders of the Senate—Aldrich, Allison, Spooner, Chauncey Depew, Henry Cabot Lodge, Arthur P. Gorman, and others—for selling out to "the interests" and voting against the public good. Month after month Cosmopolitan presented villainous-looking senators on its covers and lurid accounts of their business connections and high-class social lives.

In March 1906 Theodore Roosevelt spoke at a dinner given by the Speaker of the House, Joseph Cannon, for the members of the Gridiron Society, the Washington newspaper correspondent's organization. Speaking to this audience of politicians and journalists, the president lashed out at irresponsible articles then appearing in the press. Roosevelt coined the phrase "muckrakers" in this speech by comparing these writers to the "Man with the Muck-Rake" in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, whose attention was so focused on the muck that he never saw the blue sky and shining sun above. This slashing attack on the magazine writers won much approval from congressional leaders, many of whom urged the President to repeat the address in public (Gridiron speeches then as now were not to be reported in the papers.) So in April 1906, at the laying of the cornerstone of what we now call the Cannon House Office Building, Roosevelt gave a slightly toned-down version of his "muckraker" speech. Senator Aldrich, who had been a prominent target of the "Treason of the Senate" series, took this for the peace overture that it was, and seized advantage of it.[18]

The time for compromise was at hand. Roosevelt could see that he did not have the votes in the Senate to win approval of the Hepburn Act without amendment. On the one hand, pro-railroad senators like Ohio's Joseph Foraker were bitterly opposed to the bill. Foraker made eighty-seven speeches against it, denouncing it as an unnecessary and "mischief-making" law. On the other hand, reformers like Wisconsin's new Senator Robert M. La Follette, Sr., decided that the bill would benefit only railroad shippers to the detriment of the nation's consumers. La Follette violated the Senate's long-standing tradition against speeches by freshman by rising in the Senate only three months after his arrival to deliver a speech of several days duration (the printed version of which ran to 148 pages) attacking the Hepburn Act. Even the president's close friend Henry Cabot Lodge spoke out against the bill. As Mark Sullivan noted: "Roosevelt had against him every Republican in the Senate whose position and leadership carried weight with the Republican majority." [19]

The chief area of contention narrowed down to court review of Interstate Commerce Commission rulings. Roosevelt favored narrow review, based strictly on the decisions of the commission; Aldrich favored broad review, based on the evidence the commission had used to reach those decisions. The president and the Republican leadership finally reached a compromise which was introduced as the "Allison Amendment." The courts would have the power to review ICC decisions, and also the authority to decide how broad or narrow that review should be. Senator Tillman, meanwhile was shocked at the president's abandonment of narrow review, which he had been loyally defending in the Senate. Senator Aldrich had approached Tillman with an offer of compromise, but Tillman had rejected it, refusing to betray his principles, and believing he had the votes to win. In the president, however, Aldrich found a man more willing to compromise. For the next two weeks Democratic members of the Senate berated the president as a "trimmer" and "quitter" who had emasculated his own bill. They called it "Roosevelt's surrender." But they lacked the votes, and the compromise carried. On May 18, 1906 the Senate passed the Hepburn Act by a vote of 71 to 3, with only Senator Foraker and two Alabama Democrats, John T. Morgan and Edmund Pettus, voting in the negative. Senator Aldrich did not cast a vote.[20]

Although Theodore Roosevelt had backed down, he had in truth won a majority victory. The new Hepburn Act advanced the principle of government regulation of not only the nation's railroads but of business in general. It was landmark legislation in the building of the independent regulatory commissions. Eventually Roosevelt also won a victory in the courts, which chose the narrow review of ICC decisions that he preferred over Senator Aldrich's broad review scheme. Later in the Fifty-Ninth Congress, Roosevelt also won enactment of pure food, drug, and meat inspection laws, all cornerstones of what we call the "Progressive Era" in American history.

Yet, this momentum for reform on the federal level did not continue throughout the remaining years of Roosevelt's administration. With the exception of emergency currency legislation following the Panic of 1907, as the Merrills have noted, Roosevelt and the Republican majorities in Congress "exhibited no desire to initiate any significant legislation on any important matters." They chose to leave reform legislation to state and local governments, where there was indeed a reform fervor. For the remainder of his term, President Roosevelt worked closely with Senator Aldrich, as leader of the Senate, and Speaker Cannon, his counterpart in the House, both pillars of conservatism in that Progressive Era.[21]

Mr. President, my point in focusing on the Hepburn Act has been twofold. First, to demonstrate that Roosevelt won his legislative battles not by locking horns with Congress—charging up Capitol Hill as he had San Juan Hill—but in seeking compromise. His progressive legislation was therefore often shaped and altered by conservatives in Congress, principally The Senate Four. Second, to recall that even as he engaged in these compromises, Roosevelt successfully maintained his image as a progressive reformer. As a result of his shrewd handling of the press, and his colorful, exuberant personality, Roosevelt fixed a strong image of himself in the public mind. He was better known for his bold public pronouncements than for his tempered remarks in closed door meetings with influential senators. The same, alas, was not true for Roosevelt's handpicked successor to the presidency, William Howard Taft.

"Never did any man come into the presidency before with such good will," commented the New York Sun.[22] Everyone held high hopes for the popular, genial, rotund Taft. It was universally expected that he would continue Roosevelt's programs, and, in truth, there was much continuity between their two administrations. Today we remember Theodore Roosevelt as a progressive and Taft as a conservative, but Taft was actually the more aggressive in prosecuting antitrust cases and in taking up tariff revisions. Rather than establishing him as a reform leader, however, these efforts—especially his handling of the tariff—proved to be his undoing.

Under Taft, as under Roosevelt, Senator Nelson W. Aldrich remained the single most powerful and influential senator—the man with whom the president would need to cooperate or fight an all-out war to pass his programs. By 1909 Aldrich was the last remaining member of "The Senate Four." Allison and Platt were dead, and Spooner had retired. In the public mind, reinforced by many articles and editorial cartoons, Aldrich embodied the anti-reform element in the Senate. The press denounced him as "boss", "dictator", "despot", and "tyrant." The progressive Senator Albert Beveridge referred to Aldrich as the most powerful member of any legislative body anywhere in the world.

In 1909, Nelson Aldrich held the positions of chairman of the Republican Conference and its Committee on Committees, and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. In addition, he distributed campaign contributions raised from corporate interests to various Republican senatorial candidates. This was an awesome combination of power for any senator to challenge, and few tried. One of the few to buck Aldrich's leadership was Wisconsin's fiery Robert La Follette. A passionate reformer, La Follette preferred to go down fighting for a deeply felt cause than to accept partial victory through compromise. He believed in the ultimate wisdom of the people, who if kept properly informed would rally to the cause of reform. In the Senate, La Follette built a bloc of Western Republican senators in opposition to Aldrich and the "standpatism" of the East. Among these Western progressives were such senators as Joseph Bristow of Kansas, Albert Cummins of Iowa, Albert Beveridge of Indiana, and William Borah of Idaho. La Follette also courted Senator Jonathan Dolliver to join the insurgents.

Earlier I mentioned Senator Dolliver's interest in becoming floor manager for the Hepburn bill, an ambition frustrated by Senator Aldrich. At this critical moment, Aldrich made another tactical error concerning Dolliver, and drove him into La Follette's ranks. Unitl then, Jonathan Dolliver had stood with the "regular" wing of Senate Republicans. Born in Preston County, West Virginia, Dolliver had gone west as a school teacher and later a frontier lawyer before entering politics. He was a marvelous public speaker, and was eulogized by Albert Beveridge—himself a notable orator—as "the greatest orator in the contemporaneous English-speaking world." Physically, Dolliver was a bear of a man, but he possessed a gentle nature and immense charm; he was described as "a deep, quiet lake, restful to the spirits of those fortunate to come in contact with him." He was also a "magician with his audience." So La Follette considered it worth his time to try to win him over. "Your place, Jonathan," La Follette told him, "is at the head of a movement here in the Senate and in the country for the public interest." Dolliver laughed the suggestion away. "Bob, your liver's out of order," he responded, "cheer up."[23]

As the first session of the Sixty-First Congress organized in 1909 at the beginning of President Taft's administration, Senator Aldrich was busy parceling out committee assignments. Dolliver dearly wanted a seat on the Finance Committee, and let Aldrich know that he would give up his position on the Interstate Commerce Committee in exchange. Although Dolliver did resign from the Interstate Commerce Committee, Aldrich passed over him for Finance and instead arranged for him to chair the Agriculture and Forestry Committee. This did not modify Dolliver, who felt he had been promised Finance. In a personal meeting, Aldrich bluntly told the Iowa senator that he could not work with him in drafting tariff legislation. This Dolliver saw as just another example of Eastern tyranny over the West.

Aldrich's action and explanation infuriated Jonathan Dolliver, who shortly afterwards ran into Senator La Follette in a Capitol corridor. "Jonathan, are you pretty nearly ready to have that conference with me?" La Follette asked. "Yes, I am coming over to see you," Dolliver responded. "Well, come right now," said La Follette.[24] The two men sequestered themselves in La Follette's Census Committee room in the Capitol basement. (The location of committee rooms in those days was a clear sign of their rank. La Follette generally found himself assigned to rooms in the basement and terraces. Senator Aldrich's Finance Committee, by contrast, was just off the Senate floor in the rooms I currently occupy as Democratic leader.)

According to La Follette, during their discussions that day Dolliver proclaimed his independence of Aldrich and the party regulars. He threw his support, his reputation, and his considerable oratorical skills to the insurgents. "This conversion of Dolliver from Saul to Paul was, to Aldrich, most untimely," wrote Mark Sullivan, the keen-eyed journalist, since Congress was at that time organizing in special session to write a new tariff, and Dolliver would prove a most formidable opponent. La Follette may have been the leader of the insurgents, but Dolliver would become their heart.[25]

President Taft believed in tariff reform and insisted upon quick congressional action. Working with Aldrich and Cannon he called Congress into special session on March 15, 1909 to deal with the matter. But Taft soon found himself in over his head. The Democrats traditionally stood for low tariffs, the Republicans for high tariffs. But progressive Republicans, responding to consumer complaints and farmer demands also joined the movement for downward revision of the tariff rates. The Republican platform of 1908 had called for tariff reform, implying but not specifying a reduction of rates. Taft wanted action, but he lacked a clear game-plan, an organized constituency, and an understanding of the technical issues involved. Taft's weaknesses were precisely Aldrich's strengths.

The House Ways and Means Committee, under chairman Sereno Payne, produced a tariff bill with moderate reduction of rates that pleased Taft and speedily passed the House. The Payne bill then went to Aldrich's Finance Committee. But Aldrich threw out the House version and introduced his own, which raised duties on over 600 items. "Without Allison and Spooner in the Senate or Roosevelt in the White House, no one could hold Aldrich in check," the Merrills have noted. Certainly Aldrich's highhanded and impolitic action demonstrated that he had misjudged the national mood.

On the Senate floor, opposition senators angrily complained of the Aldrich Tariff rates. Democratic leader Joseph Bailey of Texas pointed out that some rates were three times as high as the old tariff law, indicating that the Republican majority had not kept its promise to the American consumer to revise rates downward. Aldrich scoffed: "Mr. President, where did we ever make a statement that we would revise the tariff downward?" Soon Dolliver was on his feet to point out the obvious: that it had hardly been the president's purpose to call Congress into special session to leave tariff rates where they were, or to raise them. "The American people expect us" to reduce rates, Dolliver maintained. And so it went. The insurgents pressed Aldrich on every point. No one member of the Senate could equal Aldrich in his fine knowledge of the intricacies of tariff legislation, so his opponents divided up the bill between them. Dolliver would talk on cotton; La Follette on wool; Bristow on sugar; Cummins on metals; each mastering the technical details of his assigned subject. The debate lingered on through the hot Washington summer, in those days before air conditioning, keeping Aldrich and other protectionists on the defensive. The insurgents accused Aldrich of accepting schedules that had been written by the industries seeking protection, of needing to hire outside experts to explain his own bill to him.

Over and over it was Dolliver who scored the most points, who focused public attention on the high rates for special interests, who used his wit to demolish his opponents. Senator Aldrich protested that Dolliver was conducting an "assault on the very citadel of protection," for which their party had long stood. And as Mark Sullivan observed: "Often Aldrich's only response was not to respond, to walk from the Senate floor, red-faced, for the first time in his life successfully defied," [26] by this man who was born in Preston County, West Virginia.

Defied, yes; defeated, no. Nelson Aldrich was still a champion legislative tactician. Aldrich knew that the Democrats and Western Republican insurgents stood against his tariff, and the he needed to hold the rest of his party intact. But he was concerned that some Eastern Republicans in the Senate—supporters of the president—would desert the high protective tariff in support of an income tax. Reformers from both parties had long been clamoring for income and corporate taxes as a means of financing federal programs, thus reducing one of the key rationales for high tariffs (since the tariff was then the chief source of federal revenue). Aldrich therefore stole their thunder. During the debate he announced that he would submit to the Senate a constitutional amendment to permit Congress to levy an income tax; and that he would insert a corporate tax in the tariff bill. Not only did this move force reformers to vote at least for portions of his tariff bill, but it held the Eastern Republicans in Aldrich's camp. On July 8, 1909 the Senate debate on the Aldrich tariff finally ended, with a vote of 45 to 34 in its favor. The minority consisted of twenty-four Democrats and ten Republican insurgents. The Senate and House then met in conference to reconcile the high Aldrich rates with the more moderate Payne rates.[27]

It was clear to President Taft that the Aldrich bill had little public support behind it, and he hoped that the House conferees could successfully argue for lower duties. For some time, Taft considered vetoing the bill. This would increase his personal popularity, but would reflect badly on his party, which had crafted the bill. Nothing went well for Taft. Speaker Cannon appointed high-tariff men as conferees; and Senator Aldrich skillfully lobbied with them and with the president to convince them that they had crafted "a very scientific tariff bill." The conferees did make some modest downward revisions, allowing Taft to convince himself of the bill's merits. Not only did Taft refrain from vetoing the Payne-Aldrich Tariff, but he took to the stump in its defense. In those days presidents still wrote their own speeches, and Taft was notoriously tardy in preparing his. On the train to Winona, Wisconsin, during a speaking-swing through the Midwest, Taft hastily penned a line he would greatly regret. Not only did he defend the Republican members of Congress who supported the Payne-Aldrich Tariff, but he declared flatly: "I am bound to say that I think the Payne bill is the best bill that the Republican party has ever passed." Thus Taft's public attachment to the high tariff was complete, and done in Robert La Follette's home state no less! [28]

Public response to the Payne-Aldrich Tariff was overwhelmingly negative, undermining the Republican party's once solid majority among the voters. Taft proved himself an inept politician in any number of issues, from the abortive "revolt" against Speaker Cannon in the House to the handling of the infamous Ballinger-Pinchot affair, with its overtones of corruption in the Interior Department. In 1910 Theodore Roosevelt returned from his self-imposed exile in Africa and Europe and made himself the new symbol of the growing Republican insurgency. That year the Republicans suffered their greatest electoral setbacks in a generation. They lost the House of Representatives to the Democrats, and their majority in the Senate shrunk from 61-32 to 51-41. Also in 1910 they lost the leadership of Nelson Aldrich, who announced his decision not to stand for reelection.

Aldrich, as I have said, was the last of The Senate Four. Other senior colleagues were retiring, and as the New York Times reported, he felt "tired of being the packhorse, that is, of being held responsible for all legislation because he was so powerful." In 1910, Aldrich was sixty-nine years of age. He was also by then a considerably wealthy man, with a beautiful estate at Newport, Rhode Island, and he wanted a chance to enjoy the fruits of his labor. In recent years he had devoted an increasing amount of his time to the National Monetary Commission, which he chaired, and wanted to give it his full attention. Indeed, the "Aldrich Plan" which emerged from that Commission was an important building block in the Federal Reserve Act of 1913, about which I shall have more to say later. So Aldrich stepped down voluntarily, ending an era in the Senate's history dating back to the 1880s.[29]

Mr. President, I have spent much time discussing Nelson Aldrich because he was such a giant in the Senate's history, and because he represented so much of this institution's power and influence in that era. I have talked also about Robert La Follette, who began his Senate career in this era; and about Jonathan Dolliver, whose career was cut tragically short by his death in October 1910. I have introduced "Pitchfork Ben" Tillman, and Albert J. Beveridge, and other leading Democrats and Republicans. There are many more from that remarkable period whom we should not forget. For example there was the pugnatious Joseph Weldon Bailey of Texas who led the Democrats first in the House and then in the Senate, relying on his mental and oratorical powers to cover his lack of votes on the floor. There was the red-haired and fiery-tongued Senator Edward Carmack of Tennessee, who battled so intensely for Prohibition that he was shot down on the streets of Nashville by anti-Prohibitionists; a statue of Senator Carmack stands today on the state capitol grounds in Nashville.

There was the refined and fastidious William A. Clark of Montana, whose manner belied his rough frontier beginnings. Clark made a fortune in mining and railroad interests, and used it to purchase a Senate seat and to collect great works of art. Today, visitors to the Corcoran Gallery of Art here in Washington can view the Rembrants, Reubens, Gainsboroughs, and Van Dycks in Clark's collection, as well as a bust of the senator who donated them. There was Chauncey M. Depew of New York, the nation's favorite afterdinner speaker; and Henry

Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts, who held the first Ph.D in history ever awarded by an American university. There was the gargantuan Boies Penrose of Pennsylvania, said to have breakfasted regularly on a dozen eggs, twelve rolls, a quart of coffee and a half-inch slab of ham; and who could put away an entire stuffed turkey for lunch. Senator Penrose's appetite for power was equally immense, as he skillfully demonstrated in the Senate cloakrooms and committee rooms. There was William E. Borah of Idaho, the young prosecuting attorney just beginning his long career in the Senate. And the blind Senator Thomas P. Gore of Oklahoma, who, in later years, was often escorted in this chamber by his young grandson, Gore Vidal.[30]

It would be hard to conjure up a more diverse and colorful lot. These were the "standpatter" and insurgent Republicans and unreconstructed Democrats with whom Thoedore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft had to deal. They numbered among them men old enough to have fought in the Civil War, who still peppered their speeches with references to the Union and the Rebellion. They also represented the first generation of twentieth century legislators. But they were the last of an old breed in an important sense, for they were the last senators elected by the state legislatures. In 1913 the singlemost important reform of the Senate took place: the ratification of the constitutional amendment allowing the people to elect directly their United States senators. This reform was of such magnitude that I plan to devote my next address in this series entirely to it and to the ways in which it altered the course of Senate history.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, it is my understanding that, at the close of my remarks, under the order previously entered by the distinguished majority leader, the Chair will adjourn the Senate over until Monday under the order. I thank the distinguished Senator (Mr. SYMMS), from Idaho, for presiding over this body during this lengthy address. I know it is an inconvenience of no small moment for a Senator to have to sit in the chair and listen to another Senator drone on for hour after hour, sometimes. Not only do I thank the Senator who presides over the Senate at this point, I also thank the officers of the Senate and others who were somewhat, may I say, an audience that unavoidly has to remain as captives to the speaker.

Again, I thank the majority leader for his accommodations in connection with these 64 statements that I have made on the subject of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

PROGRAM

(The following statement was delivered earlier and is printed at this point by unanimous consent:)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on Monday the Senate will convene at 11 a.m. After the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, two Senators will be recognized under special orders for not to exceed 15 minutes. The time remaining after the expiration of the special orders until 12 noon will be devoted to the transaction of routine morning business in which Senators may speak for not more than 10 minutes each.

Mr. President, after that, it is anticipated that the Senate will turn to one of the six remaining so-called ancillary bills relating to the crime package: the Specter career criminal bill or the drug czar bill is the most likely candidate to be first considered on Monday. I will consult with the minority leader first on Monday morning before that determination is made. I do anticipate that there will be rollcall votes on Monday. Senators should be advised of that prospect.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1984 AT 11:00 A.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). Under the previous order, the Senate stands adjourned until 11 a.m. on Monday.

Thereupon, at 3:30 p.m., the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 6, 1984, at 11 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 3, 1984:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Edwin Meese III, of California, to be Attorney general.

IN THE ARMY

The following-named officer under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be reassigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

To be lieutenant general

Maj. Gen. Edward C. Peter II, XXX-X... XX..., U.S. Army.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 3, 1984:

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK BOARD

Mary A. Grigsby, of Texas, to be a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board for the remainder of the term expiring June 30, 1986.

The above nomination was approved subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.

IN THE AIR FORCE

Air Force nominations beginning Paul W. Bishop, and ending Jacquelyn D. Reid, which nominations were received by the Senate and appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on November 18, 1983.

SENATE—Monday, February 6, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday, January 30, 1984)

The Senate met at 11 a.m. and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

* * * except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain.—Psalm 127: 1.

Father in Heaven, we pray today for Larry Smith, the Sergeant at Arms and all who work with him. They have a duty to perform which is guaranteed to displease many. We pray that they may be given patience as complaints pour in and grace to respond in love and kindness to those who are angry, who grumble and growl. Help us all to accept the necessity of these restraints, to behave understandingly to those who bear the burden of enforcing them and be grateful for their faithfulness to our welfare.

We pray for the police, the doorkeepers, the plainclothes people and all who have direct contact with the public who have difficulty accepting new rules. Give them grace when people are hostile and help us never to forget that their lives are on the line whenever and wherever security is involved. Dear God, please do not allow these superficial changes to disrupt the deeper harmony and unity of the Senate. In Jesus' name. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

CHAPLAIN THANKED FOR SUPPLICATIONS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am not sure whether I am recognized as a grouser or a grousee, but I thank the Chaplain for his prayer this morning. I repeat, facetiously, what I have said on other occasions. There are some things I would rather tell the Lord myself rather than have them told in public but, in any event, we are all grateful for his supplications this morning.

(Mr. DENTON assumed the chair.)

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the list keeps growing. We first began with a commitment to take up the crime package, separate and aside from the death penalty, and I guess then there was added the exclusionary rule and habeas corpus, which were originally in the crime package. I made a commitment to the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator THURMOND, and no doubt others that if we took up the crime package the others would follow on immediately, and they will. But, as I say, the list keeps growing of other things that people want to take up. And in addition to that now we have had the drug czar bill, armed career criminal bill, and one or two others until the list got to be eight items that were then considered as ancillary crime bills.

Well, I am sure every one of those are meritorious, but today, on Monday, the second week of our deliberations on the crime packages, I wish to state that I intend to honor the commitments that I made earlier and we will devote today, if the Senate will agree, to doing other and collateral issues but later today before we go out I want to try to reach one of those original three bills, death penalty, habeas corpus, the exclusionary rule, and maybe the Federal tort claims should be included on that list.

But the point is, Mr. President, that if we do not get on with the hard ones, pretty soon we are not going to finish them this week. So we will do whatever we can do of the other bills today during the day, but before the day is out, perhaps just before we go out, it will be the intention of the leadership on this side to get to one of those major items, either the death penalty or habeas corpus, exclusionary rule or Federal torts claims. I do not say this in any way to diminish the importance of other things but to repeat, I made a commitment that I would try to reach those things immediately after we did the crime package. So far I am not doing that, so I am willing to devote today to the other items but before the day is out I would like to at least try to lay down one of the other important issues.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. I should like to say that we are ready to go on the habeas corpus and exclusionary rule today, and we hope that that schedule could be kept, and follow that with the death penalty.

Mr. BAKER. All right. Mr. President, could I inquire of the distinguished chairman of the committee, our President pro tempore, and a good friend, and a universally admired statesman in this body and throughout the Nation, does the Senator from South Carolina feel that we can finish all four of those items this week?

Mr. THURMOND. I think there is a chance. I am not sure we could finish the death penalty this week, but I think there is a chance. We may have to have a rollcall on the death penalty. We may have to apply cloture on that. We have the Tort Claims Act which is very important, too. That is extremely important. I think we can finish if we can take those three first and then death penalty, and let Senators know that we are going to stay on them and, if necessary, run some at night until we finish. I really think we can complete them if we do.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the concern I feel rising in my person is that we are going to put off death penalty until the last and then we will be backed up against the Lincoln Day recess. Then when we come back, we are going to be backed up against something else. I wonder if the Senator feels it would be better to get the death penalty first.

Mr. THURMOND. I think we can knock out habeas corpus and the exclusionary rule today and tomorrow and get the death penalty by Wednesday, and then do the Federal tort claims. So if anything has to go over the recess, that could go over.

Mr. BAKER. Very well. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. As the Senator knows, I almost invariably follow his advice, certainly in matters within his jurisdiction as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and so during the day today I would hope that we can get to——

Mr. THURMOND. As quick as we can get to habeas corpus, Mr. President, this morning, the better. I wish to thank the Senator.

Mr. BAKER. During the day I hope we can get to habeas corpus and we will feel our way along. Let me say, Mr. President, I hope we can finish this whole package this week.

What I am about to say next will be an unwelcome statement, but it is absolutely essential in my opinion. Senators should please take note of the possibility of late evenings every day this week. Senators should assume we will be in on Friday of this week. And all of that in an effort to try to finish this group of bills, because when we come back we are going to have a great deal more to do.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. If the majority leader wishes to run Saturday, it will be fine. I really feel it is very important to finish them. I express my deep appreciation to the majority leader for the excellent leadership and outstanding cooperation he has shown. I also thank the able minority leader, too, for his fine cooperation.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator. Mr. President, may I say we will not be in on Saturday. I regret to say that, but we have a published recess schedule that begins at the close of business on Friday, and I would like to honor that schedule. So rather than come in on Saturday, I urge Senators to be understanding and cooperative when I say the leadership may ask them to remain late any day, perhaps every day, this week in order to finish this job.

One other announcement I might make of a tentative nature. I privately represented to the minority leader that when we come back it would be my hope that we could get to the prayer amendment. I think that that probably will be a little later instead of just after we come back, because I am going to have a few other things backing up against it. So I will talk to the minority leader more about that later, but my guess is the prayer amendment will come maybe the week after we come back instead of immediately after we come back, maybe 2 weeks after we come back. But I will confer more with the minority leader on that point as we go along.

Mr. President, I thank Senators for hearing me make these unwelcome remarks.

Today, we are meeting pursuant to an adjournment, with the usual unanimous consent order.

After the time for the two leaders has expired, two Senators will be recognized on special orders, and then there will be time for the transaction of routine morning business, to extend until noon, at which time we will take up one of the measures that remain to be done in this package.

Mr. President, I apologize to the minority leader for taking so much time. I am sure my time must have expired.

I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the majority leader owes no apology to anyone. He is doing his duty when he attempts to lay out the schedule. I know it is a pretty heavy burden to try to develop a schedule and get the bills up which the majority leader feels necessary

I thank the distinguished President pro tempore, Mr. THURMOND, for his kind remarks. He is held in very high esteem by me, and I try to cooperate whenever I can.

Mr. President, I yield my time to Mr. EXON, if he should need it.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR EXON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. EXON) is recognized for 15 minutes under his special order, plus 9 minutes.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. EXON. I thank the Chair, and I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, with the death of each marine on the foreign soil of Lebanon, the cry goes forth again to bring them all home. There then follows a period of frantic explanation, driven by pride, of what a glorious mission we are about there and the return fervor subsides somewhat until the next death.

Indeed, the marines now find themselves under orders to do nothing from their exposed and highly vulnerable positions.

They stay alive by keeping their heads below ground level and keep digging deeper into their man-made, steel-reinforced caves. This all bears out the wisdom of the nearly unanimous military command recommendation against the Beirut Airport location for deployment if it was the determination we should land troops on these troubled shores.

Our heroic peacekeepers are prevented by orders from keeping any peace. Their mission has dramatically shifted to one of hunkering down and not taking casualties so as not to increase pressure at home to get them out.

That brings us back to the decision as to what the Congress should do now since the Congress gave the President what he wanted through a bipartisan vote last fall to authorize their deployment for up to 18 months.

Through all of this we have all but forsaken the stated objectives of the deployment in the first instance as neutral peacekeepers.

Whatever cloak of respectability we try and dress up our Beirut adventure in, it still emerges as a tragic Turkey. We had best decide what went wrong with our goals and how to extricate ourselves. To put this in admittedly simplified, but bottom line perspective, we should first concede, given the then clear current and historically known circumstances, that a superpower had no business jumping into the middle of a religious-civil war, even as supposed neutral peacekeepers. Had Great Britain, for example, dug in troops in either Washington or Richmond in the 1860's, who would have perceived them as neutrals?

A reluctance to be drawn deeper into the quagmire of Lebanon's internal problems does not imply an abandonment or reversal of our long-time interest and concern for peace and stability in the Middle East. We should remain as committed as ever to encouraging peaceful solutions to the region's problems, but not as world policemen. We should continue our efforts in seeking a solution to the Palestinian issue. We should continue to support our ally Israel, but certainly not to the extent they are now apparently suggesting that we escalate our open military involvement. Such is a development I feared when we first landed our tripwire ground forces. We should continue to look for negotiated solutions to Lebanon's problems. What I am raising issue with is our method of achieving those goals. In our sincerity to attain peace and stability we have become too carried away by momentum. We have not sufficiently considered the consequences of our actions before taking the next step. In its determination to bring about a lasting solution to the problems of Lebanon the administration has overlooked the many facets of the conflict which are unique to the region. As a result we are finding ourselves helplessly manipulated by events, like the rider on a runaway horse who is unable to stop the horse or get off without injury or embarrassement. We, as well as our marines, are hostage to the events in Lebanon over which we have no control.

I have been opposed to the presence of marines in Lebanon from the beginning. Deploying ground forces is a serious sign of commitment because once they are deployed it is inevitably difficult to withdraw them in a situation short of complete success. History has repeatedly shown that success is possible in such a situation only if we are prepared for an all-out commitment of all the necessary conventional forces to support the tripwire nature of only token forces.

We are again being called upon to supposedly fight Communist interests on the other side of the globe. But there is not any Soviet blood being spilled there as was the case in both Korea and Vietnam. They only fight in or near their homeland or to keep their surrogates in line. If the current situation seems ill-conceived and fraught with danger, it is indeed. We have outfoxed ourselves with our current policy.

I believe, however, that a new consensus, central Lebanese Government deserves our encouragement. Such a government would hold a promise of stability and would be an essential building block for a lasting solution to Lebanon's problems. But our commitment to such a government should not continue to include the stationing of marines in Lebanon. We could provide some level of military assistance which will help a new consensus Lebanese Government in its attempts to unify the country. And we must apply more pressure on the current Gemayel government so that it will be more flexible in its negotiations with the Druze and other political factions in the country. Sunday's cabinet resignations might make such more possible. On the other hand, it could be the beginning of the end of the Gemayel government.

Are we to once again condone the handcuffing of American fighting men in a situation where the other side is at war against us but we are only allowed to act as if we are at peace? Remaining in place, hunkered down, is no way to protect a ground force except in a peaceful environment. Does that describe Beirut today? I fear we all know the answer. The best way to protect a military force is to wipe out the threats to it—something we cannot do in this case. Once again we have placed American fighting men in a hopeless, no-win military situation while the politicians bicker and posture themselves.

What we must face directly is that we do not want further chaos to result when we withdraw the marines. One untried way to avoid this is to replace the marines with a United Nations or other neutral peacekeeping force. The multinational force as it is presently comprised is not neutral and cannot help achieve stability and control in Lebanon. Therefore, such forces should have no prior affiliation with any side of the Lebanese conflict and should not be deeply involved with any of the ongoing crises in the Middle East.

We are not aggressively pursuing this course. I am most concerned that such inaction tends to only worsen our situation. Why are we so reluctant to pursue such a course of action? This weekend the situation in Lebanon deteriorated further with the collapse of the Gemayel government's cabinet and a threat his army may be ready to fall apart. Only last week the Secretary of Defense told the Armed Services Committee that the army was making great strides in training under our supervision and by April should be a potent force to maintain order. I suggest this is another dream that will not be realized. The deterioration of Gemayel's army would pose a serious further threat to our marines.

There is every indication that Israel, under the pressure of public opinion, may be about ready this spring or summer to withdraw to its northern borders. After we encouraged their withdrawal from Beirut so we could send our troops in, would it not be the height of irony if their boys went home next door while our marines were still pinned down in their Beirut Airport caves halfway around the globe?

We decry terrorism as if we did not know it was part and parcel of the Middle East warfare. It is not new, it is part and parcel of the Mideast world. We might be able to curtail it if we level every city and village in that part of the world, but it would not be eliminated.

Some have trumped up the theory that getting the marines out of Beirut onto ships of the 6th Fleet offshore would endanger the flow of oil in the Pesian Gulf. If 1,800 marines pinned down in a no-win situation at the Beirut Airport is that critical, it only proves the tragedy of putting them there in the first place. Such policy speculation should serve to stimulate a review of what the free world intends to do if the gulf is closed. The United States does not depend on the gulf for oil supplies nearly to the extent others do. I hope we are not expected to be the major world policeman there also.

For all of these reasons and others, I have cosponsored the resolution which was introduced last week calling for intensified diplomatic efforts aimed at Lebanese reconciliation, replacement of current multinational force with a United Nations or other neutral peacekeeping force, and the prompt, orderly withdrawal of U.S. troops. This is what our policy should have been and should be now. We cannot stay on the same course. This resolution and statement of overall U.S. policy represents a legitimate and proper role for the Congresss in foreign policy and does not necessarily tie the President's hands—unless those hands are linked with an indefinite and undefined policy of unacceptable delay in correcting our mistake. To err is human. To seek solutions instead tells the President we will join hands in a revised overall policy which all Americans can support and which has a better chance of achieving the objectives we all share. I have no objections to proper amendments so long as its central point is not altered—which is to begin to plan now for withdrawal and insist that the administration so proceed and advise the Congress.

Mr. President, it is my hope that all Members will consider our initiatives.

Mr. President, I yield any remainder of my time back to the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator.

I listened with great interest to his statement. It is a statement which I am sure the Senator must have written himself because he says what he thinks, thinks what he says, believes what he says, and speaks with conviction.

VITIATION OF SPECIAL ORDER FOR SENATOR BYRD

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the special order which was mine be vitiated because no Senator seeks to use any of the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon with statements therein limited to 10 minutes each.

The Senator from Wisconsin.

COMPREHENSIVE TEST BAN TREATY ESSENTIAL TO STOP NUCLEAR ARMS RACE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, what is at the heart of the difference between those who call for an end to the nuclear arms race and those who contend that peace and salvation lie in our continuing to improve or modernize our nuclear capability? The real difference lies in whether or not we should propose to the Soviet Union an end to the testing of new nuclear weapons.

In a recent article in Long Island's Newsday, David Morrison, a research analyst at the Center for Defense Information, reported the following:

> In 1979 as negotiations on a comprehensive test ban neared completion, the director of the Lawrence Livermore lab and his counterpart at the Los Alamos National Laboratory met with President Carter and urged him not to introduce the treaty—as, indeed, he did not. Reportedly their arguments were based on the need to develop the coming generation of nuclear weapons.

This reminds us that President Reagan carries on this arms race in a bipartisan spirit. He talks of arms control, of returning to the bargaining table with the Soviet Union, of restraining and developments of warheads and launches. The administration has also recently started to discuss trade-offs. We would agree to hold up on our manufacture and deployment of bomber and submarine based nuclear weapons if the Russians will hold off on land based nuclear weapons.

This represents some progress but none of this talk seems likely to lead to any action. In fact, as we know, the superpower negotiations have been suspended and may not resume for months, possibly not until after the election. If they do resume there is not much prospect that the Reagan administration will change their posture and agree to any nuclear arms limitations. But even if they do have a change of heart on limiting nuclear arms, there seems to be virtually no remote possibility that they will consider taking the one step which could have a truly significant effect in halting the arms race: A comprehensive test ban treaty.

The administration's attitude on the test ban treaty was most vividly put by Gen. William Hoover, the Energy Department's Deputy Assistant Secretary for Military Applications who called it, according to reporter Morrison, a unilateral technological lobotomy. Of course, this is nonsense. There is nothing unilateral about the treaty. It calls on mutual—I repeat mutual—cessation of nuclear weapons testing. This ban would, of course, only apply to that testing that we could assuredly monitor. The Soviets would have to cease testing, just as we would. If they did cease, so would we. If they did not, we would not. Sure the treaty would result in closing up Livermore and Los Alamos—as well as their Soviet equivalents, and it would cost the jobs of the 40,000 Americans now employed in testing, producing and deploying nuclear weapons.

But, oh, how worthwhile it would be. It would begin the ending of the world's worst nightmare. Indeed, we would still have to live with nuclear weapons and with the widespread knowledge of how to produce nuclear weapons. And, yes, we would have to live with the continued efforts of scientific genius to develop more and more advanced and lethal nuclear weapons. But without testing, in the words of General Hoover, we would have performed a lobotomy on the technogical arms race. But it would not be a unilateral lobotomy. We can certainly monitor test explosions far, far below the present 150 kiloton level which has been in effect since 1974. We can continue to reach out for ways to slow down the present race to universal nuclear annihilation.

For any who think I may exaggerate the dangers of the technological nuclear arms race, consider the words of George Dacey, president of the Sandia National Laboratories in Albuquerque, when he was asked his view on a nuclear freeze. Dacey's reply:

If you mean by "freeze" that you intend to stop thinking to stop considering what the weapon possibilities are, what modern warfare can, in fact, become then I think you are taking a dangerous risk with this country's security. From a technical standpoint I think there are enormous possibilities for improvement ahead. We do need to make it clear that such progress is in the public interest and that we should charge on at full speed.

And that, Mr. President, is precisely what we are doing: Charging on at full, multibillion dollar a year speed. The President's budget calls for a fat increase in outlays for atomic energy defense activities from about $6 billion in 1984 to $7.1 billion in 1985. In outlays, the increase would go from a 1984 level of $6.7 billion to a 1985 level of $7.8 billion. All of this of course would go for the research and development and production of the nuclear devices themselves. In addition, the Army, Navy, and Air Force would spend tens of billions of dollars to provide the delivery systems—by bomber or submarine or land-based missile. But it is the research and development of newer, more lethal weapons—more certain to pierce any curtain of protection that constitute the driving force behind the arms race and the certainty that it leads to an international graveyard for mankind.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article which I have referred to by David Morrison in the January 24, 1984, issue of Long Island Newsday be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE POWER BEHIND THE ENERGY DEPARTMENT

(By David C. Morrison)

As is well known, procuring nuclear delivery systems—bombers, missiles and artillery pieces—is the job of the Department of Defense. Not so notorious is the fact that manufacturing the nuclear explosives they carry is the domain of the Department of Energy.

The DOE's weapons production complex is a far-flung nuclear archipelago, occupying a land area the size of Delaware and employing almost 40,000 people. While the agency also oversees civilian energy programs, nuclear weapons consume a growing slice of its budget pie. Out of a 1984 budget of $10.1 billion, $6.5 billion, or 64 per cent, is for military nuclear programs, an almost threefold increase over the last five years.

This sharp increase was explained to a Congressional subcommittee last March by the DOE's deputy assistant secretary for military applications, Maj. Gen. William Hoover. "Ultimately," Hoover said, pointing to a graph detailing U.S. warhead production in the coming years, "our funding requirement is driven by the number of weapons that have been approved by the President. We call this our mountain chart, for obvious reasons, and we are on it and climbing."

But the department is looking far beyond that multi-megaton mountain in anticipation of the revolutionary new "third-generation" nuclear weapons on the horizon. The nuclear first generation were fission or atomic weapons and the second generation fusion or hydrogen weapons. In third-generation weapons, a part of the total energy produced by the explosion will be "tailored" to achieve a specific destructive effect.

According to Richard Wagner, assistant for atomic energy to the secretary of defense, third-generation nukes can "be used in much more discriminating ways than existing nuclear weapons . . . Such an ability to be very selective in the damage done or not done, with the tremendous energy available in nuclear weapons, could be the most significant change in nuclear weapons technology since the early days of the nuclear era."

Enhanced radiation weapons, popularly called "neutron bombs," are crude precursors of the third generation, since they maximize the deadly fast neutrons created by a thermonuclear explosion while minimizing the more broadly destructive blast effect.

The "tailored output" third-generation weapons now under study include: bombs using the electromagnetic pulse, or EMP, created by nuclear detonations to knock out enemy electronics and communications, hydrogen-bomb-boosted X-ray lasers to destroy incoming enemy missiles and warheads, and "directed plasma" weapons that would narrowly focus the effects of a usually spherical nuclear explosion.

Of all the third-generation weapons under consideration, direct plasma will likely be the toughest to realize, given the problems of harnessing and focusing the devastating energy of even a "small" nuclear explosion.

The EMP bomb is another matter. Through a complex interaction with the earth's magnetic field, high-altitude nuclear explosions create an intense burst of electromagnetic energy that can saturate an area thousands of miles in radius. While EMP is harmless to humans, a nuclear warhead detonated hundreds of miles above Nebraska could knock out unprotected computers, telecommunicators and other electronics all across the country.

"What the weapons designers have been able to do," says Donald C. Latham, deputy assistant secretary of defense for command, control and communications, "is to design weapons which could generate very high levels, very efficiently, of EMP." The tricky part will be to concentrate the pulse so as to disable Soviet satellites and ground communications without burning out nearby friendly systems.

The third-generation program that has garnered the most publicity is the H-bomb-boosted X-ray laser. Code-named "Excalibur," it is one of the plethora of future, space-based, laser missile-defense weapons that feed into President Reagan's "Star Wars" proposal.

Excalibur has been most actively promoted by physicist Edward Teller. For more than 15 years, Teller, chief architect of the hydrogen bomb, has campaigned for "defensive" nuclear weapons, arguing that "The sword has been invented; now we must work on the shield."

Teller's shield is being crafted by his proteges at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory near San Francisco, one of America's three primary, government-financed nuclear weapons research labs, which he once headed. Last fall, a panel appointed to study beam weapons after Reagan's Star Wars speech of March 23 recommended a full-power Excalibur demonstration by 1988.

The X-ray laser is pumped by a neutron bomb, which vaporize the ends of solid-state lasing rods arrayed around the explosive. In the instant before the whole device is destroyed by the bomb, the rods emit pulses of concentrated X-rays which can—theoretically—zap targets thousands of miles away. Two scaled-down Excalibur experiments have already been conducted since 1980 in underground vacuum chambers at the Nevada nuclear proving ground.

The usual cast of experts, both inside and outside of the official nuclear weapons community, is typically divided over whether most of these third-generation programs will even pan out.

The Senate Armed Services Committee waxed enthusiastic in a recent report, stating that it "is especially intrigued with emerging new concepts involving the so-called 'third generation' of weapons [and directs] that the Department [of Defense] develop a deliberate, multiyear program to exploit these concepts." Not everyone in Congress is quite so upbeat. A House-Senate conference committee approved $22 million in 1984 for third-generation work, only half the $50 million earmarked in the Senate authorization bill.

Regardless of whether the third generation ever comes fully of age, simply researching it fulfills two important objectives for the Department of Energy: one psychological, the other political.

The former goal has been articulated by the Pentagon's Wagner. "The final reason for accelerating advanced technology in the DOE program," he told a Congressional subcommittee last spring, "relates to what I call keeping the Soviets in a deterred frame of mind. What it comes down to in the end is for us to keep their image of themselves inferior to their image of us, so that if a crisis comes along, they will have a gut feeling that they won't be able to measure up against us."

Of more direct utility for DOE and the weapons laboratories has been the role played by the promise of a revolutionary new generation of weapons in forestalling a comprehensive test ban, which by prohibiting all nuclear explosions would cripple further weapons research. In 1979, as negotiations on a comprehensive test ban neared completion, the director of the Lawrence Livermore lab and his counterpart at the Los Alamos National Laboratory met with President Carter and urged him not to introduce the treaty—as indeed he did not. Reportedly, their arguments were based on the need to develop the coming generation of nuclear weapons.

DOE takes the threat of a test ban—or, as Hoover has it, a "unilateral technological lobotomy"—no less seriously than it does the threat of an unfavorable Soviet "image ratio." DOE's proposed solution to the test-ban threat is inertial confinement fusion. Because it in effect detonates miniature hydrogen bombs in the laboratory, which cannot be detected by the usual verification methods, it has to be permitted.

The inertial confinement fusion concept is relatively simple. A tiny pellet filled with deuterium-tritium gas is uniformly bombarded with powerful lasers. Under ideal conditions, a thermonuclear explosion with a yield of about 100 tons results.

Physicists pursuing parallel experiments at labs around the country are confident of achieving thermonuclear ignition within five to 10 years.

Although the fusion concept has long-term potential for civilian energy production, the program is now devoted solely to realizing its near-term military potential.

The word "progress" has as many definitions as there are societal forces that would impede or accelerate the relentless momentum of 20th-Century technology. The nuclear weapons community's concept of progress was tellingly encapsulated in the April, 1982, Congressional testimony by George Dacey, president of Sandia National Laboratories in Albuquerque, N.M.

Asked his views on the nuclear freeze, Dacey replied: "If you mean by 'freeze' that you intend to stop thinking, to stop considering what the weapon possibilities are, what modern warfare can, in fact, become, then I think you are taking a dangerous risk with this country's security. From a technical standpoint I think there are enormous possibilities for improvement ahead. We do need to make it clear that such progress is in the public interest and that we should charge on at full speed."

NINETEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-FOUR, THE YEAR OF GEORGE ORWELL: THE YEAR TO RATIFY THE GENOCIDE TREATY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in 1948 George Orwell casually reversed the numbers of the year in which he wrote his most famous book. In doing so, he defined our decade and stirred contemporary historians to paroxysms of conjecture and self-examination. His literary vision of the ultimate totalitarian state, a rigid hierarchy preserved through torture and lies, has become an international benchmark of sorts, a convenient epithet to hurl at rival nations whose internal civil liberties all too often fail to meet global standards.

The impact of Orwell's thought is thus obscured, for too often the criticisms borne of this frightening book are bandied about indiscriminantly by zealots of all political stripes, for purposes devoid of a real concern for human rights. Indeed, even the Soviet Union has recently embraced "1984," distorting its message and clumsily disguising it as a critique of the West.

Orwell's trenchant world view needs to be restored, his noble intentions redefined and clarified. For Orwell was first and foremost a humanitarian, a defender of the dignity and rights of all mankind. His concern was not with ideology and public policy but with the effects of war and peace, state and society, on the daily lives of a country's inhabitants.

Orwell decried the will of the international community to disbelieve and ignore injustices and cruelty, man's inhumanity to man. He wrote:

> A thing that has struck one in recent years is that the most enormous crimes and disasters—purges, deportations, massacres, famines, imprisonment without trial, aggressive wars and broken treaties—not only fail to excite the big public, but can actually escape notice altogether, so long as they do not happen to fit in with the political mood of the moment.

The real tragedy is that the crimes described in 1984 and in the above quote do occur daily, worldwide, regardless of this country's political mood. The 20th century has witnessed unprecedented savagery among men, ignoring the repeated optimistic pronouncements of international social progress.

In recognition of this, the U.N. General Assembly in 1946 drafted the Genocide Convention, declaring the murder of a racial, ethnic, or religious group a crime punishable under international law. Yet despite our demonstrated commitment to human rights, the United States has not ratified this important document.

I urge my colleagues to heed the message of George Orwell: Let us discard the paralyzing vagaries of political moods and our shameful unwillingness to face the tragic realities of countless international human rights violations. Let us join together and give our advice and consent to ratification of the Genocide Convention.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do not know of anything else to do at this time. I am told that it may be close to 1 o'clock before we are prepared to go to the next item of business, which perhaps will be the habeas corpus bill.

Rather than keep us in morning business, since there appear to be no takers for morning business at the moment, I will inquire of the minority leader if he has any requirement for time. If he does not, I will ask the Senate to stand in recess. But while I check that out, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 1 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I understand from the distinguished acting minority leader that there is no objection to placing the Senate in recess, and I propose that it be until 1 o'clock, if there is no objection. I note from the nod of the head that there is not.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now stand in recess until 1 p.m. today.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 12:14 p.m., recessed until 1 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. HUMPHREY).

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 1:30 p.m. during which Senators may speak therein for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

FREEZE, UNCLE SAM!—HOW TO REDUCE THE I O U'S

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I hope Senators will take the time to read the text of an address by a distinguished North Carolinian, John G. Medlin, Jr., president of Wachovia Bank & Trust Co. At the conclusion of my remarks, I will ask unanimous consent that the text of this splendid address be printed in the RECORD.

Also, I shall include in the RECORD a column by Rolfe Neill, publisher of the Charlotte (N.C.) Observer, and one by Nick Poulos of the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution. Both Mr. Neill and Mr. Poulos assess the recommendations made by Mr. Medlin.

I shall not relate Mr. Medlin's point except to say that he not only advocates a freeze in Federal spending—he warns of the consequences if it is not done.

I reiterate my hope that Senators and others will carefully assess Mr. Medlin's advice. He is giving us fair warning.

So, with that, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Medlin's address, and the columns by Mr. Neill and Mr. Poulos be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN ECONOMIC PERSPECTIVE

(By John G. Medlin, Jr.)

Today, I will present an economic perspective rather than provide an economic forecast as was suggested to me. This is not an attempt to be evasive, but simply an indication that I don't have much confidence anymore in economic forecasts, including mine. The economies of the nation and world are more vulnerable than usual to financial shocks and to abrupt psychological shifts or political developments which could cause the outlook to change quickly for better or worse.

Despite this special contingency and the usual difficulty in forecasting the unpredictable behavior of people and politicians, one can probably feel the greatest sense of confidence in some time about the economic prospects for 1984. It seems reasonable to expect the recovery and expansion cycle currently under way to continue through this year, and possibly longer. This is conditioned, of course, on there being no bad surprises on the domestic or international scene.

The economy should grow at a healthy rate in 1984, although the pace is likely to slow and vary somewhat. The expansion should become more broad based with housing, automobiles, and retail sales remaining good. Industrial production should continue to increase, and capital spending should accelerate. The unemployment rate should edge downward, and real personal income should rise. Price inflation should stay relatively subdued, but will probably creep upward during the year.

Interest rates are likely to fluctuate on an uneven course as market psychology vacillates between optimism and pessimism. Money costs could soften at times in the first half but are likely to remain relatively high due to anxieties about the federal deficit, inflationary expectations, and the international situation. Growing competition between Treasury and private credit demands may give rates an upward bias after the middle part of the year. A reduction or reversal of the large foreign capital inflows could also put pressures on domestic money markets at any time.

While it is possible that elevated interest rates or other adverse factors could soon derail the expansion, the odds seem to favor the optimists over the near term. On balance, the economy for 1984 is more likely to be fairly typical of the second year in previous post-World War II recoveries. It would be nice if I could stop at this point and let you get back to the office early. However, celebration and relaxation are premature. The major problems of the economy in recent years have not been solved, but only temporarily moderated and obscured.

It should be noted that the recovery has been caused more by transitory short-term influences than by enduring long-term fundamentals. Most of the improvement during the past year can be attributed to highly stimulative budget deficits of $111 billion for 1982 and $196 billion in 1983 and to strong money supply growth on the order of 13 percent from June of 1982 until last summer. Monetary policy downshifted to a basically accommodative stance once the recovery was established, but fiscal policy remains excessive and potentially inflationary.

Americans have become too enamoured with quick fixes. There is too much obsession with short-term statistics and not enough concern for long-term trends. Some may have forgotten that excessive fiscal and monetary stimulation provided the breeding ground for earlier post-war recessions as well as recoveries. The favorable forecast for 1984 should not be viewed in isolation or allowed to cause complacency. Rather than talk just about the outlook for this year, it might be more important to review economic prospects in longer perspective.

Private enterprise and individual initiative were largely responsible for America's phenomenal first 150 years of economic and social progress and developed the muscle to protect personal freedom and national security. However, the people understandably got tired of the financial panics, depressions, and human adversities which accompanied laissez-faire economics and unbridled capitalism. With good intentions and considerable justification, many attempts have been made over time to remedy the real and imagined weaknesses of the free market system.

During the past 50 years, there has been an increasing inclination for government to intervene, often with desirable and beneficial short-term results, in an effort to solve the problems of the nation and to minimize the risks of personal and business life. Like narcotic drugs, such remedies can be quite effective in temporarily relieving and preventing pain. Similarly, they can also be addictive and deadly when used habitually or in overdose. There is growing evidence that too much public assistance and protection can eventually be as harmful as too little.

Enormous budget and trade deficits are among the manifestations of the increasing experimentation with social economics since the beginning of the Great Depression. Much of the time for the past 50 years, our nation has consumed more than it has produced and spent more than it has earned. The difference has been made up by excessive imports, borrowing, and money creation. Since 1933, the national debt has risen from $20 billion to $1.4 trillion. The amount owed by the U.S. Treasury has doubled in the past 6 years alone.

Government intervention and stimulation eventually brought supercharged growth and prosperity which proved to be somewhat illusory and temporary. Population and consumption grew at a faster pace than natural and financial resources could sustain without unpleasant side effects. In the late 1960's, the laws of nature and economics began to more noticeably punish the excessive behavior of politicians and people. The punishment eventually included runaway inflation, spiraling interest rates, painful unemployment, and a lower standard of living for many.

In the early 1980's, the nation and world suffered the worst economic experience since the 1930's. Joblessness and failures of businesses and financial institutions reached post-depression records. Imported goods displaced many domestic products and workers as basic industries such as steel and autos had difficulty competing overseas or surviving at home. Market forces overwhelmed government controls and caused turmoil in agriculture, finance, communications, and transportation. Some countries became unable to service external debt.

The damage wrought by the governmental excesses of the past half century is substantial and cannot be repaired overnight. The cumulative effects of three progressively severe business and money cycles since the late sixties have left the domestic and international economic and financial systems in a fragile and vulnerable state. The underpinnings have been weakened, and the ability to withstand stress has been diminished. The years immediately ahead are extremely crucial in determining whether strength and stability can be restored on a sustainable basis.

One cannot help wondering whether the nation is approaching the end of another historic boom-and-bust cycle. Those of the past have been climaxed by worse economic, social, and financial conditions than experienced in recent years. It remains to be seen whether a depression can be prevented by the government assistance and protection put in place during the 1930's and subsequent years. This will depend more than anything else on the willingness and ability of our political leaders to deal with the country's fiscal problems.

Despite what some say, the greatest risk is in projected federal deficits of around $200 billion as far as the eye can see. A slightly lower deficit of $180 to $190 billion is expected for 1984 as the recovery produces higher tax revenues and as lower unemployment moderates growth in public assistance expenditures. However, the structural or built-in deficit is currently well in excess of $100 billion, even assuming a full employment economy. This poses the real threat, somewhere along the way, of another inflation surge, interest rate spiral, and economic tailspin.

The interest bill alone on the national debt is now over $100 billion per year. Even if federal expenditures, excluding interest, were brought into balance with revenues, the national debt would still double to $2.8 trillion in 7 years with borrowing costs being added on and compounded at a rate of 10 percent. There will have to be substantial reductions in spending and/or increases in taxes to keep from having continuing and rising structural deficits of a magnitude that is dangerous indeed to our economic health.

Some would have you believe that the increase in the deficit over recent years has been caused by the Reagan Administration's tax cuts. In truth, taxes have not really been reduced as much as you might think but only stabilized and shifted around as to the point of collection. Twenty years ago, federal taxes represented about 19 percent to 20 percent of the Gross National Product, approximately the same proportion as last year. The tax relief served only the worthy purpose of keeping the percentage from being much higher due to bracket creep.

The real problem is on the spending side. Twenty years ago, federal expenditures were around 20 percent of the Gross National Product, just slightly higher than taxes. In 1983, federal spending was around 26 percent of GNP. The substantial increase over time is largely in social programs and not in national defense, which represents a smaller percentage than in the early sixties. The growth of social spending is not so much for basic needs of the truly disadvantaged as for excessive subsidization of people quite able to care for themselves.

Financing of the federal deficit, representing 6 percent of GNP, by private savings, totaling only 7 percent of GNP, was made easier in 1983 soft commercial loan demand. Help was provided by heavy foreign capital inflows resulting from low inflation, high real interest rates, and a strong dollar. Savers and foreigners may be able to fund the deficit for a while longer without much strain. However, financial market pressures will grow as stronger business borrowing increases competition for private savings and as foreign money inflow is moderated or reversed by rising inflation, an enlarged trade deficit, and an inevitably softer dollar.

Because of deposit deregulation and international debt problems, the finanical systems at home and abroad are more exposed than before to a rise in money costs. Foreigners can cause serious disruption anytime they choose to dump the dollar. As market pressures develop and intensify, the Federal Reserve may be compelled to relax monetary policy to calm the waters. Eventually, the money growth necessary at the same time to finance federal deficits, accommodate economic expansion, and restrain interest rates will fuel inflation and cause rates to escalate anyway.

This is the catch-22 dilemma facing our nation, and a solution may not wait for the fall elections. The potential for crisis will grow with further procrastination. Raising taxes will not solve the problem, and efforts at spending cuts of the size needed are doomed to failure. A more politically realistic approach would be an across-the-board freeze, including defense, of 1985 budgeted spending at 1984 levels. This simple action would lower next year's deficit by over $70 billion, avoid cuts for anyone, weaken accusations of inequity, and blunt attacks by interest groups.

The courageous enactment of a spending freeze would help alleviate the skepticism about fiscal restraint, reduce interest rates, and sustain economic progress. The favorable effects on the economy and financial markets would make a greater contribution to national security than the proposed 1985 increase in defense spending. All agencies and departments of government would have to reduce waste, inefficiency, and unnecessary personnel in order to maintain essential services and give any pay increases. I suspect most Americans would enthusiastically support a spending freeze, but it probably would not be greeted warmly in the Washington bureaucracy.

Unfortunately, the experience of the past raises serious doubts as to whether the necessary spending control is possible or probable in our democracy, which is so dominated by political expediency and special interests. This is a sad commentary on our citizenship and leadership. Little real progress toward fiscal sanity can be expected until the voters make stronger and more urgent demands of elected officials. Meantime, the Federal Reserve will have the lonely and impossible mission of simultaneously restraining inflation, moderating interest rates, and sustaining recovery.

Except for these assessments of risks and possibilities based on historical experience and fundamental forces, it is difficult to guess what might lie ahead for the economy and money markets in 1984 and beyond. There are many unknowns with potentially major impact, such as the outcome of this year's congressional and presidential elections. Campaign rhetoric and posturing could at times be unsettling to the markets. A change in leadership or a shift in the delicate balance of political power could heighten financial anxiety and economic uncertainty.

Also, one cannot ignore the instablity and stresss overseas. A breakdown of the fragile arrangements to avoid default on the enormous debt of Latin American countries could seriously disrupt international trade and finance. The unrest and brush fires in volatile less-developed nations will grow with further austerity and declines in an already low standard of living. The seemingly perpetual and insoluble turmoil in the Middle East heightens the always ominous risk of an interruption in the flow of oil from the world's largest supplier and a direct confrontation between American and Soviet forces.

Like it or not, our country has inherited the role as the world's banker and policeman. Only the United States is capable of defending freedom. It is also the main engine which pulls the global economy. To ignore and shirk these responsibilities will in the long run hurt America as much as or more than anyone else. World order is more likely to be maintained and military conflict restrained if financial stability can be restored and economic growth sustained. Another roller coaster business and money cycle in the next few years can only produce disastrous results at home and abroad.

To review, 1984 should be a good year. However, you should not let recovery give you a false sense of security about the years beyond. There is likely to still be a risky and unforgiving climate which disciplines and punishes imprudent and excessive behavior. The horizon is clouded by the risk that there will again be a gradual unfolding of developments which eventually lead to another period of severe economic and financial turbulence. No lesser authority than Paul Volcker himself recently described the deficit as "a time bomb with the fuse lit."

If you share my concern, you can do something about it. You can write your President, Senators, and Congressman and ask them to freeze spending. You can support candidates with a realistic balance of fiscal sensibility and human sensitivity. However, little meaningful progress can be expected until more people are willing to make some personal sacrifices and to accept less from their favorite federal subsidy. The nation has an indisputable duty to meet the basic needs of the truly disadvantaged, but it cannot afford to provide luxuries to many others.

Even with its problems, the United States remains the best place in the world to live, work, and do business. You don't find anyone trying to escape, but there are many trying to enter this bastion of human rights and land of economic opportunity. Despite the tendency to often place political and special interests ahead of the public interest, our democracy is still the best form of government yet devised by man. But its effective functioning and durability are at risk unless more people fulfill the responsibilities as well as enjoy the privileges of citizenship.

The period ahead could be pivotal in determining whether the fortunes of the nation and world turn toward the better or the worse. To improve the future chances for peace and prosperity, it is crucial to prove that our fiscal problems can still be solved; to show that our diverse country can still be governed; and to demonstrate that our inseparable partnership of political democracy, private enterprise, and personal freedom can still work. As in the past, perhaps Americans will arise and unite in time to prevent disaster. I hope it will not take another Great Depression to awaken them or a nuclear Pearl Harbor to unify them.

FREEZE, UNCLE SAM! HOW TO REDUCE THE IOU'S

(By Rolfe Neill, Publisher)

That star-spangled joint session of Congress, and the nation, would have been better served Wednesday night had it listened to President John G. Medlin Jr. instead of President Reagan.

President Medlin?

Yes, the man who runs Wachovia Bank, headquartered in Winston-Salem. He could have delivered the commonsense speech he made earlier this month to the Charlotte Rotary Club about America's financial troubles and how to get out of them. (Excerpts are on the front of today's Perspective Section.)

President Reagan proposed nothing except a device for coopting Democratic candidates' criticism of the incredible stack of IOU's enlarged under his presidency, most of them not of his making. Still, had the polls been open Thursday morning I believe R. Reagan would have buried all eight would-be Democratic presidents.

POTOMAC SOBER-UPPER

President Medlin has a proposal as sobering as a January dip in the Potomac River:

An across-the-board freeze, including defense, of 1985 budgeted spending at 1984 levels.

Medlin calculates this would save a minimum of $70 billion, "avoid cuts for anyone, weaken accusations of inequity and blunt attacks by interest groups."

As a man who rents money for one price and lends it for a higher rate, banker Medlin is a pragmatic fellow. He has applied that knowing eye to Congress and concluded that the elected representatives have no stomach for doing the right thing when it comes to setting our financial house in order.

The beauty of his freeze plan is that everyone suffers equally. Meanwhile, legislators don't have to scramble for cover.

President Reagan's Social Security Commission achieved its recommendations utilizing the same theory. Nearly decapitated when he proposed obviously needed Social Security financing reforms, the president circled back to the problem by means of a commission. This enabled Congress to point the finger at the commission and no one on Capitol Hill had to fear voter anger.

ONLY A BEGINNING

The Medlin proposal is a good beginning, but merely that. How do we get out of the deficit? Even more, how do we begin to reduce the existing trillion-plus dollar debt?

Mr. Reagan mentioned again in his State of the Union address a constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget. He cited that many states have this requirement. Ours is one of them. We saw the effect of that balanced budget requirement last year when Gov. Hunt ordered freezes in wages as well as spending reductions when taxes failed to come in at the rate expected.

As a consequence, not a penny of interest will be paid by the State of North Carolina for money borrowed because we lived beyond our income. As far as I know, no one died because of budgetary delays, either.

I'm skittish about the federal balanced budget amendment for two reasons:

1. There are years, such as recessionary ones, when a nation's budget may prudently dip into the red.

2. Having watched Congress, I'm convinced they would find a way around its language just as they now routinely violate their own budget-making restrictions.

WILL TAKE 30 YEARS

We get out of this mess by deciding as a people we are going to balance our budget, say, within the next four or five years and then begin a systematic reduction of the debt. The latter step will take 25 or 30 years but could be done.

We have just passed through a wracking recession. Yet, the prime rate is stuck at 11%. Every indicator that might hold down interest rates going the other way, so a rate increase later this year is inevitable. This will push up inflation's rate, too.

Help! But of course there is none, except that which we provide ourselves. Legislators will listen, but only if the demand for less exceeds the shout for more. Our side is losing.

There is no one to pay the bills but you. As long as you okay them—by silence—those IOU's will continue to be piled up by Congress. Is this what you want? Is this your inheritance to your children and grandchildren?

Thank you, Mr. President—President Medlin, this is.

N.C. BANKER URGES A SPENDING FREEZE

(By Nick Poulos)

John G. Medlin Jr., president of Wachovia Bank and Trust Co. of Winston-Salem, N.C., proposes what he believes to be a simple and politically acceptable way to address the nagging budget deficit problem.

With projected deficits of around $200 billion "as far as the eye can see," Medlin advocates an across-the-board freeze of 1985 budgeted spending—including funds earmarked for defense—at 1984 levels.

This would lower the 1985 budget deficit by more than $70 billion and avoid cuts for anyone, weaken accusations of inequity, and blunt attacks by special interest groups, the banker asserts.

Raising taxes won't solve the problem and efforts to make spending cuts of the magnitude required are doomed to failure, he adds.

"A spending freeze would reduce interest rates immediately and sustain economic progress for several years," Medlin avers.

Interest rates must come down if the economic recovery is to continue on a sound basis, he asserts. For example, mortgage rates should be around 10 percent and the prime, or basic bank lending rate, about 8 percent, he said.

POTENTIAL FOR CRISIS

Medlin warns that the problem should not await the presidential election, that the potential for a financial crisis will grow with further procrastination.

Financial systems both here and abroad are more vulnerable than before to rising interests costs, the banker emphasizes. Foreigners, he notes, could cause serious disruptions if they choose to dump the overvalued dollar.

Medlin doesn't buy the argument that the big budget deficits will simply melt away as government revenues swell with the economic recovery.

Medlin notes that the structural, or built-in defict, is more than $10 billion, even assuming a full-employment economy. This poses the threat somewhere along the line of another inflationary, and interest-rate, surge culminating in an economic tailspin, he warns.

Although the spending freeze is simple in concept and execution, Medlin harbors no illusions regarding the difficulty of effecting such action.

"I believe most Americans would enthusiastically support a spending freeze, but it probably would not be greeted warmly by the Washington bureaucracy," he said.

No real progress toward fiscal sanity can be achieved until the voters make stronger and more urgent demands upon their political representatives, the banker emphasizes.

FED'S "IMPOSSIBLE MISSION"

In the meantime, he notes, the Federal Reserve Board is stuck with the "lonely and impossible mission" of simultaneously restraining inflation, moderating interest rates, and sustaining recovery.

Medlin acknowledges that a spending freeze would be only an initial step in the effort to solve the deficit problem.

Medlin would couple a spending freeze with implementation of many of the suggestions made by the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control. The study highlights 2,287 cost-cutting suggestions which it claims could save more than $400 billion in federal spending over the next three years.

In addition, Medlin said he supports the idea of a constitutional amendment that would require a balanced budget and a limit on spending.

However, Medlin notes that it would take several years before such an amendment could be enacted.

"We've got to get moving on the problem now," Medlin concludes. "We can't wait until after the presidential election. We're running out of time. It's a risky game we're playing by procrastinating. As Paul Volcker has observed, the deficit is a 'time bomb with the fuse lit.' "

Mr. HELMS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I had hoped we could be on the next bill, which will be habeas corpus, by now. But the people principally involved in the debate are not here. Therefore, I think there is no practical alternative except to wait.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the transaction of routine morning business be extended until 2 o'clock under the same terms and conditions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCHRAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

REFORM OF FEDERAL INTERVENTION IN STATE PROCEEDINGS ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have conferred with the minority leader who indicates to me that he has no objection to proceeding to the consideration of Calendar 354, S. 1763, which is the so-called habeas corpus bill. The bill will be managed on this side by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator THURMOND. I understand Senator BAUCUS on this side will manage for the minority.

Based on that, I believe we are prepared now to proceed, and I ask unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the Senate Calendar Order 354, S. 1763.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1763) to reform procedures for collateral review of criminal judgments, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the pending bill—S. 1763—may well be one of the most important measures to be considered by the Senate this Congress. It is designated to ameliorate the heavy burden imposed on Federal and State courts and our Federal system of government by the repetitive, and usually frivolous, resort to collateral attacks in the nature of habeas corpus on criminal convictions. While the bill seeks to enhance the finality of Federal criminal convictions, it is the quasi-appellate habeas corpus jurisdiction of the lower Federal courts over State criminal judgments that has primarily given rise to the problems with which the bill is concerned. The shortcomings of the present system are aptly summarized in a treatise on Federal procedure, cited in the committee report as follows:

The most controversial and friction-producing issue in the relation between the federal courts and the states is federal habeas corpus for state prisoners. Commentators are critical of its present scope, federal judges are unhappy at the burden of thousands of mostly frivolous petitions, state courts resent having their decisions reexamined by a single federal district judge, and the Supreme Court in recent terms has shown a strong inclination to limit its availability. Meanwhile, prisoners thrive on it as a form of occupational therapy and for a few it serves as a means of redressing constitutional violations.

The committee report documents from hearings and other sources the dissatisfaction of Federal and State officials, including judges, prosecuting attorneys, and attorneys general, with the present operation of the Federal habeas corpus statute. Their view—and the committee's view—is that current Federal habeas corpus is unsatisfactory on grounds of federalism, proper regard for the independent stature of the State courts, the need for finality in criminal adjudication, and conservation of limited criminal justice resources. I urge my colleagues to review the committee report—and, if possible, the hearings—on this subject. I am convinced that such a review would persuade a substantial majority of the Senate to join me in passing this important measure.

I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the provisions of S. 1763 be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1736. REFORM OF FEDERAL INTERVENTION IN STATE PROCEEDINGS

SUMMARY OF THE BILL

The bill would amend various provisions of title 28, United States Code, and a related Rule of Appellate Procedure, concerning the availability of collateral relief in the federal courts of State and federal prisoners. Among the matters addressed by these amendments are the standard of review in habeas corpus proceedings, the effect of procedural defaults on the subsequent availability of collateral relief, the time within which collateral relief may be sought, the requirement of exhaustion of state remedies, and the procedure on appeal in collateral proceedings.

Section 2 of the bill would add two new subsections to section 2244 title 28, United States Code. Proposed section 2244(d) relates to the effect of a State prisoner's failure to raise a claim properly in State proceedings on the subsequent availability of federal habeas corpus. Proposed subsection (d)(1) of section 2244 sets out a general standard under which such a procedural default would bar access to federal habeas corpus unless it was the result of State action in violation of federal law. The main practical significance of this standard is that attorney error or misjudgment in failing to raise a claim properly would excuse a procedural default if it amounted to constitutionally ineffective assistance of counsel, since in such a case the default would be the result of the State's failure, in violation of the Sixth Amendment, to afford the defendant effective assistance of counsel. See Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 342-45 (1980). But lesser degrees of attorney error or misjudgment would not excuse a default. This would adopt as the uniform rule the approach of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of Indiviglio v. United States, 612 F. 2d 624, 631 (1979), eliminating the great uncertainties that currently exist in this area. Proposed section 2244(d)-(2)-(3) further provides for excuse of a procedural default where a claim raised in a habeas corpus proceeding asserts a new, retroactive right subsequently recognized by the Supreme Court, or where the factual predicate of the claim could not have been discovered prior to the default through the exercise of reasonable diligence.

Proposed new section 2244(e) would establish a one-year time limit on application for federal habeas corpus, normally commencing at the time State remedies are exhausted. This would provide State defendants with ample time to seek federal review following the conclusion of State proceedings, but would avoid the acute difficulties of proof that currently arise when Federal habeas corpus is sought by a prisoner years or decades after the State trial. The proposed limitation rule may be compared to various existing time limits on seeking review or re-opening of criminal judgements in the federal courts, such as the normal ten day limit on appeal by federal defendants under Fed. R. App. P. (4); the normal ninety day limit on a State defendant's application for direct review in the Supreme Court under Sup. Ct. R. 11, 22; and the two year limit on motions for new trials based on newly discovered evidence under Fed. R. Crim. P. 33. Proposed section 2244(e) further provides for deferral of the start of the limitation period in appropriate cases, such as assertion of newly recognized rights or newly discovered claims.

Section 3 of the bill would amend section 2253 of title 28, United States Code, so as to vest in the judges of the courts of appeals exclusive authority to issue certificates of probable cause for appeal in habeas corpus proceedings. It would also create an identical certificate requirement for appeals by federal prisoners in collateral relief proceedings pursuant to section 2255 of title 28, United States Code. This would implement recommendations of Judge Henry Friendly of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. See Friendly, Is Innocence Irrelevant? Collateral Attack on Criminal Judgments, 38 U. Chi. L. Rev. 142, 144 n. 9 (1970). The reform would correct inefficiencies of the current system under which an appellate court is obliged to hear an appeal on a district court's certification, though it may believe that the certificate was improvidently granted, and under which a prisoner is afforded duplicative opportunities to persuade first a district judge and then an appellate judge that an appeal is warranted. Section 4 of the bill would amend Fed. R. App. P. 22 to conform it to the amendments of section 603.

Section 5 of the bill would make various changes in Section 2254 of title 28, United States Code. Section 5(a) would amend current section 2254(b) to clarify that a habeas corpus petition can be denied on the merits notwithstanding the petitioner's failure to exhaust State remedies. This would implement a recommendation of Professor David Shapiro. See Shapiro, Federal Habeas Corpus: A Study in Massachusetts, 87 Harv. L. Rev. 321, 358-59 (1973). It would avoid the waste of State and federal resources that presently results when a prisoner presenting a hopeless petition is sent back to the State courts to exhaust State remedies.

Section 5(b) of the bill would add a new subsection (d) to section 2254, United States Code. Proposed subjection (d) would accord deference to the result of full and fair State adjudications. This would establish a standard similar to that stated by the Supreme Court in the case of Ex Parte Hawk, 321 U.S. 114, 118 (1944), prior to the unexplained substitution of the current rules of mandatory re-adjudication by the decision in Brown v. Allen, 344 U.S. 443 (1953). To full and fair in the intended sense the State court determination must be reasonable, and must be arrived at by procedures consistent with applicable federal law, including the constitutional requirement of due process. In addition, re-adjudication by the federal habeas court would be allowed in cases in which new evidence of substantial importance came to light or a retroactive change of law of substantial importance occurred after the State proceedings. The general sense of the proposed reform is that reversal of a State conviction after a lapse of years and affirmance by the appellate courts of the State should rest on a finding by the habeas court of a significant error or deficiency in the State proceedings. A mere reasonable difference of opinion in a case in which the proper disposition is unclear should not be grounds for disturbing a State judgment in a habeas corpus proceeding.

Section 5(c) of the bill would simplify current section 2254(d), which is verbose, confusing, and obscure; redesignate it as section 2254(e); and bring its formulation into conformity with that of proposed new section 2254(d). The provision would be of minor practical significance, coming into play only when the general standard governing deference to State determinations in proposed new section 2254(d) was found by the habeas court to be unsatisfied.

Section 6 of the bill would amend section 2255, 28 United States Code. It would carry out reforms in the collateral remedy for federal prisoners comparable to the rule proposed in section 2 of the bill governing excuse of procedural defaults and time limitation in habeas corpus proceedings.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I have a letter addressed to all U.S. Senators from the National Association of Attorneys General:

We are informed that you will soon have an opportunity to vote on S. 1763, the Habeas Corpus reform bill, and urge you to vote for it without amendments. It contains provisions which will make vital improvements in the habeas corpus system which now all too frequently results in needlessly delaying the finality of constitutionally sound criminal judgments.

Florida Attorney General Jim Smith has spearheaded the interest of Attorneys General in this subject which is reflected in several resolutions adopted by the Association, including this one adopted in June, 1981 and directed toward S. 1763's predecessor, S. 653 of the 97th Congress:

Whereas one of the principal weaknesses in the criminal justice system today is its lack of certainty and finality; and

Whereas crime rates continue to rise and public confidence in the criminal justice system is at a low point nationally; and

Whereas certainty and swiftness of justice is universally accepted as the strongest deterrent to criminal activity; and

Whereas the diminishing ability of the states to carry out the judgments of their criminal courts has led to erosion of certainty; and

Whereas some of the commendable procedural safeguards attached to the writ of habeas corpus in recent years are being abused, and have become instruments with which to frustrate justice rather than to secure it; and

Whereas on June 10, 1980, the National Association of Attorneys General requested Congress to adopt changes to habeas corpus procedures to require that claims be timely and orderly presented; and

Whereas these changes have been proposed as legislation contained in S. 653 and H.R. 3416;

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the National Association of Attorneys General that:

1. Amendments to the Federal criminal code contained in S. 653 and H.R. 3416 relating to habeas corpus proceedings are necessary to require orderly and timely presentation of claims on behalf of defendants and to restore finality to the criminal process and proper respect for state court factual determinations; and

2. The Congress of the United States is hereby petitioned by the assembled State Attorneys General to amend the Federal Criminal Code as proposed in S. 653 and the companion House bill, H.R. 3416; and

3. The General Counsel of the Association is authorized to transmit these views to the Congress and to the appropriate officials of the Administration.

If we can be helpful to you in any way during your deliberations and debates of the bill, we would be grateful for the opportunity to provide any assistance you may require.

Sincerely and respectfully,

C. RAYMOND MARVIN.

Mr. Marvin is the executive director and general counsel of the National Association of Attorneys General.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, the Constitution does not require Congress to vest habeas corpus jurisdiction or any other jurisdiction in the Federal courts. Congress first extended the habeas corpus jurisdiction of Federal courts to State prisoners in 1867 during Reconstruction, a period of great congressional distrust of the governments and courts of the Southern States. The Federal writ was intended to issue only if the State court committing the prisoner had jurisdiction to do so. But beginning in the 1920's, the Federal courts steadily expanded the scope of Federal habeas jurisdiction until, by 1942, the writ was held to be appropriate in those cases where the State conviction has been in disregard of the constitutional rights of the accused, and where the writ is the only effective means of preserving his rights. The scope of Federal jurisdiction was broadest from 1953 to the mid-1970's. Since then, the Supreme Court has been restricting the jurisdiction. While Congress need not follow the holdings of the Supreme Court, the present legislation does reflect several recent Supreme Court opinions.

Two problems, one of numbers and one of principle, exist today. Concerning numbers, State prisoners filed 8,059 petitions for habeas corpus in the Federal courts in the year ending June 30, 1982. Very few of these (perhaps 170) resulted in evidentiary hearings—that is, the great bulk of them were frivolous or without merit. While opponents of reform point to the small number of hearings and argue that habeas actions are obviously not clogging the Federal courts, their argument overlooks the fact that each petition must be responded to by State attorneys and reviewed by Federal judges. The few hearings and even fewer number of petitions granted by the courts support the counterargument that current Federal jurisdiction over State prisoners is an expensive, time-consuming luxury that seldom results in the correction of a miscarriage of justice.

More important than the numbers problem, however, is the need to correct the faulty rationale which supports the broad present scope of Federal jurisdiction. That reasoning is premised upon the belief that State courts and State judges are inferior to Federal judges and are not to be trusted as guardians of Federal and constitutional rights. Therefore, State criminal defendants are thought to need the Federal judiciary to give a second opinion, even where the State supreme court and the U.S. Supreme Court have affirmed a conviction and the collateral review proceedings of the State have been exhausted. This argument is patently unsound. All judges, Federal and State, swear to uphold the Constitution and the rights it guarantees. It is a direct affront to the States and a violation of the principle of federalism upon which our system of justice is founded.

The argument is also false because it assumes that the appropriate standard for criminal proceedings is perfection and not reasonable fairness. The result is that the finality which is necessary in all litigation—criminal and civil—is presently sacrificed to the belief that justice requires the courts to give defendants an unlimited number of opportunities to find a defect in their trials. And so the defendants file petition after petition in hopes that a Federal judge somewhere will order a new trial.

Therefore, I support this legislation to restrict Federal habeas corpus jurisdiction. This measure would serve to correct the false belief that we cannot trust State criminal justice systems to enforce constitutional rights. The bill will also result in tremendous savings in attorney and court time. While one might argue that the best solution would be to eliminate altogether the Federal jurisdiction over State prisoners, the present proposal is certainly a reasonable and constitutional alternative.

AMENDMENT NO. 2698

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, if there are no amendments to the bill, I wish to offer some technical amendments to S. 1763, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) proposes an amendment numbered 2698.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS TO S. 1763

On page 1, line 4, delete "1983" and substitute "1984".

On page 4, line 17, delete "ro" and substitute "or".

On page 4, line 25, after "pursuant to" insert "section 2255 of title 28, United States Code,".

On page 7, line 19, after "moved" insert a comma.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I understand that the distinguished

Senator from Florida desires to speak in favor of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment? Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am delighted to join Senator THURMOND and others to urge the passage of S. 1763, the Reform of Federal Intervention in State Proceedings Act of 1983.

This bill addressed the need for reform in the Federal habeas corpus law.

Mr. President, I think the reform in this area is very, very long overdue. A number of us in the Senate have been pressing for that for a number of years, and the proponents of this bill in the Senate are not the ones who initiated this pressing. It really has come up from the people and from the court system itself.

I think we should look back to get a little history on habeas corpus. It is a right of each U.S. citizen. It is a right that we have spoken to in the Constitution of the United States. We said that we would not do away with the right except in extreme emergencies when it would be necessary to do away with the right.

So I think we have to look back and see why was this right so important and why did our forefathers and the originators of the Constitution want to express themselves on it. Look back to the history of where the writ of habeas corpus came from to start with.

I understand that the Latin for habeas corpus itself is, produce the body. It goes back very much to our history of the common law and to the English usage. It was a time when a major abuse was taking place. The King would see fit to throw someone into jail, never press charges against that individual but leave him in detention. The writ of habeas corpus was one of the rights that the barons brought issue to the King about in the Magna Carta at Runnymede. They said this practice has to stop.

If someone is arrested he is entitled to know what charges are placed against him and he is entitled to be produced in a court of law so that those charges can be brought. You should not stick someone away in incarceration, in detention, in a prison, as it were, and not allow that person to be brought up for trial.

Mr. President, that is a hallowed right. That is a right that we want to recognize in this country.

But that is not the abuse that we are speaking to in this bill and we are not attempting to curb anything in regard to that right in the bill that is before us now.

What we are talking about is something that has arisen in the late 1900's, in the last 15 or 20 years. Basically, the abuses that came about was the use of the writ of habeas corpus after the trial, after the conviction, after the adjudication of the trial to cause there to be a review or a rehashing of the events that led up to that trial.

Mr. President, 50 years ago no one thought about using a writ of habeas corpus for that purpose. If you even look back 20 or 25 years ago, you will find it was used very sparingly for that particular purpose. And why? I think one reason is we have our regular appellate system. We have our due process in which you are entitled to take questions up on appeal. You can go up through your State court system. You can then even attempt to address those questions in the Federal court after the State court system.

Again this bill does nothing to that right, nothing to that due process change. But to use the writ in a post-conviction situation, that is what we are attempting to get at in this bill.

How are we trying to change it? Again we are not trying to do away with it entirely. But we are trying to codify it, if you will. We are trying to put some kind of a time limitation on it. We are trying to see that it does not completely change the whole system of due process as we have known it before, and that it does not work against the system of punishment being a deterrent to try to keep further crimes from occurring.

What we found are abuses and it is documented and the record is full of it from the hearings that we have held, from the numerous things that have been placed in the RECORD, and from the studies that have been made by the court systems themselves, by the associations of State attorneys general, by the U.S. Attorneys General, by everyone. Every group that has really looked at this question can cite the abuses in the time delays that have been taken where using the writ a person, who has been convicted and who has been given due process, is able to go back years after the offense occurred. By use of the writ, he can require the State court or the Federal court, if his case was prosecuted there, to prove again why he was convicted to start with. In many instances that means that they have to produce witnesses and evidence after 30 years. We have seen cases that have been brought that long ago. In some of those cases the witnesses could not be produced and we saw people turned loose. The court could not tell in those old cases whether the petition was valid or not because you have not been able to, in effect, reconvict him, been able to produce testimony to show that the issues that he raised are invalid.

We have seen one prisoner file multiple petitions over years of time questioning literally the same set of facts in different forums through using the writ of habeas corpus.

So time after time, after you had given him due process on one question, he moves simply to a different court on another question. We see things like this: A prisoner filing a writ of habeas corpus saying he was not properly represented at the trial court; counsel who was appointed for him was not proper. Now, if that takes place 10 to 15 years after the fact, if you cannot produce that lawyer, if you cannot prove the lawyer's competency, if he has gone to his reward or something, that prisoner might have to be released. But assuming that you win, that you are able to do that and you are able to show that competent counsel was appointed, Mr. President, we found the same prisoner then filing a writ of habeas corpus that the lawyer appointed to file his first writ was not competent and, therefore, he tests that issue. Then if you find against him on that, he files a writ that the lawyer appointed to file the second writ testing the first writ was not competent; and the Federal court has to sit down and hold a hearing on this.

We have found from the Federal courts that a major portion of their time, up to a third of the criminal practice time, has been taken in trying to address these writs of habeas corpus.

Mr. President, if everyone who is in jail can be filing these writs they are sort of in league with their fraternity that is outside because you cannot be even trying them on the first offense because we are taking up all of the court's time listening and answering these writs, holding hearings on these writs for the ones who have been incarcerated already.

We see that that is happening time after time and when, Mr. President, one of these people is released 30 years after the trial, not on the merits of the case itself but on one of these legal technicalities, on the basis that the State is unable to produce a witness because the sheriff of that county happens to be dead or happens to be gone or you cannot produce him. What do you think that does to the respect for law, to the moral fiber of the people? what does it do to the law enforcement people who were responsible for making that conviction to start with? What does that do for all of the other people who are determining whether we are going to be a government of laws or not?

So the purpose of this bill, Mr. President, is to try to address those glaring faults that have been raised by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and by many of the other Justices of the Supreme Court. They have been raised in law review articles across this land. They have been raised by the Association of State Attorneys General, by the U.S. attorneys and by their respective groups across the country. They have been raised by many, many law enforcement people and certainly by others, who having watched this situation, see that we have something that just is not working. It is a total breakdown but, as I say, we do not want to do away with the writ. We simply want to reform it to where it conforms more to the purpose for which it is stated. We do not want to do away with due process, but due process has to work in a certain way. It has to work in a way in which everyone understands the rules of the game. In turn, it needs to be fair so that there is due process for the people whom we are attempting to protect by virtue of our criminal laws, by virtue of the fact that we have a sentencing procedure, and that we have a procedure by which we convict people. Finally, Mr. President, we are bringing this bill to the floor today, after 4 years that I know of, that the Senator from Florida has been trying to do something about this problem. We and a number of other people have been speaking on it year after year. Finally we are getting this matter before the people's elected body to simply try to redress these errors, these problems that we have, and to reform the habeas corpus law.

The loss of the respect of society because our system of justice is unable to punish a crime that has occurred, is one of the major faults that has to be corrected if we are going to address this problem. In the hands of skillful lawyers, in the hands of organized criminals, this present writ process and the abuses that can come under that process can tie up the appellate process for endless hours. It can take many, many hours of time that law enforcement officials, prosecutors, judges, and others should be able to otherwise use to attend to the public business. They should be able to attend to their business of trying to protect the public, but they are unable to do so because of the countless stream of appeals, the countless stream of writs that can come and then the appeal from the denying of these writs.

And that again, Mr. President, is something I forgot to speak to. When the writ is denied, then, of course, you can try to appeal the denying of the writ. And that again can tie up the process. This is something that we see certain prisoners using time after time after time and again tying up the entire process.

I am delighted we are seeing it addressed today. I am delighted to be a consponsor of the bill. I hope the Senate is going to work its will on this bill and that we will have passage. Then, Mr. President, I hope that we will be able to get the House to pay attention to this legislation and to take it up and do something about this legislation.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wish to thank the able Senator from Florida for the statement he has made on this bill. For several years he and the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) have been very active in promoting this legislation. It is vital legislation. I just wanted to commend him for the remarks he has made.

Mr. President, I now yield to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut who has a statement to make.

Mr. WEICKER. I thank my distinguished colleague from South Carolina.

Mr. President, I rise in opposition to S. 1763, a bill which proposes substantive and procedural changes to Federal habeas corpus statutes.

The writ of habeas corpus was established by the founders of our Constitution to provide the opportunity for judicial review to any citizen who felt that he or she had been illegally detained or confined. Initially reserved for petitions from Federal prisoners, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in Federal courts was specifically extended to State prisoners by the act of February 5, 1867. Today, the provisions of that act are incorporated in the United States Code.

Mr. President, I am constrained to ask the question, why is this matter before us, why are we even considering limitations to this fundamental privilege? The committee report includes this sentence:

> Commentators are critical of its present scope and federal judges are unhappy at the burden of thousands of mostly frivolous petitions.

I daresay that habeas corpus petitions as a class are hardly frivolous. Some of the habeas corpus petitions filed are filed by State prisoners facing the death penalty. If, in the name of expediency, even one of these petitioners is inappropriately or unfairly sentenced to death, the cost of limiting habeas corpus is far too great. In his opinion on the Supreme Court case of Brown against Allen, Justice Frankfurter wrote:

> Experience may be summoned to support the belief that most claims in these attempts to obtain review of State convictions are without merit. Presumably they are adequately dealt with in the State courts.

But Justice Frankfurter goes on to say:

> The meritorious claims are few, but our procedures must ensure that those few claims are not stifled by undiscriminating generalities. The complexities of our federalism and the workings of a scheme of government involving the interplay of two governments, one of which is subject to limitations enforceable by the other, are not to be escaped by simple, rigid rules which, by avoiding some abuses, generate others.
> For surely it is an abuse to deal too casually and too lightly with rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, even though they involve limitations upon State power and may be invoked by those morally unworthy. Under the guise of fashioning a procedural rule, we are not justified in wiping out the practical efficacy of a jurisdiction conferred by Congress on the District courts. Rules which in effect treat all of these cases indiscriminately as frivolous do not fall far short of abolishing this head of jurisdiction.

Proponents of S. 1763 claim that the Federal courts are bogged down with Federal habeas corpus petitions and that this legislation will reduce the Federal courts' workload. According to the Administration Office of U.S. Courts, the total civil case filings in 1981 were 180,576. Of this number, 7,790 were habeas corpus petitions filed by State prisoners in Federal courts. These filings reflect a decrease from a decade earlier when 9,063 were filed in 1970 and 8,372 in 1971.

In 1981, 177,925 civil cases were terminated in Federal courts. Of these 7,302 were habeas corpus cases.

Habeas corpus matters constituted approximately 4 percent of all civil cases filed and terminated in Federal courts.

Of the total habeas cases tried, 158 took 1 day to try; 26 took 2 days; 10 took 3 days; and only 9 cases in the country took 4 days or longer.

I ask the supporters of this legislation, where is the horrendous burden this bill intends to relieve? These statistics, given me by the American Bar Association, do not establish a compelling need for the reforms this bill would put in place. I am not even sure the proposed reforms are much of a solution. If the pending bill becomes law, petitions will still be filed; State attorneys will still be required to respond accordingly and Federal courts will still have to determine whether a habeas corpus petition was "fully and fairly adjudicated" in the State court.

That is not the only burden this legislation must bear, Mr. President, as if that were not enough to give us serious pause. It is also subject to a number of serious constitutional challenges which should stop this exercise dead in its tracks.

By limiting the opportunities for Federal judicial review of habeas corpus petitions the changes proposed in S. 1763 pose a serious threat to a chief function of our Federal courts—that is, to protect the constitutional rights of its citizens. S. 1763 would require a Federal court reviewing a habeas corpus petition to accept the legal determination of a State court on a Federal constitutional issue, as long as the determination was "fully and fairly adjudicated." The proponents of this bill state that such a reform is "likely to make it possible to decide cases more easily and with less extensive litigation." S. 1763 proposes changes in the law in the name of efficiency. Efficiency, however, is certainly not the highest calling of our judicial system. It is the mandate of our criminal justice system to strive for justice—not efficiency; not expediency. It is far more important to insure that Federal constitutional issues are reviewed by a Federal court, as the writ of habeas corpus provides, than it is to propose changes to the law which make it easier to decide a class of court cases.

As to the determination of whether or not a case has been fully and fairly adjudicated in a State court—I, again, quote Justice Frankfurter, who wrote:

> Vague, undefined directions permitting the District Court to give "consideration" to a prior State determination fall short of appropriate guidance for bringing to the surface the meritorious case. They may serve indiscriminately to preclude a hearing where one should have been granted, and yet this basis for denial may be so woven into the texture of the result that an improper deference to a State court treatment of a Constitutional issue cannot even be corrected on review * * * if left at large in disposing of applications for a Writ of Habeas Corpus, they (district judges) would necessarily be thrown back upon their individual judgments, and that would be the exercise not of law but of arbitrariness.

Mr. President, to deny an individual the opportunity for Federal review of his or her case based solely on an individual determination that a State adjudication was both "full and fair" would be "the exercise not of law but of arbitrariness."

Since Brown against Allen, the Supreme Court has determined that in certain special cases opportunity for habeas corpus petitions may be limited. For instance, in Stone against Powell, the Court did hold that if an individual has had the opportunity to litigate any fourth amendment claims on direct review, he or she may not petition for habeas corpus to litigate those claims in Federal courts. However, in a footnote of the majority opinion, the Court did state:

> We nevertheless afford broad habeas corpus relief, recognizing the need in a free society for an additional safeguard against compelling an innocent man to suffer an unconstitutional loss of liberty * * But in the case of a typical Fourth Amendment claim, asserted on collateral attack, a convicted defendant is usually asking society to redetermine an issue that has no bearing on the basic justice of his incarceration.

In this case and in other recent decisions, the Supreme Court has acted responsibly and within its jurisdiction to insure that the habeas corpus petition process may be used but not misused by petitioners. The Court has clearly demonstrated appropriate comity to State court proceedings. For the Congress to impose further limitations on habeas corpus procedures based on arbitrary determinations of a full and fair adjudication in a State court, does not appear to this Senator to be responsible, warranted, or wise.

The Senator from Montana will offer an amendment to S. 1763 which would delete the section of the bill which limits Federal judicial review of any claim that has previously been "fully and fairly adjudicated" in State court proceedings.

I agree with Senator BAUCUS when he says that the proposed reform "is inconsistent with the basic concepts of federalism and is potentially detrimental to individual constitutional rights." I intend to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, and I encourage my colleagues to do the same.

Deference to a State court's full and fair adjudication, however, is not the only change proposed to our habeas corpus statutes in S. 1763. This bill seeks to broaden the circumstances in which procedural errors would prevent Federal review. In Wainwright against Sykes, the Supreme Court found that if a constitutional issue was not raised in State court in accordance with a State's contemporaneous objection rule, then that issue can be deemed forfeited unless a defendant shows "cause" for failure to raise the issue or "prejudice" arising from the claimed constitutional effect. However, the Court did not precisely define any cause and prejudice standard. Instead, it left such a standard "open for resolution in future decisions." The Court also stated that the "cause-and-prejudice test" would—> not prevent a Federal habeas court from adjudicating for the first time the Federal constitutional claim of a defendant who, in the absence of such an adjudication, will be the victim of a miscarriage of justice.

Five years later, in Engle against Isaac, the Supreme Court held that:

> The terms "cause" and "actual prejudice" are not rigid concepts. They take their meaning from the principles of comity and finality . . . In appropriate circumstances, those must yield to the imperative of a fundamentally unjust incarceration.

S. 1763 attempts to define the conditions for cause and prejudice by focusing on the question of whether the State has provided the opportunity to raise Federal claims that satisfied the requirements of Federal law. Given the variety of circumstances which can and do arise in habeas corpus cases, the determination of whether or not a petitioner actually had every opportunity to raise a constitutional issue in the State court should be reviewed on a case-by-case basis. To do otherwise could result in "a miscarriage of justice."

There is yet a third constitutional issue raised in S. 1763 with respect to the proposed changes to the statute of limitations. The Constitution clearly states, "The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." This bill would establish a 1-year limit on access to Federal habeas corpus for State prisoners and a 2-year time limit on application for collateral relief by Federal prisoners. Are the proponents of this bill presuming to establish time limits on individual constitutional rights? Are we to infer that for some people, constitutional rights expire after a certain period of time?

Mr. President, the proposed statutes of limitations are absurd. They impose time limitations on timeless rights. Such limitations could result in the punishment of an individual who has, in fact, been punished in derogation of his or her constitutional rights.

This legislation proposes a significant change in our judicial procedures. It does so in the name of efficiency. I have not been convinced, nor has the American Bar Association, that the potential benefit to our judicial system are worth the constitutional costs.

This matter is not cut and dried. The vote we will hold on this bill is not a procrime or anticrime vote; it deals with fundamental questions of our constitutional system. It is in the best traditions of this body to err on the side of caution in such matters, rather than to forge ahead because the political mood seems right. I will vote against this measure and urge my colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) desires to speak in favor of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, first, let me commend the distinguished Senator from South Carolina for his leadership on this very important issue. I know the Senator from South Carolina has spent a lot of time on all of these important crime measures. I happen to believe that this one is right at the top of the list in terms of the reform that the American people not only have every right to expect but do expect.

Most people do not understand the technicalities of why a procedure takes so long in the criminal process in America. They do not understand that we have no finality of judgment.

I would very much like to commend the Senator from South Carolina for his very thorough and, I think, very effective job of leadership in this area.

I also want to commend the majority leader, Senator BAKER, for getting this legislation before us at the beginning of the session.

Senator CHILES, the Senator from Florida, has already related the concern that he and I have had for a number of years in this area, and we have urged over and over again that this be given a priority.

I am pleased and delighted that Senator BAKER and Senator BYRD have worked together to make this a priority piece of legislation for the Senate.

I am hoping that the leadership on the House side, both the Democratic leadership and the Republican leadership, will do the same thing.

Mr. President, I gladly rise today as cosponsor and in strong support of legislation, introduced by Senator THURMOND, addressing a most critical area of needed criminal law reform and one which is, by all reports, essential to the continued viability of our judicial system. I refer to the issue of the writ of habeas corpus.

On many occasions I have risen in this Chamber to address my colleagues on the need to restore a sense of finality to our criminal justice system, in part by reform of our Federal habeas corpus laws. Under those laws as they now stand, our courts have been burdened, time and again, with needless and repetitive habeas corpus petitions.

I have consistently sponsored or cosponsored reasonable legislation designed to address the need for habeas corpus reform. Specifically, during this session of Congress, I have cosponsored S. 117, the Crime Control Act of 1983, and S. 217, the Finality of Criminal Judgments Act, both of which contain many of the desired reforms. These bills would serve to streamline current habeas corpus procedure in several important ways. They would prevent Federal habeas corpus relief where first the issue was not raised in State court or second was disposed of on the merits in a collateral proceeding unless the petitioner establishes prejudices and other exceptional circumstances. They provide for specific statutes of limitations on the filing of habeas corpus petitions. Finally, they assign binding authority to State court determinations of certain issues absent a showing of special circumstances by the petitioner.

I am encouraged that the bill which we have before us speaks to precisely the same problems which has caused me such great concern for some time now.

The writ of habeas corpus, as originally conceived in medieval English law, provided a means of reviewing the detention of an individual held under executive, and not judicial, authority. It was never intended to be used to review in any manner, detention as a result of a judicial decision. It was executive, and not judicial, abuse of power that the Founding Fathers had in mind when they specifically prohibited the "suspension" of the writ of habeas corpus in article 1, section 9 of the Constitution. In fact, State prisoners were not specifically granted any right to Federal habeas corpus relief under the enactment of the Habeas Corpus Act of 1867 by Congress, despite the earlier constitutional provision.

Since 1867, experience has shown that the use of the writ now bears little resemblance to the purpose for which it was originally intended. Rather than act as a bulwark of freedom for our citizens, it has been misused as a seemingly endless "appeal" device by convicted felons. Frequently, prisoners wait many years and, after witnesses have died, file a habeas corpus action seeking to set aside the original judgment and sentence. In such cases, the issue raised was often not raised and answered in the original record, and the Government is simply incapable of refuting the prisoner's testimony.

In other cases, prisoners file a series of seemingly endless petitions, wasting precious judicial resources on the needless relitigation of issues clearly and fairly decided years before. In the absence of clear legislative directives, the Federal courts often rehear and reconsider questions properly answered in the State court systems.

Abuse of Federal habeas corpus law by career criminals clearly creates serious and unnecessary manpower problems for our criminal justice system. For the year ending June 20, 1983, some 10,446 petitions for habeas corpus relief were filed in Federal courts across the country. As recently as January 26 of this year, the U.S. attorney from Detroit, Leonard Gilman, testified in hearings before the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, that each attorney in his office spends some 20 percent of his or her time on appeals, over half of which consists of habeas corpus litigation. Mr. Gilman expressed full support for the bill we are considering today.

Our State systems are equally burdened in litigating a flood of Federal habeas corpus litigation by State prisoners. Currently, only three full-time and one part-time attorney in the Georgia attorney's general's office are available to handle some 311 pending State prisoner habeas corpus cases pending in Federal court. Those same lawyers are also responsible for ligitating, through State and Federal courts, the State's 121 pending death penalty cases.

When the American public considers the types of cases which are so often litigated under our habeas corpus laws, it is little wonder why they are rapidly losing faith in the ability of our courts to deliver justice to criminal offenders.

Take, for example, the 1973 Georgia murder case in which five members of the Alday family were viciously killed in Donalsonville, Ga., during the robbery of one of their homes by three escaped convicts. The males were lined up, "firing squad" fashion, and, one by one, shot in the back of the head. The wife of one of the brothers was raped at the home and then taken to a wooded area, where she was again raped, sodomized, and then shot and killed.

In 1974, three men were convicted of these murders and sentenced to death. Those convictions were appealed to both the Georgia and U.S. Supreme Courts, and affirmed by both. Since those original appeals, the defendants have spent nearly 10 years pursuing petitions for habeas corpus relief in both Federal and State courts. As a result, they have today yet to face the death penalty. In the recent John Eldon Smith case, punishment was finally imposed only after his sentence had been reviewed 18 times by over 35 State and Federal judges.

A system which encourages these types of abuse can hardly be said to contribute to public confidence in our criminal laws. Most of us agree with those criminal justice experts who tell us that the greatest single deterrent to crime is swift and sure punishment for the guilty. Yet our system too often fails to deliver.

One reason, as Chief Justice Burger pointed out in a recent speech to the American Bar Association, is our inability to reach—at some point—finality of judgment. Judge Coleman of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has stated:

> The (court) decisions say that the writ may not be used as a second appeal, but from experience the outlaws know better. Instead of being a bulwark of freedom for the citizen, it has been allowed to become a last, and too often a sure, refuge for those who have respected neither the law nor the Constitution.

It is a sad comment indeed on our criminal justice system that blatant abuse of the writ of habeas corpus has resulted in two of the most serious shortcomings within that system: needless delay and a lack of certainty and finality in punishment. We have come to the point where the writ, rather than serving to protect innocent individuals from baseless or unknown charges, is being routinely manipulated to insulate the guilty from their just and deserving punishment.

The proposal which Senator THURMOND has offered makes several important and needed revisions to those statutes governing current habeas corpus procedure. It provides for a 1-year statute of limitations for Federal habeas corpus proceedings filed by State prisoners. This 1-year period would not, however, being until the final exhaustion of all State remedies by the State prisoner. The 1-year period is clearly a reasonable and fair requirement for the filing of such petitions. This is particularly true when one considers the great length of time which is often consumed within the State process via both direct and collateral proceedings.

Similarly, the bill provides for a 2-year statute of limitations in habeas corpus proceedings brought by Federal prisoners. That period will begin to run from the latest of specifically listed events: First, final conviction; second, removal of some Government obstacle to filing; third, creation of a newly recognized right; or fourth, discovery of necessary facts by reasonable diligence. Such limitations are clearly valid given the Supreme Court's decision upholding similar timeliness requirements for the exercise of rights, including those of constitutional origin, within both our criminal and civil judicial system. These periods of limitations are no more than a needed and reasonable requirement that habeas corpus proceedings, as other proceedings, be brought in a timely manner.

The proposal also speaks to the problem of the needless adjudication and readjudication of facts and issues which have already been fairly decided elsewhere in the legal system. We would require Federal courts to defer to State courts findings on factual and legal matters where those findings were the result of a "full and fair determination" by the State court. The Supreme Court has already made clear that there is no need for the Federal courts to rehash and rehash again issues which have already been fully and fairly determined in a State court. This provision will prevent the needless overburdening of the Federal courts with facts and legal issues already clearly and justly decided. In doing so, it will continue to protect petitioners from unjust State court determinations, leaving Federal courts free to review issues which do not meet the specific statutory standard. This was explicitly recognized by the Justice Department in their support of this provision before the Senate Judiciary Committee on April 1, 1982:

> In order to be full and fair in the intended sense the state adjudication must reflect a reasonable determination of the facts based on the evidence presented to the state courts, reasonable view of federal law, and a reasonable application of the law to the facts. It must also be conducted in a manner consistent with the procedural requirements of federal law, including the requirement of due process.

In that context, it is obvious that, under these provisions, Federal courts will still be free to fully employ the writ of habeas corpus in cases where State courts have failed to accord a petitioner a full hearing or where they have failed to act in accord with his Federal rights. It is also clear, however, that Federal courts will no longer be required to burden their already overcrowded dockets with the needless relitigation of issues already clearly, fully and fairly decided by State courts. In these days of scarce judicial resources and mounting criminal caseloads, this type of approach is essential if we are to maintain any semblance of judicial efficiency.

In conclusion, all of these provisions are designed to restore some measure of credibility to the writ of habeas corpus as it has evolved in our criminal justice system. The repetitive and often frivolous filings of habeas corpus petitions by criminal defendants has, for all practical purposes, transformed our courts into overburdened and overcrowded judicial lotteries. Our criminal justice system simply will not withstand, nor will the American public tolerate, the waste of judicial resources produced by the now commonplace abuse of this once great writ. Clearly, Congress should and must act now to end this absurd misuse of our judicial system.

We must act now to restore finality to our criminal justice system and to end this type of abuse that is so prevalent.

Mr. President, again, I congratulate the Senator from South Carolina.

● Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I support the necessary changes in our Federal habeas corpus law. I commend Judiciary Committee Chairman Senator STROM THURMOND, Senator LAWTON CHILES, and my colleagues who have been at the forefront of needed improvements in the "great writ"—habeas corpus.

The ability of a lower Federal court to overturn a State court judgment in collateral habeas corpus proceedings raises serious questions regarding the finality and integrity of State court decisions. This finality and integrity does serve an important function in the Federal system. Under our Constitution, the Federal and State judiciary share the same responsibility to make decisions regarding the Constitution and Federal law.

When a defendant is tried in a State court for a violation of State law, it is the duty of a State judge to conscientiously decide any Federal question which may arise, in accordance with the Constitution. One important check on whether the State court is properly administering Federal law is review by the U.S. Supreme Court. This is available on appeal from decisions by the highest State tribunal.

Given this system of review, some have questioned whether our federal system requires an additional collateral review of State court decisions by lower Federal courts, and what purpose this review will serve.

There is no doubt that the problems of finality and integrity in State court judgments also have an acute effect on the enforcement of our criminal law. This is not a recent phenomenon. The Bible describes well the tendencies of human nature: Ecclesiastes 8: 11, "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, the heart of the sons of men is fully set to do evil." Our criminal justice system cannot be effective unless one who violates the law knows that he will be punished swiftly and certainly. Criminals who do not fear immediate punishment are much more likely to break the law again.

At the same time, it must be remembered that criminal law involves respect, important for one's constitutional rights. Certainly there is a fundamental concern that our criminal justice system incorporate the notions of due process and equal protection. Ultimately it must strike a balance between the need for presenting claims in an orderly and timely manner, the need to prevent conviction of the innocent, and disregard for our constitutional safeguards.

The discussions surrounding our habeas corpus laws are not new, and Congress is not alone in its recognition of the problem. The need for an escape valve in the exceptional case has not gone unnoticed by certain members of the Supreme Court. In his 1981 yearend report on the judiciary, Chief Justice Warren Burger called for the limiting of Federal collateral review of State court convictions, to claims of manifest miscarriages of justice. Such an approach suggests the desirability of leaving some discretion in the Federal courts, in the case where a State court system does not fulfill the duties mandated by the Constitution.

The Senate Judiciary Committee held hearings on habeas corpus review in the 97th Congress. I had the opportunity to chair one of these hearings. Two witnesses from my home State of Alabama presented testimony: the Honorable C. C. Torbert, Jr., chief justice of the Alabama Supreme Court, and Charles A. Graddick, Alabama's State attorney general.

The testimony, by and large recognized the present ability and the competency of most of our State courts to provide defendants with a full and fair adjudication which would meet constitutional standards. Given these circumstances, we might, with some confidence, consider measures to eliminate the abuse of the "great writ," which we, of course, know as the habeas corpus writ.

Such actions could prevent situations which occurred in my own State of Alabama.

It involved a defendant who went on a seven-State rampage of violent crime, robbery and murder, and a defendant who admitted his guilt, who pled guilty at the time of the trial, who was convicted of capital offense by a jury in April 1977, and who was sentenced to death after a hearing where judicial findings were entered, as required by State law, that the aggravating circumstances outweighed the mitigating circumstances.

This conviction and sentence was affirmed by the Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals, and later by the Alabama Supreme Court. The U.S. Supreme Court denied a petition for writ of certiorari in February 1979, and a date for execution was set.

Two years and four occasions for review had transpired. At this point, the Federal habeas corpus process went into gear and the State court's system was ultimately reversed by the fifth circuit. More than 5 years after indictment, the U.S. Supreme Court granted a petition for certiorari and heard oral arguments. The Supreme Court reversed the decision of the fifth circuit.

On April 21, 1983, a third writ of habeas corpus was filed. The following day, April 22, 1983, 6 years after Evans had pled and been found guilty, the sentence was implemented.

I realize that the review of a capital offense conviction must involve a careful scrutiny based on the principles of procedure, due process, fundamental fairness, equal protection, and other specific constitutional safeguards. State judges, no less than Federal judges, must uphold these principles as their obligation under article VI of the Constitution.

I, too believe it is time we reviewed the overextended use of the writ of habeas corpus. I urge my colleagues to carefully consider the legislation which is before the Senate today.●

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wish to take this opportunity to commend the able Senator from Georgia for the splendid statement he has made on this question. This is a vital subject and we are very pleased that the Senator has taken such an active part in this matter.

AMENDMENT NO 2699

(Purpose: To retain full Federal court review of constitutional issues raised by State prisoners)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS) proposes an amendment numbered 2699.

On page 5, line 12, strike out beginning with "by redesignating" through "ed" on line 14.

On page 5, line 25, after the semicolon add "and".

On page 6, lines 1 and 2, strike out "redesignating subsection '(d)' as subsection '(e)', and amending it" and insert in lieu thereof "amending subsection (d)".

On page 6, line 3, strike out "(e)" and insert in lieu thereof "(d)".

On page 6, line 9, strike out "; and" and insert in lieu thereof a period.

On page 6, strike out line 10 through line 15.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. BAUCUS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I renew my call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I thank the Chair and thank the Members of the Senate who supported my request for the yeas and nays.

This is a very simple amendment that I have offered, Mr. President. Its intent is to provide a balanced approach to the problem we have at hand. The Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Georgia, and the Senator from Florida were all very accurate, I think, when they pointed out some of the problems we face in our criminal justice system—namely, the need for more finality, the need for more certainty, and the need to reduce what I think most Americans regard as unnecessary, frivolous, and unfair burdens that all too often occur in our criminal justice system.

My amendment is designed to address those problems without going too far—that is, without throwing the baby out with the bathwater, without going overboard, without letting the pendulum swing so far that we are probably going to be causing more problems than we are solving.

Mr. President, my amendment is very simple. It would delete section 5(c) from S. 1763. That is all—just section 5(c). It would not delete other important provisions of the bill which, I think, fairly and properly limit the availability of Federal habeas corpus relief.

Section 5(c)—that is the only section which I seek to delete—is the provision which would preclude Federal judges from granting habeas corpus relief to State prisoners on the basis of legal and constitutional claims that have been fully and fairly adjudicated at the State level. By deleting this section from the bill, my amendment would leave the law on this issue as it now exists. That is, State prisoners would continue to be entitled to a full and independent review of their Federal claims in Federal courts. The effect, therefore, is only to delete that portion.

Other major provisions of the bill, including the statute of limitations of 1 year to State prisoners and 2 years to Federal prisoners as now contained in the bill, will still remain if my amendment passes. The statute of limitations is a very crucial part of the bill, and I wholeheartedly agree with the proponents of S. 1763 that there should be a statute of limitations. My amendment leaves that reform completely intact, because, in my view, it is a cornerstone of this bill.

Mr. President, I fully understand that our habeas corpus statutes are in need of serious and meaningful reform. In both 1982 and 1983, over 8,000 petitions were filed by State prisoners in Federal district courts challenging the legality of their imprisonment. Thousands more were filed by Federal prisoners. Many were repetitious. Many were frivolous. And many alleged errors in convictions that had occurred years in the past.

There is no doubt that we in Congress need to take immediate action to curb these abuses of our habeas system—action that will serve to promote the finality of criminal judgments at both the Federal level and the State level.

Some such action is attempted in the bill before us today. The provision allowing the dismissal of frivolous claims from State prisoners even if State remedies have not been exhausted will alleviate the problem of needless and duplicative adjudication of those issues. And the provision imposing a statute of limitations, as I have already mentioned, will serve to put an end to what is now a seemingly endless routine to recurrent prisoner appeals.

But in my opinion, precluding Federal courts from reviewing Federal claims from State prisoners is neither a necessary nor an advisable reform in our habeas corpus law. It is not necessary because full Federal review of these claims does not actually cause a problem in our existing system. And it is not advisable because it would remove from our laws a provision that in the past has served to protect and vindicate constitutional rights.

The alleged reason for section 5(c) is that our statutes now allow unwarranted intervention by Federal courts into State proceedings and adjudications and that they actually invite Federal courts to substitute their judgments for those made by State courts. History, however, does not support that argument.

Federal courts working under the current statutes do in fact defer to State adjudications on Federal and constitutional issues. In the vast majority of cases, they make reference to and rely upon the State's evaluation of prisoner claims. Of the thousands of State prisoner petitions filed every year, fewer than 3 percent result in a reversal of a State court determination or a granting of Federal habeas relief. In my view, if something is not broken, it should not be fixed. And in my view, the law on Federal review of Federal claims is not broken.

Proponents of section 5(c) also argue that, even if Federal courts do not overturn State decisions, the statutes now require them to spend an inordinate amount of time relitigating issues that have already been adequately addressed in the State courts. It is argued that deference to full and fair State adjudications will lessen this burden. Again, however, I do not believe the practical realities of Federal habeas litigation support that argument.

Federal judges do not begin blind in their review of constitutional issues raised by State prisoners. They have the benefit of the briefs filed in State courts and the opinions and orders rendered by State judges. They rely heavily on these prior adjudications, and for the most part, do little more than reaffirm the earlier State court judgments.

Furthermore—and this is critical—I do not see how the creation of a new standard of review as contained in section 5(c)—full and fair adjudication—will significantly reduce the workload of the Federal courts. Even under the new standard, judges will be required to review and assess the merits of State decisions to determine whether they are fair or reasonable. Section 5(c) might change the focus of Federal review, but it will not change the fact that a substantive review has to occur and probably will still take just as much time.

As I have said, I do not believe section 5(c) is a necessary reform of the habeas laws, and I do not believe it will actually constitute an improvement over current law. But beyond these practical objections, I also firmly believe that the existing law on this issue should remain as it is. In my view, the ultimate responsibility for the interpretation and application of Federal law should remain in the Federal courts.

Traditionally, State courts are viewed as the final arbiters of issues of State law. Federal courts, on the other hand, have the ultimate and supreme responsibility for resolving and interpreting issues of Federal and constitutional law. I do not believe there are compelling reasons to deviate from accepted principles of federalism and to upset the historic balance of judicial responsibility by requiring Federal courts to defer to State decisions on Federal matters.

Mr. President, I do not mean by these remarks to demean the competence or integrity of State courts and State judges. A great amount of respect and deference should be accorded to their judgments and their legal interpretations.

However, Federal courts enjoy a degree of independence and insulation from local passions and prejudices that may not be available to State courts. Federal judges have lifetime appointments to office, while State judges are most often elected and are therefore logically more susceptible to public pressure and public opinion. The pressure to keep convicted criminals in prison, regardless of whether their rights may have been violated, can be vehement and sometimes overwhelming.

I have no doubt that in the vast majority of cases, State courts can and do adequately protect the constitutional rights of State prisoners. However, there are also rare instances in which their decisions are misguided or influenced by external factors. Because of those rare instances, I would prefer to leave in place the added safeguard of full and independent Federal review.

Mr. President, let me briefly summarize. We all know that there is a groundswell of public opinion to put criminals in jail and stop crime. Indeed, we in the Senate have just passed a criminal reform bill.

That bill contains substantial sentencing reforms that basically provide for fixed and determinate sentences, and cut back on the availability of parole. Those reforms indicate how we in Congress can shoulder the responsibility for fighting crime and for promoting finality in the criminal justice system. Likewise, the sections of the bill now before us on precedural default and statutes of limitations constitute legitimate methods of achieving finality.

Mr. President, this bill tends to go too far.

In essence, it eliminates the right of Federal habeas where there has been a hearing in the State courts. Federal courts will no longer be the final arbiters of Federal constitutional issues in criminal cases. These issues will now basically be left to the States. And if their adjudications can be deemed "reasonable," there will be no further recourse available to State prisoners at all.

Section 5(c) simply goes too far, and I urge you all to accept my amendment.

Mr. BIDEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BOSCHWITZ). The Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I support the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

I must say, quite bluntly, that even if this amendment is adopted, I have some additional concerns about the bill. There are many legitimate criticisms of the present situation and practice. But the procedural constraints that are imposed by the bill at this point unduly restrict what should be a right and an avenue that should remain open.

The second major problem with this bill is with relation to the statute of limitations. I believe the proposed limitations raise serious constitutional questions, in light of the article I prohibition against suspension of the writ of habeas corpus.

The law now permits a court to dismiss a habeas petition if the State has been prejudiced in its ability to respond because of delay, and no evidence has been presented that this provision is insufficient to protect the State's interests. Therefore, even with the adoption of this amendment—and I hope it is adopted—we will still have problems.

Moreover, the 1-year and 2-year statute of limitation provisions are unreasonable and impractical. First, there is no escape clause with respect to manifest injustice; and second, these provisions do not comply with the Supreme Court's suggestion in Rose against Lundy, that all claims be filed in one petition. I believe that the time limits should be extended, at least as regards the 1-year limit, and an exception should be made for cases of "manifest injustice."

Quite frankly, if we cannot adopt what I think is a modest attempt to clean up this bill, as being proposed by the Senator from Montana, I doubt very much whether we will be able to amend it in any other way, so I will not belabor the Senate with additional amendments if this amendment is not adopted.

Mr. President, I am told that another Senator who wishes to speak in behalf of Senator BAUCUS' amendment is on his way to the floor. Since I do not have any more to say at this time, and I see no one seeking recognition, I suggest the absence of a quorum, until he arrives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in strong opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana (Mr. BAUCUS) to delete section 5(c) from the pending measure. This opposition is shared by the full Committee on the Judiciary and by the Department of Justice.

The proposed amendment would eliminate from S. 1763 the prohibition on Federal courts granting relief to State prisoners pursuant to habeas corpus petitions based upon claims fully and fairly adjudicated in State court proceedings. The result of the proposed amendment would be to require Federal courts to undertake a full de novo review of the legal (and many of the factual) issues presented to them by habeas petitions. This would effectively undermine one of the most important achievements of the present legislation.

The advantages of the policy established by section 5(c) are twofold. First, it would substantially reduce the intrusive interference by Federal courts in the State criminal justice system occasioned over the past two decades by the habeas process. Increasingly, habeas petitions have been employed by those in State custody for the purposes of collateral attack upon convictions fully and fairly secured in State courts. Upon exhaustion of their avenues of State appeals, such individuals have routinely turned to the Federal court system in order to pursue additional appellate opportunities and to repeatedly relitigate already litigated issues. The unfortunate result of this practice today is a criminal justice system that is more congested than necessary, more wasteful of scarce judicial resources than necessary, and more characterized by delays in the administration of justice than necessary. Most importantly, such abuse of the habeas process has resulted in a system of criminal justice widely scorned as arbitrary and unjust. Section 5(c) would help in restoring a measure of commonsense to this system.

The second principal advantage of the policy set forth in section 5(c) is that it would reduce the exorbitant amount of time that Federal courts must devote to the review of habeas petitions from prisoners, the overwhelming number of which are frivolous and without serious legal basis. The sheer quantity of such petitions has grown exponentially over the past two decades and has contributed to an increasingly paralyzed system of criminal justice in this country. Section 5(c) would help in restoring a more efficient system of criminal justice in this country.

The distinguished Senator from Montana raises several points that require brief response. He argues that section 5(c) will have no significant impact upon levels of judicial workload because reviewing courts will still have to determine whether a habeas petition contained claims that had been fully and fairly litigated. This argument is ironic in view of his alternative concern that State prisoners will be denied important opportunities for review of their conviction. In fact, I believe that section 5(c) establishes an appropriate balance in the habeas procedure: State prisoners will continue to be afforded the opportunity to employ the habeas process for what amounts to a final judicial appeal, but it will be a more limited appeal in which the reviewing Federal court is not required to substitute its judgment for that of the trial court. Rather than having to freshly consider each matter raised in the context of the habeas petition, the Federal court would simply be required to determine that the State court acted reasonably in rendering its decision. Instead of overturning reasonable decisions on the basis of finely cut or unsettled questions of law, and setting in motion new criminal trials, the reviewing court would be obligated to resolve such questions in favor of the State courts. The full and fair standard is not only a standard of review far more conducive to expedited judicial review but would apply to both issues of law and fact, this eliminating many difficult and drawn-out determinations by the reviewing court.

The Senator from Montana also argues that the proposed reform is inconsistent with federalism since Federal courts are the ultimate arbiters of Federal and constitutional law. The U.S. Supreme Court is indeed the ultimate arbiter of such law and nothing in S. 1763 would affect that responsibility. The Senator is wrong, however, in his implication that constitutional law questions are any more in the province of the lower Federal courts than in the State courts. The U.S. Constitution is the supreme law of the land and must be faithfully applied by State courts just as it must be faithfully applied by Federal courts. In matters of consitutional interpretation, the State courts have an equal and concurrent responsibility with the lower Federal courts. State courts have, without interruption, routinely addressed constitutional issues involved in State criminal prosecutions from the outset of our Nation's history. In any event, S. 1763 would maintain the ability of the Federal judiciary to overturn a State criminal conviction on the basis of clearly erroneous applications of constitutional law.

Finally, Mr. President, the Senator from Montana argues that the present system of habeas corpus does not unduly interfere with State court judgments since only 3 percent of such petitions result in a reversal of a State court decision. Given the fact that the petitioner must already have exhausted, at minimum, two levels of appeal, I am not sure that I would agree that a 3-percent reversal rate is totally insignificant. Be that as it may, the fact remains that in 100 percent of such cases the considered decisions of State courts are in jeopardy on the basis of nothing more than fine disagreements on technical questions unrelated to the basic issue of whether the petitioner was accorded a fair trial consistent with well-understood concepts of due process. In each of these cases, the reviewing court must redetermine every claim properly presented and second-guess every decision made by the State courts. The intrusiveness of the process is not diminished by the fact that the great majority of the petitions are rejected summarily. These statistics are misleading in any event because of the sheer volume of habeas petitions, often filed by a disproportionately small number of prisoners, which are so blatantly frivolous as to constitute an abuse of the legal process generally.

Mr. President, I strongly urge my colleagues to reject the proposed amendment by the Senator from Montana and let this Nation take one important step in the direction of restoring a rational and just system of criminal law to this country and thereby restoring the respect of the American people. If this body is genuinely serious about criminal justice reform, it will reject the pending amendment.

Mr. President, the Justice Department has written me a letter opposing this amendment that I wish to present to the Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Department has been advised that an amendment will be proposed to delete section 5(c) of S. 1763, a provision that would accord deference in habeas corpus proceedings to the result of full and fair state adjudications of federal claims. As you know, section 5(c) would basically establish a standard of reasonableness for habeas corpus review of state court determinations. Compliance with certain other conditions by the state courts, including due process, would also be required.[1]

The Judiciary Committee wisely rejected the same proposal to delete section 5(c) during its consideration of the bill. We believe that the proposed change in the standard of review is one of the most important features of the bill. It would be most regrettable if the full Senate failed to adopt this salutary reform.

The most extreme inaccuracies in the statement supporting the proposed amendment must be addressed. The statement represents that section 5(c) is "inconsistent with the basic concepts of federalism" and that it threatens to "upset the historic balance of judicial responsibility in this country." Both these assertions are simply false.

The bill has no effect at all on the Supreme Court's independent determination of federal questions in direct review of state judgments, and it in no way diminishes the obligation of any court to comply with Supreme Court precedent. It only affects habeas corpus review of state judgments by the lower federal courts.

Historically, de novo determination of federal questions in habeas corpus review is a recent innovation; it is the result of decisions made within the past thirty years.[2] Prior to that time, the Supreme Court clearly held that matters that had been fully and fairly adjudicated in state proceedings could not be re-examined by the lower federal courts.[3]

Considerations of federalism do not weigh against the proposed reform; they strongly support it. Justice Powell, for example, has stated:

[T]he present scope of habeas corpus tends to undermine the value inherent in our federal system of government. To the extent that every state criminal judgment is to be subject indefinitely to broad and repetitious federal oversight, we render the actions of state courts a serious disrespect in derogation of the constitutional balance between the two systems.[4]

Similarly, Justice O'Connor, speaking for the Supreme Court in the case of Engle v. Isaac, has stated:

[H]abeas corpus * * * imposes special costs on our federal system. The States possess primary authority for defining and enforcing the criminal law. In criminal trials they also hold the initial responsibility for vindicating constitutional rights. Federal intrusions into state criminal trials frustrate both the State's sovereign power to punish offenders and their good-faith attempts to honor constitutional rights.[5]

The case for adopting this reform as a means of improving the efficiency of habeas corpus litigation is equally clear. Currently, judgmental differences on close or unsettled questions in the interpretation and application of federal law can result—and do result—in extensive litigation at both the district court and circuit court levels in habeas corpus proceedings.[6] Some authorization exists for deferring to the state courts on purely factual matters, but the standards for such deference are complex and obscure,[7] and their limitations can readily be circumvented by characterizing a state determination as a mixed question of law and fact.[8] The standard of reasonableness proposed in section 5(c), by contrast, would apply to both legal and factual conclusions; it should provide a quick and easy resolution of the vast majority of issues that arise in habeas corpus litigation.

In sum, the case for the reform proposed in section 5(c) of S. 1763 is clear, both as a means of furthering the principles of federalism and as a response to the existing burdens of habeas corpus litigation. The Department of Justice strongly urges the Senate to reject the ill-advised proposal to delete this important measure from the pending legislation.

Sincerely,

ROBERT A. MCCONNELL,
Assistant Attorney General,
Office of Legislative Affairs.

Mr. President, again, I want to say that I cannot imagine a measure coming before the Senate in this session which means more to relieving the congestion of the courts and which means more to promoting justice in our judicial system than the passage of this particular bill. If I had to choose between all of the provisions that have been included in the crime package or in these other bills, it would be very difficult to put any other provision above this one.

Mr. President, the administration opposes this amendment. The Justice Department opposes this amendment. The Judiciary Committee opposes this amendment. The National Association of Attorneys General opposes this amendment. I hope the Senate will see fit to defeat this amendment so that the bill can pass as brought out by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. President, if there is no other discussion on this amendment, I believe the yeas and nays have been called for.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I wish to respond to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana. The same amendment was proposed by the Senator during the Judiciary Committee's consideration of this bill. It was fully considered and rejected by a majority of the committee.

Let me begin by noting what proposed section 5(c) does not do. It in no way affects the status of the Federal judiciary as the final arbiter of Federal law. Neither section 5(c) nor any other provision of the bill has any effect at all on direct review of State judgments by the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court would be in no way limited in its independent determination of Federal law; all low courts—both State and Federal—would remain fully bound by the Supreme Court's decisions.

Rather, section 5(c) is limited to changing the standard for habeas corpus review of State criminal judgments by the Federal district courts. Even under current law, the lower Federal courts engaged in such review do not make fully independent determinations of Federal claims that have already been decided by the State courts. The factfinding of the State courts in deciding such claims is presumed to be correct under standards set out in section 2254(d) of the Judicial Code. Also, under the decision of the Supreme Court in Stone against Powell in 1976, the lower Federal courts in habeas corpus cases cannot reexamine State court decisions interpreting and applying the fourth amendment to the Constitution, so long as an opportunity for full and fair litigation was provided in the State courts.

In positive terms, section 5(c) would replace the confused and obscure rules that currently govern deference to State determinations in habeas corpus proceedings with a simple and consistent standard that would apply to both factual and legal determinations. The interpretation of the proposed "full and fair" standard has been clearly and consistently set out in the bill's legislative history. The principal requirements are that the State determination be reasonable and that it be arrived at by procedures consistent with due process.

Thus, the complex standards of section 2254(d) of the Judicial Code that now govern deference to State factfinding would be replaced by a simple inquiry as to whether the State court's factual conclusions were reasonable in light of the evidence presented to it. The adequacy of the State court's interpretation and application of Federal law would be judged under the same standard. The State court's determination would have to reflect a reasonable reading and application of Supreme Court precedent. As the committee's report on the bill explains, the State courts could rely on the decisions of the Federal courts of appeals in deciding issues that the Supreme Court has not resolved.[1] Such a reform would clearly not diminish the role of the Federal courts in the interpretation and exposition of Federal law.

Given the requirement of reasonableness and the other requirements of the "full and fair" standard, I see little force in the gentleman's concern over protection of the rights of State prisoners. If a State court acted in defiance or disregard of controlling Federal precedent as a result of political or public pressures, or for any other reason, the standard would not be satisfied and Federal relief would be available.

In closing, I wish to draw attention to the remarks of Justice Sandra O'Connor on this question:

If our nation's bifurcated judicial system is to be retained, as I am sure it will be, it is clear that we should strive to make both the federal and the state systems strong, independent, and viable. State courts will undoubtedly continue in the future to litigate federal constitutional questions. State judges in assuming office take an oath to support the federal as well as the state constitution. State judges do in fact rise to the occasion when given the responsibility and opportunity to do so. It is a step in the right direction to defer to the state courts and give finality to their judgments on federal constitutional questions where a full and fair adjudication has been given in the state court.

I fully agree that it is unseemly to reduce the judges of the highest courts of the States to the status of factfinding commissioners whose factual conclusions may be accepted if a complex set of conditions are satisfied (28 U.S.C. 2254(d)), but whose decisions on questions of law can be overridden in habeas corpus proceedings no matter how reasonable, judicious, and persuasively argued they may be. The reform proposed in section 5(c) of this bill would correct this affront to the dignity of the State judiciaries without impairing the protection of Federal rights.

[1] S. Rept. No. 226, 98th Cong., 1st sess. 26 and n. 106.

I wish to add some observations of my own concerning the suggestion that additional litigation would result from replacing the complex rules that now govern deference to State determinations with the simple standard proposed in section 5(c) of this bill.

This suggestion is contradicted both by historical experience and by contemporary experience with similar standards. The current standards of review in habeas corpus proceedings derive from the decision of Brown against Allen in 1953 and the decision of Townsend against Sain in 1963. These decisions involved an unexplained departure from preexisting standards whose formulation was essentially the same as that proposed in section 5(c) of S. 1763. In ex parte Hawk in 1944, for example, the Supreme Court stated:

> Where the state courts have considered and adjudicated the merits of . . . [a petitioner's] . . . contentions . . . a federal court will not ordinarily reexamine upon writ of habeas corpus the questions thus adjudicated. . . . But where resort to state court remedies has failed to afford a full and fair adjudication of the federal contentions raised, either because the state affords no remedy . . . or because in the particular case the remedy afforded by state law proves in practice unavailable or seriously inadequate . . . a federal court should entertain his petition for habeas corpus, else he would be remediless. (Italic added.)

The record of cases from that period does not show that the interpretation or application of this standard gave rise to extensive litigation or otherwise burdened the courts. In fact, the great increase in the volume and complexity of habeas corpus litigation followed the expansion of the scope of review by Brown against Allen and Townsend against Sain.

As the gentleman from Montana has noted, the proposed "full and fair" standard for habeas corpus review is essentially a standard of reasonableness. This is comparable to the current standard of review for State executive action in "civil rights suits" under title 42, United States Code, section 1983. State executive officials have a "good faith" defense in section 1983 suits under which no liability results if the official reasonably believed that his actions were lawful. Thus, the disposition in such cases does not depend on a determination that the State official was correct in his view of Federal law; it depends on whether his view of Federal law and its implications under the circumstances was reasonable.

At bottom, I think, the question is one of commonsense. Serious errors of Federal law in criminal cases that have been reviewed and affirmed by State appellate courts are hardly common. If differences between Federal and State courts do arise in habeas corpus proceedings, they are likely to relate to close questions in the application of Federal law or unsettled questions in its interpretation. A Federal habeas court now has no authority to accept a State court's conclusions on such questions, even though the Federal court may recognize that the State determination is reasonable and that it is consistent with the views of other Federal courts. Overturning a State criminal judgment should depend on a determination by the Federal court that something more serious was amiss in the State proceedings than a mere difference of opinion regarding a matter on which judges may reasonably disagree. In essence, section 5(c) requires no more than that.

Finally, on the workload question, I find it plausible that the proposed reform would reduce the difficulty of habeas corpus litigation. Independently whether a State court's decision of a close or judgmental question was "correct" in some abstract or ideal sense may be difficult and time consuming. Whether the State determination was reasonable, however, would rarely be a real issue.

Mr. BAUCUS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am not going to take too much time here. I think the issues have been fairly well raised and have been joined, discussed, argued, and debated.

But let me make a couple of quick points. The Senator from South Carolina, the chairman of the committee, very forcefully defends the full bill and very forcefully objects to any amendments whatsoever to the pending bill. He makes essentially two arguments: One is that the courts are clogged and that the bill before us will unclog them.

Mr. President, under present law, whenever a defendant petitions a Federal court for Federal habeas corpus, the Federal judge must grant a de novo review of the claims by the prisoner. That means that the Federal court has to de novo, from the beginning, start over again and look to see whether or not the claims by the prisoner are true or not true.

But, Mr. President, the judge is not required to ignore completely the earlier State proceedings. He or she can look at earlier briefs and decisions and very quickly reach a decision whether or not the petition filed by that prisoner is meritorious or frivolous. The fact of the matter is in most cases the State will merely respond that the petition is frivolous; and in the vast majority of the cases, 90 percent of the cases, the Federal judge will agree.

Under this bill, if my amendment does not pass, those State courts are going to have to take the same amount of time to determine whether or not there was a full and fair airing below in the State court as to whether or not the prisoner's Federal constitutional claims were actually violated. That is going to take some time.

What is that judge supposed to do? He is supposed to look at the pleadings, look at the record below, to see whether or not there has been a full and fair review. That is going to take the Federal court just as much time as under present law. So to suggest this bill before us is going to unclog the courts, Mr. President, is just plain not true.

What is the other argument raised today in objection to my amendment? Very simply, it is that, "Well State courts determine Federal constitutional issues just as well as do Federal courts. We do not have to worry about this argument that Federal courts should remain the final arbiters of Federal constitutional issues."

Well, the fact of the matter is, Mr. President, if the amendment I am offering is not adopted, then the only time that a State prisoner will, as a practical matter, have any opportunity to have his Federal claims vindicated is if, after the State proceedings are terminated, he files a writ of certiorari before the U.S. Supreme Court. We all know the Supreme Court today is already so clogged, its docket so full, that in the vast majority of the cases the Supreme Court does not grant these writs of certiorari. That means, as a practical matter, that the State prisoner will not be able to have any full hearing of his claim before any Federal tribunal.

Mr. President, my amendment is the middle position here. The proponents of the bill want to virtually obliterate Federal habeas corpus as it is known today. There are other Senators on the floor here today who oppose this bill down the line, who, by and large, do not favor any of the provisions of this bill.

My amendment is the middle position. My amendment would keep the statute of limitations, and the other provisions restricting Federal habeas corpus. But it also says: "Let's not go too far; let's be moderate and reasonable about this." I, therefore, suggest, as a moderate, reasonable, and balanced position, that this bill with the amendment that I am offering is the way which this Senate should proceed. In my view it should be the law of the land with respect to Federal habeas corpus.

With that, Mr. President, I urge Members to think and reflect a little bit. It is my humble thought that if we do so, the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I support the Baucus amendment to strike section 5(c) of this bill. One of the objections to that section of the bill is that it will severely restrict the right of persons who have been sentenced to death under State law to apply for a writ of habeas corpus, thereby increasing the risk of error in capital cases.

Under section 5(c) of Senate bill S. 1763, application for a writ of habeas corpus could not be granted "with respect to any claim that has been fully and fairly adjudicated in State proceedings."

The statute itself does not define explicitly the meaning of "fully and fairly adjudicated."

The committee's attempt to provide a definition in its report does not provide assurance that the constitutional rights of those who have been sentenced to death will be protected. The committee report on S. 1763 does make some effort at a definition of "fully and fairly adjudicated," but it is an inadequate one. It states that a State adjudication "would not be full and fair in the intended sentence if the determination arrived at did not meet a minimum standard of reasonableness."

But the standard of reasonableness is very vague. It is not defined. There is nothing in the statute helping us to define it. The committee report does not tell us how we would define, and how a Federal court would define, reasonableness in order to determine whether a State court adjudication of a constitutional issue has been full and fair.

Mr. President, there is another basic problem, of course, and that is that this is an effort to exclude Federal courts from correcting constitutional errors or errors in the interpretation of Federal law, because even though a State court might be reasonable in its interpretation, it also could be dead wrong in its interpretation of the Constitution or its interpretation of Federal law. And if it is wrong, we cannot let those rights be abdicated or violated.

This is particularly true, of course, where we are now once again executing people, inflicting capital punishment upon people, and it would be absolutely unthinkable that this could be permitted where they have been denied their constitutional rights and access to Federal habeas corpus.

Last year, the Supreme Court in the case of Barefoot against Estelle established procedural guidelines for handling applications for stays of execution on habeas corpus appeals. The Supreme Court emphasized the importance of providing a Federal forum. The Court said:

> It is a matter of public record that an increasing number of death-sentenced petitioners are entering the appellate stages of the Federal habeas corpus process. The fair and efficient consideration of these appeals requires proper procedures for the handling of applications for stays of executions, and demands procedures that allow a decision on the merits of an appeal accompanying the denial of a stay.

The Supreme Court's opinion in Barefoot is pertinent to the debate on the Baucus amendment for two reasons: First, it clearly demonstrates that the Federal judiciary can and does limit access by State prisoners to Federal courts in ways which balance the important interests at stake; second, the opinion emphasizes the importance of providing captial defendants with an opportunity to have their writs of habeas corpus reviewed on the merits in Federal courts.

Mr. President, the significance of providing a Federal forum for claims of constitutional violations made by persons whose lives are at stake cannot be overemphasized.

In Woodson against North Carolina, Justices Stewart, Powell, and Stevens stated that:

> The penalty of death is qualitatively different from a sentance of imprisonment, however long. Death, in its finality, differs more from life imprisonment than a hundred-year prison term differs from one of only a year or two.

In Lockett against Ohio, Chief Justice Burger stated:

> We are satisfied that this qualitative difference between death and other penalties calls for a greater degree of reliability when the death sentence is imposed, in ruling unconstitutional an Ohio death penalty statute which precluded the sentencers from considering any mitigating circumstance of the offense that the defendant proffered.

In addition to the qualitative difference between capital cases and other cases, statistics on the number of capital cases where petitioners have been successful in proving that the State courts' rulings on serious constitutional questions were wrong, reveal that error, as a matter of fact, is the norm in those cases. In an amicus curiae brief in the Barefoot case, the NAACP legal defense and education fund stated the following statistics:

> Since 1976, the Federal Courts of Appeals nationally have decided 41 capital cases on the merits. According to our records, 30, or 73.2 percent of these have been decided in favor of the death-sentenced individuals. In the Fifth Circuit, 27 capital cases have been decided on the merits during this period. Of the 27, 21, or 77.7 percent, have been decided in favor of the death-sentenced individual. Even looking solely at cases in which the death-sentenced habeas corpus petitioner was appellant, the ratio of rulings in the petitioner's favor has been extremely high: of 21 such capital appeals decided by the Fifth Circuit since 1976, 15, or 71.4 percent, were decided favorably to the death-sentenced individual, although one was later reversed by this court and another is presently pending on a grant of certiorari.

These very compelling statistics show the critical importance of habeas corpus being available in Federal courts to correct errors in capital cases committed in State courts.

Mr. President, when the Senate turns to consideration of Senate bill 1765, a bill to reinstitute the death penalty at the Federal level, I will be discussing many cases that I have researched in which an innocent person was convicted of a capital offense and was later found to be innocent.

As these cases will demonstrate, it very often takes years before the defendant is freed, innocent of having committed a crime. The convictions of these people are often the result of procedures at the State level which violate constitutional rights, such as a faulty identification of an innocent person as the perpetrator which is the result of unlawful suggestion by the police.

In other cases, newly discovered evidence has led to the release of an innocent person. The lengthy appeals process in capital cases has provided the opportunity for many of these errors to be detected and corrected before it is too late. Time is very often what is needed and time is provided because persons convicted of capital crimes normally have two separate channels of appeal—one in the State courts and one in the Federal courts through the writ of habeas corpus after their State claims have been exhausted.

We cannot hope to achieve a criminal justice system which is devoid of error, nor can we decrease our efforts to vigorously prosecute those which violate our country's criminal laws because of the risk of error, but we can provide every possible procedural safeguard for those who have been sentenced to die, certainly, and one of these safeguards has clearly been the right to have writs of habeas corpus considered by the Federal courts.

Mr. President, while I recognize that the committee's report on S. 1763 makes an attempt to provide such protection, it simply is not adequate and does not go far enough. I hope that the Senate will adopt the Baucus amendment to delete section 5(c) of the bill and protect the safeguard which has been in our laws for as long as this Senator can remember and which I know has protected people in the exercise of their constitutional rights and, indeed, has saved people from an otherwise wrongful execution.

Mr. CHILES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I think we are ready to vote on this amendment and I do not want to delay that, but I did listen to the argument of the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

I know that he always approaches these questions with great concern.

Let me say to my distinguished colleague from Michigan, the term "reasonable" concerns me the other way. He worries about not defining the term, what that does to the Federal court's jurisdiction. My feeling is that under the term "reasonable" the Federal court can do anything that it wants to do. Certainly, we may be right back to where this amendment is not necessary because the Federal courts are going to say they are going to continue to do things just the way they have done them before.

I think what we do allow by the term is that we allow the Federal courts to say if they feel all of the State's process was reasonable and everything has taken place. You do not have to automatically go in and retry all of these facts. I have heard from many Federal district judges who say right now, they have no alternative. When the writ is filed, regardless of how frivolous they think the writ is and regardless of to what extent due process was afforded in the State courts. I do not think we can say that all of our State courts are kangaroo courts by any manner of means. In my State, we have a very strong court system. The States spend a lot of time in trying to pay adequate compensation and other things to judges to see that we have a good system.

I think what this says to a Federal court is if, in their opinion—and the word "reasonable" gives them all that latitude—if they think the State court has had a good process, they do not have to go through all of these steps again. To me, that has some merit. I would like to narrow the term. That is where I would differ some with my distinguished colleague.

A few years back, we never thought of the fact that you could retry everything in the Federal courts that had been tried in the State courts without clearly showing that there was some constitutional question or error of law or something. Now, the process has been built up through court decisions on the writ of habeas corpus—and I think it is because Congress has failed to act and has allowed this to happen by default. That is why the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court said we had to afford some relief. That is way many other members of the U.S. court and the Justices have said Congress needs to afford some relief. That is why the State Associations of Attorneys General have said they need to have some relief. That is why the district judges have said that.

I think the term "reasonable" is certainly not being defined. It does not take away any power from that Federal judge. In effect, it gives him tremendous power as to whether he wants, under that clause, to require the whole matter to be readjudicated.

Mr. LEVIN. If my friend from Florida will yield, I hope he is right, if we ever did adopt this kind of change in habeas corpus, that Federal courts would define that word to give them all the flexibility they need to do justice. I am very much afraid, though, that you can be reasonable and wrong.

That is the basic problem: What happens when a court is reasonable but it errs? According to the statistics, which I think are undisputed, in three-quarters of the cases which have been adjudicated, habeas corpus cases at the Federal level, Federal courts of appeal have decided in three-quarters of the capital cases they were in error. This applies to capital cases, and that is what we are talking about. Three-quarters of the cases adjudicated on the merits in capital cases, they have found in error.

If a court decides that a State court was reasonable but was wrong, we are going to find people being executed although their constitutional rights were violated. I hope my friend from Florida is right—I think he very well may be—that Federal courts are going to work that word "reasonable," the way they now work the habeas corpus process. I hope he is right. I know he hopes he is wrong on this, but I hope he is right. I think my fears will turn out to be very well justified.

I hope we do not pass this bill, because I do not think we should be writing laws that are that vague that affect constitutional rights. We should not be putting in words that are this vague, this unclear, this undefined, sticking in a word "reasonable" and hoping that somehow or other, we are going to make progress in this area.

Mr. BAUCUS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEVIN. Yes, I am happy to yield, though I do not have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. There is one point the Senator from Florida raises and I would like to discuss the point with him. The Senator from Florida is rightly very concerned about the lack of finality in all kinds of cases where convicted prisoners apply to Federal courts and make a mockery of the system. To the degree that that is an accurate description of reality, I share the concern of the Senator from Florida. I think every Member of this body shares that concern. I am going to ask the Senator from Florida, though, the degree to which he actually does believe that under present law, whenever a State prisoner files a petition for Federal habeas corpus in a Federal district court, the judge must give a full blown hearing on the allegations made by the prisoner, thereby taking up the Federal judge's time.

I ask that question because it is my very firm understanding that in almost every case today, when a State prisoner files a petition for Federal habeas corpus, that allegation never gets to a hearing in a Federal court. I say that because that is my experience, at least in the State of Montana. There may be other States that are different.

Here is what happens in almost every Federal habeas case. A State prisoner files a petition before a Federal judge alledging that his Federal constitutional rights were not maintained in the State court proceeding. In almost every case, the judge looks at the pleadings, looks at the petitions, and in almost every case, grants the State's motion to dismiss. It is a very rare case where, under the right of a de nova proceeding, there is a full-blown, a new trial again of a case.

Mr. CHILES. If I might just quickly answer the question, I will try not to prolong this debate. I say to my good friend from Montana that the Federal district courts may do differently in Montana. I have been told by a number of the Federal district court judges in my State what their feeling under the existing law is. If the petition is filed, unless there is some clear showing on the fact of the petition itself that would help them in disposing of it on the basis of being frivolous, if it alleges data that support it, their feeling is that they would have to hold at least preliminary hearings on it and could not dismiss it on its face. They have told me how much of their time is taken up on the basis of these writs being filed and refiled and refiled. That is part of the reason we have been talking about this over the years and why we needed this.

Mr. BAUCUS. I appreciate what the Senator is saying. I would like to make one final point. The chief justice of the Montana Supreme Court favors my amendment. He thinks it is wrong for Congress to limit the right the Federal habeas corpus to the degree that this bill would. I hope that his position and mine prevail here today.

Mr. BAKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in a moment I intend to make a motion to table on which I anticipate a rollcall vote, but before I do that may I say I fully expect there will be at least one more vote, maybe two more votes, this afternoon. I am advised by the distinguished managers of the bill that there will be a requirement for a rollcall on final passage. I do not believe we know of any other amendments except this one. Then there will perhaps be another vote on another bill following on after this. So Senators should not assume that this is the only vote today. I expect at least one and perhaps two more votes.

Mr. President, unless somebody else is seeking recognition, I now move to table the amendment and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to table the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. INOUYE (after having voted in the affirmative). On this vote I have a live pair with the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN). If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I withdraw my vote.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. HECHT), the Senator from Iowa (Mr. JEPSEN), the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), and the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), are necessarily.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), would vote "nay".

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) and the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), would each vote "yea."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY), the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. DODD), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. LAUTENBERG), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG), the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES), are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER), is absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), is absent because of illness in the family.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUDMAN). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 59, nays 17, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise today to speak in support of S. 1763, commonly known as the Reform of Federal Intervention in State Proceedings Act. It is designed to reform certain habeas corpus procedures that are currently in effect.

The writ of habeas corpus originated in the common law. Its importance was recognized by our Founding Fathers when they included in our Constitution a provision that "the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in case of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." We know from history and the common law, however, that the habeas corpus proceedings to which the Founding Fathers referred in the Constitution were proceedings that sought an initial judicial determination of the legality of a detention imposed by an executive authority. The Founding Fathers did not have in mind proceedings that sought additional judicial reviews of the legality of a judicially imposed detention.

After the Constitution was ratified, the availability of habeas corpus in the Federal courts was restricted to Federal prisoners, and the common law restrictions on the scope of the writ were generally observed. Unfortunately, however, the common law origins of the writ were gradually eroded during the last hundred years or so through statutory and case law development. During the last 30 years, the writ of habeas corpus has routinely served as a means for the lower Federal courts to review State criminal judgments on the ground of alleged deprivation of Federal rights. It is that appalling situation that S. 1763 is designed to redress.

According to our country's leading legal scholars on Federal procedure, the single most controversial and friction-producing issue in the relationship between the Federal courts and the States is Federal habeas corpus for State prisoners. State courts resent having their decisions reviewed by Federal judges, who in turn are unhappy about the burden of reviewing thousands of mostly frivolous petitions.

Several Supreme Court Justices have strongly criticized the current system of Federal habeas corpus, and have called for basic limitations on its scope and availability. Chief Justice Burger has urged Congress to consider restricting the availability of Federal habeas corpus for State prisoners because, in his view, "the administration of justice in this country is bogged down with lack of finality of judgments in criminal cases." As Justice Powell observed over 10 years ago in his opinion in Schneckloth against Bustamonte:

> The present scope of habeas corpus tends to undermine the values inherent in our federal system of government. To the extent that every state criminal judgment is to be subject indefinitely to broad and repetitious federal oversight, we render the actions of state courts a serious disrespect in derogation of the constitutional balance between the two systems.

It is to that very problem, so eloquently expressed by distinguished Supreme Court jurists, that S. 1763, is addressed.

The bill establishes a standard for reviewing habeas corpus proceedings by according deference to State adjudications that are "full and fair." That would be a vast improvement over the current rules, which provide, through habeas corpus proceedings, for mandatory readjudication, and that frequently result in duplicative relitigation of claims that have already been fairly considered by State trial and appellate courts.

The bill also would resolve the major uncetainties about access to Federal collateral remedies after a failure to raise a claim properly in normal criminal proceedings. It does that by establishing "cause and prejudice" as the exclusive governing standard.

In addition, the bill would establish a 1-year time limit on access to Federal habeas corpus for State prisoners, normally running from the time State remedies are exhausted. For similar purposes, it would prescribe a 2-year time limit on applications for collateral relief by Federal prisoners normally running from finality of judgment.

The bill also addresses two technical issues that need to be remedied. First, it would make it clear that a habeas corpus petition can be denied on the merits, notwithstanding the petitioner's failure to exhaust available State remedies. That change would eliminate the waste of time and effort that currently occurs when a frivolous petition is dismissed by a Federal court on grounds of nonexhaustion of State remedies but is later brought back to Federal court following its unsuccessful presentation.

Second, the bill would change the current rule that gives a State prisoner in a habeas corpus proceeding repeated opportunities to persuade a Federal district judge and then a circuit judge that an appeal is warranted. Similarly, it would bring the procedure governing access to appeal in collateral proceedings involving Federal prisoners into line with the procedure employed for habeas corpus proceedings for State prisoners.

I believe that S. 1763 represents a rational, reasoned approach to a problem that has been developing for more than a century, a problem so great that it has led our country's leading jurists to ask us for specific legislative relief. I therefore ask my colleagues to support the bill in order to facilitate the ability of our judicial system to dispense justice, to all our citizens instead of unnecessarily wasting time and effort on a few people who exploit procedural loopholes in the law.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would take this opportunity to make a brief statement in support of the passage of S. 1763, the Reform of Federal Intervention in State Proceedings Act. The purpose of this bill, sponsored by Senators THURMOND, LAXALT, and others, is quite simply to bring about a greater measure of comity between State and Federal courts in the area of collateral review of State criminal convictions. The legislation, supported by the National Association of Attorneys General, will correct a number of longstanding problems that have existed in this area and its consideration by the Senate is long overdue.

The current state of the law governing Federal habeas review of criminal convictions obtained in State courts can be succinctly summarized as follows: There are too many Federal courts conducting full-blown retrials of State criminal cases under the guise of habeas review. This practice denigrates the stature of the criminal trial courts of the various States; adds to the already burdensome workload of the Federal courts, necessitating the appointment of additional Federal judges; unduly delays the final resolution of State criminal prosecutions; and deprives the State criminal justice systems of a great measure of administrative control which is vital to the proper functioning of those systems.

The disaffection of State officials, including State judges and attorneys general, with the present system of Federal habeas corpus review was amply confirmed in the course of the Judiciary Committee's consideration of S. 1763 and its predecessors. Moreover, Federal judges have been equally emphatic in their calls for reform. One eminent Federal jurist has characterized the present system of collateral attack as a "gigantic waste of effort." Substantially the same sentiments have been expressed by a majority of the Justices of the Supreme Court, who have called for basic limitations on the scope and availability of Federal review of State criminal convictions via the avenue of habeas petitions. Chief Justice Burger, for example, has urged Congress to consider restricting narrowly the availability of Federal habeas for State prisoners, stating that "the administration of justice in this country is plagued and bogged down with lack of reasonable finality of judgments in criminal cases."

To correct these problems, the bill would establish an appropriate standard of review for Federal habeas proceedings which concern a State conviction. That standard would accord deference to the results of State adjudications of issues which arise in the context of a State criminal prosecution where the defendant had a full and fair opportunity to raise the issue which is later placed before the Federal court. This one amendment in the law would overturn present procedures which produce results that border on the absurb, such as the reversal of judgments many years after the normal conclusion of State proceedings on grounds that often constitute no more than reasonable differences of opinion concerning close or unsettled questions in the interpretation or application of Federal constitutional law—questions which, in some cases, the Federal courts themselves disagree upon.

The bill would accomplish many other salutary changes in the law, such as imposing a statute of limitations upon the filing of habeas petitions where the grounds were known to the convicted offender years before the petition is filed; and refining exhaustion requirements. Of course, the bill provides protections to insure that any legitimate claim that the defendant did not have an opportunity to raise and have considered in the State proceedings—or in prior Federal proceedings—will receive a fair hearing.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that the bill is a reasonable and responsible attempt to correct the problems that now surround Federal court consideration of habeas claims that arise from State criminal proceedings. I join with the distinguished chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and others in urging passage of the legislation.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I know of no other amendments. If there be no other amendments, I ask for third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I take the floor now to ask the majority leader what the schedule for the remainder of the day and tomorrow is.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, the managers I believe next want to go to the exclusionary rule. Apparently, there is going to be a rollcall vote required on that. I doubt that we can get it in this afternoon.

What the leadership on this side wishes to do is after this final passage vote get that bill laid before the Senate and maybe get a time certain for a vote tomorrow, although I am not sure whether there is going to be amendments or not.

I wonder if the Senator will yield to me long enough to ask the distinguished managers if they know of any amendments.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I do not know of any on our side.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I do not know of any on our side.

With regard to the time that will be taken by this, I do not expect there will be much time taken. I know of no one who is going to attempt to delay a vote. I expect it will be a couple hours max.

But I see the Senator from Maryland taking the floor.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I do not want to be in any great hurry about it. It is a matter that is before the court on several important cases at the moment.

I would think the Senate would want to move with all deliberate speed, but I would emphasize "deliberate."

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, before I get in any deeper, let me respond to the minority leader by saying what the leadership on this side would like to do then is get this vote and then attempt to lay before the Senate the exclusionary rule with the expectation it may be tomorrow morning before we can finish it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, does the majority leader have an idea at this time when the Senate will come in tomorrow?

Mr. THURMOND. How about 10 a.m.?

Mr. BAKER. I do not know.

I wonder if I could confer with the minority leader about that in just a moment.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader, and I yield the floor.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, then, under these circumstances, no more rollcall votes will occur today after the one about to occur now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. MATSUNAGA (after having voted in the affirmative). On this vote, I have a pair with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY). If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "aye." I withdraw my vote.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. HECHT), the Senator from Iowa (Mr. JEPSEN), the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) and the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), would vote "nay."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) and the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT) would each vote "yea."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY), the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. DODD), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. LAUTENBERG), the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES), and the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER) is absent on official business.

I further announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY) is absent because of illness in the family.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 67, nays 9, as follows:

So the bill (S. 1763), as amended, was passed, as follows:

S. 1763

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Reform of Federal Intervention in State Proceedings Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. Section 2244 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(d) When a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court fails to raise a claim in State proceedings at the time or in the manner required by State rules of procedure, the claim shall not be entertained in an application for a writ of habeas corpus unless actual prejudice resulted to the applicant from the alleged denial of the Federal right asserted and—

"(1) the failure to raise the claim properly or to have it heard in State proceedings was the result of State action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States;

"(2) the Federal right asserted was newly recognized by the Supreme Court subsequent to the procedural default and is retroactively applicable; or

"(3) the factual predicate of the claim could not have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence prior to the procedural default.

"(e) A one-year period of limitation shall apply to an application for a writ of habeas corpus by a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court. The limitation period shall run from the latest of the following times:

"(1) the time at which State remedies are exhausted;

"(2) the time at which the impediment to filing an application created by State action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the Unted States is removed, where the applicant was prevented from filing by such State action;

"(3) the time at which the Federal right asserted was initially recognized by the Supreme Court, where the right has been newly recognized by the Court and is retroactively applicable; or

"(4) the time at which the factual predicate of the claim or claims presented could have been discovered through the exercies of reasonable diligence.".

SEC. 3. Section 2253 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 2253. Appeal

"In a habeas corpus proceeding or a proceeding under section 2255 of this title before a circuit or district judge, the final order shall be subject to review, on appeal, by the court of appeals for the circuit where the proceeding is had.

"There shall be no right of appeal from such an order in a proceeding to test the vailidity of a warrant to remove, to another district or place for commitment or trial, a person charged with a criminal offense against the United States, or to test the validity of his detention pending removal proceedings.

"An appeal may not be taken to the court of appeals from the final order in a habeas corpus proceeding where the detention complained of arises out of process issued by a State court, or from the final order in a proceeding under section 2255 of this title, unless a circuit justice or judge issues a certificate of probable cause.".

SEC. 4. Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 22 is amended to read as follows:

"Rule 22.

"HABEAS CORPUS AND § 2255 PROCEEDINGS

"(a) Application for an Original Writ of Habeas Corpus. An application for a writ of habeas corpus shall be made to the appropriate district court. If application is made to a circuit judge, the application will ordinarily be transferred to the appropriate district court. If an application is made to or transferred to the district court and denied, renewal of the application before a circuit judge is not favored; the proper remedy is by appeal to the court of appeals from the order of the district court denying the writ.

"(b) Necessity of Certificate of Probable Cause for Appeal. In a habeas corpus proceeding in which the detention complained of arises out of process issued by a State court, and in a motion proceeding pursuant to section 2255 of title 28, United States Code, an appeal by the applicant or movant may not proceed unless a circuit judge issues a certificate of probable cause. If a request for a certificate of probable cause is addressed to the court of appeals, it shall be deemed addressed to the judges thereof and shall be considered by a circuit judge or judges as the court deems appropriate. If no express request for a certificate is filed, the notice of appeal shall be deemed to constitute a request addressed to the judges of the court of appeals. If an appeal is taken by a State or the government or its representative, a certificate of probable cause is not required.".

SEC. 5. Section 2254 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by redesignating subsections "(e)" and "(f)" as subsections "(f)" and "(g)", respectively, and is further amended—

(a) by amending subsection (b) to read as follows:

"(b) An applications for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court shall not be granted unless it appears that the applicant has exhausted the remedies available in the courts of the State, or that there is either an absence of available State corrective process or the existence of circumstances rendering such process ineffective to protect the rights of the applicant. An application may be denied on the merits notwithstanding the failure of the applicant to exhaust the remedies available in the courts of the States.";

(b) by redesignating subsection "(d)" as subsection

"(e)", and amending it to read as follows:

"(e) In a proceeding instituted by an application for a writ of habeas corpus by a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court, a full and fair determination of a factual issue made in the case by a State court shall be presumed to be correct. The applicant shall have the burden of rebutting this presumption by clear and convincing evidence."; and

(c) by adding a new subsection (d) reading as follows:

"(d) An application for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of a person in costody pursuant to the judgment of a State court shall not be granted with respect to any claim that has been fully and fairly adjudicated in State proceedings.".

SEC. 6. Section 2255 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by deleting the second paragraph and the penultimate paragraph thereof, and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"When a person fails to raise a claim at the time or in the manner required by Federal rules of procedure, the claim shall not be entertained in a motion under this section unless actual prejudice resulted to the movant from the alleged denial of the right asserted and—

"(1) the failure to raise the claim properly, or to have it heard, was the result of governmental action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States:

"(2) the right asserted was newly recognized by the Supreme Court subsequent to the procedural default and is retroactively applicable; or

"(3) the factual predicate of the claim could not have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence prior to the procedural default.

"A two-year period of limitation shall apply to a motion under this section. The limitation period shall run from the latest of the following times:

"(1) the time at which the judgment of conviction becomes final;

"(2) the time at which the impediment to making a motion created by governmental action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States is removed, where the movant was prevented from making a motion by such governmental action;

"(3) the time at which the right asserted was initially recognized by the Supreme Court, where the right has been newly recognized by the Court and is retroactively applicable; or

"(4) the time at which the factual predicate of the claim or claims presented could have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence.".

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I voted against final passage of S. 1763, the bill to reform Federal habeas corpus proceedings because the limitations which the bill places on the "great writ" would undermine its role as a final bulwark against violations of the U.S. Constitution. Specifically, section 5(c) of the bill strikes at the core of the protection the writ provides against deprivation of constitutional rights in denying prisoners access to Federal courts to pursue violations of their constitutional rights.

I agree with the proponents of this legislation that there are currently abuses of the great writ and that those abuses should be corrected. However, I cannot support legislation which is so vague that it either will fail to achieve its stated goal or place in jeopardy the constitutional rights we cherish.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have consulted with the minoirty leader about the next bill in this package that the managers would like to take up, which is the exclusionary bill, Calendar Order No. 355. I hope we can get some debate out of the way on that today and that in the morning we may be able to set a time certain for a vote. I do not anticipate it will take very long to complete this bill. There probably will be a rollcall vote on passage.

EXCLUSIONARY RULE LIMITATION ACT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 355, S. 1764.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1764) to amend title XVIII to limit the application of the exclusionary rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

The Senate proceeded to the bill.4

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, S. 1764 is one of a series of important measures reported to the Senate by the Committee on the Judiciary to enhance the enforcement of the criminal laws. This bill would change the current case law with respect to the admission of illegally seized evidence in a criminal trial so as to permit such use if the evidence is obtained by a law enforcement officer acting with a reasonable good faith belief that his conduct conforms with the fourth amendment. Is also creates a presumption that the test is satisfied if the evidence was obtained pursuant to and within the scope of a judicial warrant, unless the warrant was obtained through intentional and material misrepresentation.

Mr. President, this is a modest effort to make the application of the so-called exclusionary rule consistent with the modern rationale for the rule enunciated by the Supreme Court—the deterrence of unlawful police conduct. I, personally, would prefer to abolish the exclusionary rule altogether and substitute effective alternative civil remedies. Such an approach, however, might require more time for consideration and debate than is available now, and it is important to enact meaningful legislation as soon as possible.

Mr. President, the committee report explores in detail the history of the exclusionary rule and the modern rationale for the rule. In essence, the Supreme Court in recent years has approached the extension of the rule through a cost-benefit analysis under which it has refused to suppress illegally seized evidence where the adverse impact of excluding relevant evidence from a judicial proceeding outweighs the theoretical deterrent effect on police conduct. This line of cases clearly shows that the Court considers the exclusionary rule as a judge-created remedy in the nature of a rule of evidence justified on the ground that it is needed to deter the police from violating the fourth amendment.

Mr. President, the committee applied the balancing approach of the Supreme Court to the searches and seizures encompassed by S. 1764 and concluded that "any fair analysis reveals that the costs of the exclusionary rule far outweigh its presumed benefit when applied to reasonable good faith police conduct that may, in retrospect, be deemed by the courts to be illegal." Indeed, it is, as Mr. Justice White has observed, painfully clear that suppression of evidence seized by a conscientious police officer acting as a reasonable officer would and should act under the circumstances can in no way affect his future conduct—unless it is to make him less willing to do his duty. Moreover, no case can be made on a deterrence theory for suppressing evidence seized pursuant to a judicially issued search warrant obtained without material and intentional misrepresentation. Chief Justice Burger stated the obvious when he characterized the use of the exclusionary rule as a sanction in such cases as "nothing less than sophisticated nonsense" because a police officer will never be deterred from executing a warrant held valid by a judge.

On the other hand, Mr. President, the harm caused by the exclusionary rule on the criminal justice system is conceded and is high. First, and the most obvious, is that the truth-finding process is deflected and the trier of fact is deprived of relevant, and often conclusive, evidence. In many cases, the guilty may go free.

Second, application of the exclusionary rule to reasonable good faith conduct may be expected to have a chilling effect on legitimate police activities as the police try to play it safe, thereby preventing effective legitimate law enforcement activities the community is entitled to expect.

Third, the application of the exclusionary rule to circumstances not meaningfully related to the purpose of the rule may undermine public confidence in and respect for the criminal justice system. This is particularly true when the errors of the police officer are minor and conclusive evidence of guilt is suppressed with respect to a serious violent crime.

Fourth, suppression motions are a major burden on law enforcement and judicial resources that serve no useful purpose when applied to reasonable good faith police conduct that is not meaningfully susceptible to being deterred.

Finally, I believe the exclusionary rule undermines fourth amendment values by fostering complex, confusing, and unpredictable rules of decision that encourage judges, reluctant to free the obviously guilty defendant, to make even finer distinctions and nuances to justify admitting the evidence, particularly in serious cases.

Mr. President, there are other harmful effects of the exlusionary rule. The ones I have mentioned, however, are sufficient to demonstrate the sound basis for enacting S. 1764.

In sum, Mr. President, the committee has concluded that the costs of excluding highly relevant, and often conclusive, evidence from the criminal trial far outweigh any theoretical deterrent value with respect to the reasonably well-trained police officer who, in good faith, believes he is acting in conformity with the fourth amendment.

I urge my colleagues to vote for this important measure.

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wish to comment briefly on the merits of S. 1764, the Exclusionary Rule Limitation Act, and explain why I believe that this bill should be favorably acted upon by the Senate.

The U.S. Supreme Court has repeatedly stated that the principal rationale underlying the exclusionary rule is the objective of deterring intentional police misconduct. Thus, the Court has implied by its decisions applying the rule that officers acting in good faith believe that their actions are legal should not suffer the consequences of the application of the exclusionary rule to evidence they obtain in a search later invalidated on technical grounds. Nevertheless, lower courts have consistently applied the rule in such circumstances. The purpose of the bill is to end that practice, and I believe that it is long overdue.

Search and seizure law is so confusing, so technical, and contains so many fine lines of distinction precisely because we have an exclusionary rule of evidence. The Constitution is clear: No search shall be conducted, nor seizure effected, by warrant except upon probable cause, stated under oath or affirmation. The same standard has generally governed search incident to arrest. The intent of the framers of the fourth amendment was clearly to erect a bar against overzealous prosecutors who would use the power of the law to indiscriminately harass the private citizen without justification. It was never the intent of the drafters, however, to allow the guilty defendant to go free because of some technical aberration in the preparation or execution of a warrant which does not affect the validity of probable cause underlying its issuance. Yet this is the situation which prevails in our courts today.

In short, Mr. President, the exclusionary rule distorts and corrupts the standards which ought to govern search and seizure under the Constitution. If it were not for the rule, there would not be the squirming around by trial judges to find some minor distinction in order to prevent an obviously guilty defendant from going free, nor later would there be the necessary repair work by the Supreme Court to keep intact reasonable rules of search and seizure under the fourth amendment.

The bill before the Senate now would correct this problem by enacting a new section 3505 of Title 38, United States Code, to limit the application of the judicially created rule in such a way that a search or seizure undertaken in a reasonable, good faith belief that it was in conformity with the fourth amendment would not result in the exclusion of probative evidence from the trier of fact. And, the bill would further provide that evidence obtained pursuant to and within the scope of a warrant constitutes prima facie evidence of such a reasonable, good faith belief unless the warrant was obtained through intentional and material misrepresentation. The bill, in my view, constitutes a reasonable solution to the problems that have resulted from overeager application of the rule by courts and I believe that it should be approved by this body.

Other solutions—rejected by the committee—would have more severely reduced the scope of the rule, or abolished it altogether. I believe that these approaches would not have been wise and I expressed those views in committee. But the legislation before us now strikes the proper balance between the interests of the public and the rights of defendants, and would provide greater protection for the public and while in no way impairing the integrity of our criminal justice system.

I thank the Chair.●

● Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, no legal issue has received more public attention than the exclusionary rule. The rule operates to exclude from the trial evidence obtained in violation of the fourth amendment prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures.

The Supreme Court adopted the rule to deter police misconduct. In the 70 years since its adoption, however, it has become apparent that the rule has very high costs. The evidence excluded is usually the most probative of guilt; hence, many criminals go free. These miscarriages of justice endanger the community and undermine public confidences in our criminal justice system. This is especially troubling in situations where a well-trained law enforcement officer conducts a search he genuinely believes is constitutional. The rule cannot possibly deter such good faith conduct. It is evident, then, that its application in such circumstances extracts a high cost but produces no benefit.

To redress this imbalance between costs and benefits, the Judiciary Committee considered abolishing the rule altogether and substituting a constitutional tort claims remedy against the Government. S. 1764, however, retains the exclusionary rule but limits its application to evidence obtained by an officer acting unreasonably or in bad faith. This is the only kind of police conduct that the exclusionary rule can deter.

Those who oppose this legislation raise two major objections. First, opponents argue that the rule is constitutionally mandated. It is clear from the Supreme Court cases, however, that the exclusionary rule is only a judicially selected remedy to deter police misconduct. This legislation represents a congressional declaration that the rule cannot deter good faith, objectively reasonable conduct that is later found to be unconstitutional.

Second, it is argued that this proposal places a premium on police ignorance, that an officer completely ignorant of fourth amendment law can honestly claim he acted in good faith. The subjective good faith test, however, is only a part of the standard. The conduct must also meet an objective test of reasonableness. The untrained officer ignorant of the fourth amendment would not meet the objective test no matter how sincerely he believed that his conduct was constitutional.

Those who fear the exclusionary rule will destroy the fourth amendment guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures should note that the United States is the only civilized country with such a rule. Great Britain and Canada are hardly examples of police states. Moreover, search and seizure law is extremely complex. The Supreme Court often decides cases by a 5-4 margin. If nine justices steeped in the intricacies of fourth amendment law cannot, after considered reflection, agree on a result, an officer cannot be expected to grasp a fine distinction in the heat of the moment.

The present exclusionary rule is simply too broad, and we all pay a high price for its misapplication. Congress must act to limit the rule to situations where its cost produces a corresponding benefit.●

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, before we recess until tomorrow, I wish to speak on an editorial which appeared in the the Washington Post today about the crime package—S. 1762—that the Senate passed last Thursday.
